I accordingly arrive at the conclusion that there was no good reason for the complainers adopting the method they have done to have the rate of compensation settled, and I think it would be intolerable in the administration of the Workmen's Compensation Act if it were to be held competent by merely raising a suspension to have such questions determined in the Court of Session instead of by the proceedings prescribed by the Act.

I may add that it appears to me from the correspondence which is produced and printed by the complainers, and which may be read along with the record, that there was not at any time an agreement in the proper sense of the word for a reduction of the compensation from 15s. 11d. What happened was that the complainers provided work in the way of wood-cutting for the respondent, whose true occupation was that of a miner, that he worked at cutting wood, and in fact did everything he could to earn his wages, and that the arrangement was come to between the respondent and the complainers that as his wages rose his compensation should diminish to the effect of giving him 50 per cent of the difference between the wage he was receiving from time to time and the amount of his former wages. The whole matter was accordingly left in a state of uncertainty, varying from time to time according as the respondent might be able for more or less work and earn more or less wages. This case differs entirely from the cases of Beath,² and Nimmo v. Fisher,³ in both of which the

In the present case all that the respondent gave a charge for was compensation at the rate fixed by the agreement from the time when the parties fell out, and if that was in the circumstances too high it was a very simple matter for the complainers to have gone before the Sheriff, as I have already explained, and got the rate varied, but this they failed to do.

On these grounds I think the note ought to be refused.

Jan. 17, 1908. JOHN M'WHINNIE, Respondent (Reclaimer).—Munro—A. M. Mackay.

William Baird & Co., Limited, v. M'Whinnie. Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule (1) (b), (2) and (12) and Second Schedule (8) and (14) (c)—Memorandum of Agreement—Suspension of Charge—Charge for period when earning wages.—In July 1906 the employers of a workman, who had been injured, agreed to pay him 14s. 5d. per week, being half his former wage (the statutory maximum) as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the workman received payment of that sum from July to September 1906. A memorandum of the agreement was recorded. The agreement did not refer to the workman's total incapacity, but he admitted that he received the weekly payment in respect of total incapacity. In September 1906 he returned to work with the same employers, and continued in their employment till May 1907, earning wages which averaged 23s. 2d. per week. In May 1907 he charged the employers on the recorded memorandum to pay him compensation at the full rate of 14s. 5d. per week for the period from September 1906 to May 1907. The sum charged for with the addition of the wages earned by him during that period gave an average sum per week considerably in excess of his average weekly earnings before the accident.

The employers brought a suspension, and tendered payment of the full difference between his earnings from September 1906 to May 1907 and his earnings for a like period before the accident.

The Court, in respect of the workman's refusal to accept the sum tendered, suspended the charge.

Lord Mackenzie.

WILLIAM BAIRD & COMPANY, LIMITED, coal and iron masters, carrying on business at Kilsyth, in the county of Stirling, brought a suspension of a charge given to them at the instance of John M'Whinnie, miner, Kilsyth, in virtue of an extract registered memorandum of agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Execution was sisted on consignment. Thereafter the note was passed and a record made up and closed.

The facts and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie), who, on 5th November 1907, after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the compensation due to the respondent was payable only during his total incapacity; and further, in respect of his refusal to accept the complainers' offer of £9, 10s. 3d., sustains the reasons of suspension, suspends the charge, warrants, and whole grounds thereof simpliciter, and decerns," &c.*

Jan. 17, 1908.
William Baird
& Co., Limited,
v. M'Whinnie.

* "OPINION.—The respondent is a miner who met with an accident to his eye on 29th March 1906 while in the employment of the complainers. He claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of his total incapacity for work. On 12th April 1906 the parties agreed that the weekly amount of compensation, in respect of the respondent's total incapacity, was 14s. 5d. The respondent's average weekly earnings in the complainer's employment were 28s. 9½d. The sum of 14s. 5d. was the maximum rate under the statute for total incapacity.

"The respondent was paid 14s. 5d. a week of compensation from 12th April to 29th May 1906. On 29th May he returned to work at a wage of 18s. 4d. a week, which he continued to earn till 12th July 1906. During this period he was paid 5s. 3d. a week as partial compensation. On 13th July 1906 he again became totally incapacitated, and his total incapacity continued till 13th September 1906. On 21st July 1906 an agreement was entered into between the parties, under which the respondent was again paid compensation at the maximum rate of 14s. 5d. a week. A memorandum of the agreement of 21st July 1906 was recorded in terms of the Act. The agreement, which is produced, does not refer to the respondent's total incapacity, but in answer 5 he admits that he received the payment of 14s. 5d. a week from 13th July to 13th September 1906 in respect of his total incapacity. On 13th September 1906 the respondent returned to work with the complainers. He continued to work from that date till 6th May 1907 at wages which averaged 23s. 2d. a week.

"On 6th May 1907 the respondent charged the complainers on the memorandum of the agreement of 21st July 1906, to pay to him £35, 5s. 6d. being forty-two weeks' compensation at 14s. 5d. a week, from 21st July 1906 to 6th May 1907, under deduction of £6, 9s. 9d. being the amount received by him between 13th July and 13th September 1906. If the complainers pay the sum charged for, the respondent would receive, in respect of the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907, a sum considerably exceeding (the complainers say about 9s. a week) his average weekly earnings prior to the accident.

"The complainers maintain that the respondent is only entitled to compensation from 13th September 1906 to 6th May 1907 at the rate of the full difference between the average of his actual weekly earnings during that period, and the average of his weekly earnings prior to the accident. This, for the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907, amounts to £9, 10s. 3d. which complainers tender in the present suspension of the charge.

"The complainers argued that the present case was ruled by the principles laid down in Beath & Keay v. Ness, 6 F. 168, followed in Nimmo & Company, Limited, v. Fisher, 1907, S. C. 890, and I am of opinion that this argument is well founded. The respondent maintained that this was not so, because, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, Schedule I., sec. (1) (b), compensation at the rate of 14s. 5d. a week might be awarded in respect not only of total, but also of partial incapacity; he accordingly maintained that an application must be made to have the agreement reviewed. I am unable, looking to what I consider to have been decided by these cases, to hold that the respondent can found upon the agreement of 21st July 1906 so as to enable him to recover a sum in excess of his average weekly earnings prior to the date of the accident. In the present case either the respondent got wages on the implied agreement between him and the complainers that compensation at the rate of 14s. 5d. per week, the amount which had been fixed in respect of his total incapacity, was no longer due or claimable, because the total incapacity, in respect of which this sum of compensation was due, had ceased, and therefore the right to get, or obligation to pay

Jan. 17, 1908. The respondent reclaimed. The case was heard on 14th and 21st December 1907.

William Baird & Co., Limited, v. M^cWhinnie. Argued for the respondent and claimer;—The agreement here did not refer to incapacity or total incapacity. It was an agreement for payment of 14s. 5d. till that amount was varied by agreement or order of Court. The Act did not say that a workman was never to get more by way of compensation than the difference between his present earnings and his average earnings before the accident. The effect of the judgments in Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co.,¹ Pumpherson Oil Co., Limited, v. Cavaney,² and Baird & Co., Limited, v. Stevenson,³ was that the workman received more than his earnings previous to the accident. The employers were not entitled at their own hand to stop payment of the amount fixed by decree or recorded agreement unless the workman had completely recovered, and admitted that he had completely recovered. *Beath & Keay v. Ness*⁴ proceeded upon the view that the workman in effect admitted complete recovery. The workman here never earned the same wages as he did before the accident. His recovery was never more than partial. The principle of *Beath & Keay*⁴ did not apply to a case of partial recovery and return to work at lower wages. *James Nimmo & Co., Limited, v. Fisher*⁵ simply followed Beath & Keay,⁴ and was not intended to extend it further. The agreement there was different. The question now raised was not considered. The policy of the Act was that a sum should be fixed, which should remain enforceable until it was competently altered as provided by the Act. It was never intended that the amount payable should vary automatically from day to day according to the state of the workman's health. The amount of wages which a workman was in fact earning, as compared with his wages before the accident, was not a conclusive measure of his right to compensation. It was merely an element for consideration.⁶ The question was whether his earning capacity had been diminished. The fact that a workman had returned to work, even at higher wages, was not conclusive proof of an agreement to waive his rights under an agreement for compensation.⁷ compensation at that rate had come to an end, or the payment of wages at the average rate of 23s. 2d. a week was, in the first place, to be held to the extent of 14s. 5d. of that sum as payment of the compensation, and the balance as the remuneration given for such service as the respondent, in his partially disabled condition, was able to render. In Nimmo's case the complainers tendered a sum which represented the full difference between the respondent's average earnings prior to the accident and his actual earnings for the period in question. The Court, in respect of his refusal to accept this offer, sustained the reasons of suspension, and suspended the charge simpliciter.

"Accordingly, I am of opinion, in the present case, that there should be a finding that the compensation due to the respondent was payable only during his total incapacity, and further, in respect of his refusal to accept the complainers' offer of £9, 10s. 3d., that the reasons of suspension should be sustained and the charge suspended simpliciter, the complainers being found entitled to expenses."

Argued for the complainers and respondents;—The Lord Ordinary Jan. 17, 1908. was right. (1) The present case was ruled by Beath & Keay v. Ness,¹ and James Nimmo & Co., Limited, v. Fisher,² particularly the latter, which was indistinguishable. It was decided there that if the workman returned to work with the same employers at reduced wages an agreement on his part was implied that he was not to be entitled to more than the difference between his former wage and his new wage. In *Beath & Keay*¹ there was a decree for payment until further orders of Court. The most that a workman could get under the Act was the difference between his earnings after and before the accident. There was no necessity here for any inquiry as to the amount payable. The employers tendered the highest amount which could be awarded. The arbitrator under the Act could award a sum which with the wages earned made up as much as the previous wage, but not more.³ There was no case in which a workman had been found entitled to a sum which would give him altogether more than his previous wage. The cases referred to dealt with the question of ending compensation altogether. (2) There was no warrant for the charge. The memorandum must be taken along with the respondent's admission. He admitted that the agreement was for a payment during total incapacity. Total incapacity had ceased, and the agreement was therefore at an end.

At advising on 17th January 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case of the respondent involves the somewhat startling proposition, that a workman who has been injured can be entitled under the Workmen's Compensation Act to receive compensation from his employer at a time when he is earning the full wages he received at the time of the accident—in other words, that he may be made better off pecuniarily from having had an accident than he could have been if no accident had happened, although it is the intention of the statute that the fullest pecuniary benefit he can take by it is one-half of his earnings.

Here the respondent was paid, after the accident, 14s. 5d. a week, which was the full amount he could properly demand under the Act. When he came back to work he earned 18s. 4d. a week, and received 5s. 3d. of compensation. He again became incapacitated, and, by agreement, he again received full compensation, the agreement being recorded. Later he returned to work, and got 23s. 2d. a week.

He now proposes to charge the complainers for a sum of £35, 5s. 6d. If this sum were paid to him, then it is not disputed that he will have been paid in wages and compensation, for a period from 13th September 1906 till May 1907, a weekly sum much in excess of his full average wages prior to the accident.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the contention of the charger cannot be given effect to. It seems, on the face of it, to be contrary to reason and justice, and I also agree in thinking that the authority of the

& Co., Limited,
v. M'Whinnie.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

I am therefore of opinion that the Court must hold that the right to compensation could only subsist while the injured workman was incapacitated from earning wages up to the amount of his previous weekly earnings, and that as he has refused to accept compensation offered him which would give him his just right under the statute, the judgment suspending the charge should be adhered to.

LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and ought to be affirmed.

I concur with the Lord Ordinary that the present case is ruled by the principles laid down in Beath & Keay v. Ness,¹ and followed in Nimmo & Co. v. Fisher.²

In the present case, as in these cases, the respondent endeavours, by making use of the machinery of the Workmen's Compensation Act, aided by certain judicial decisions and dicta of not unquestionable authority, to obtain for the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907 payment of a sum per week which added to his wages would bring up his weekly emoluments to a sum considerably exceeding his average weekly earnings prior to the accident. In short, he is endeavouring, under cover of the machinery of the Act, to obtain, not compensation for his injury, but something considerably over and above the largest amount of compensation to which the general provisions of the Act entitle him. It is quite clear that this is contrary to the main purpose and object of the Act, and that, accordingly, the Court is entitled to interfere for the purpose of preventing an injustice to the complainers, and an abuse of the machinery of the Act.

In my opinion the Lord Ordinary has taken the proper course in suspending the charge simpliciter.

This case presents a complete contrast to that which immediately preceded it in to-day's roll.³ I think it unnecessary to go into more detail, as I think the whole case has been admirably dealt with by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, with which I concur.

a railway company, at the instance of the widow and children of a passenger who had died from injuries received in a railway accident, the defenders admitted liability for the injuries of the deceased. The pursuers proposed an issue in ordinary form, whether the deceased had been injured "through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers." The defenders objected to this form of issue, and proposed that the issue should contain a recital of the admission of liability, with the sole question,—“What is the amount of the loss, injury, and damage sustained by the pursuers?”

Jan. 18, 1908.
Black v.
North British
Railway Co.

The Court (with three consulted Judges), following the established practice in such cases, approved of the issue in ordinary form; but were of opinion that, in estimating the amount of damages, including solatium, due to the pursuers, the sufferings of the deceased would be a relevant consideration, but not the grossness of the fault of the defenders.

Form of issue approved in Morton (Cooley's Factor) v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., Dec. 13, 1845, 8 D. 288, followed; but opinions of the Judges in that case as to the admissibility of proof of negligence commented on and doubted.

Observed (per the Lord President), that the English doctrine of “exemplary damages,” which was founded on malice, could not apply to cases where the person sued is not the actual wrongdoer, but is only responsible on the ground of respondet superior.

ON 17th May 1907 Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black, widow of Alexander William Black, W.S., and Member of Parliament for Banffshire, and her four children, brought an action against the North British Railway Company, in which they concluded for certain sums as damages on account of the death of the said Alexander William Black, who had been fatally injured in a railway accident at Elliot Junction, near Arbroath. The sums concluded for amounted in all to £21,000, being £5000 to the widow, and £4000 to each of the four children.

with three consulted Judges.
Lord Guthrie.

The pursuers averred that on 28th December 1906 the deceased travelled by train from Arbroath to Elliot Junction, where the train arrived about six minutes after leaving Arbroath, and where it remained standing for some time; that on that day a snow-storm of exceptional severity prevailed which prevented the signals from working properly, and owing to one of the lines in the neighbourhood being blocked the traffic was being worked on a single line; that about fifteen minutes after the said train had been despatched from Arbroath, and in the midst of a blinding snow-storm, another train was despatched southwards from Arbroath, travelling tender first, which did not slacken speed on approaching Elliot Junction, but, while travelling at a speed of about 30 miles an hour, dashed into the train in which the deceased was seated. They also set forth the serious and painful nature of the injuries which the deceased had suffered.

The pursuers further averred in Cond. 4:—“The said accident and consequent death of Mr Black were caused by the gross negligence of the defenders and their servants in, inter alia, the following respects”:—(a) That the defenders’ servants had started the train tender first, which in view of the state of the weather was a dangerous and unjustifiable method of travelling. (b) That the stationmaster at Arbroath, although he knew that the signals were not working properly and that one line was blocked, had started the second train in a dangerously short time after the first, and without warning the engine-driver to proceed with caution. (c) That the engine-driver of the second train had driven at excessive speed, had failed to observe the various signals,

Jan. 18, 1908. and had failed to draw up before passing the home signal at Elliot Junction. (d) That the stationmaster at Elliot Junction had failed to put fog signals on the line to the north of the Junction, as it was his duty in the state of the weather to do.

Black v.
North British
Railway Co.

The defenders' answer to Cond. 4 was as follows:— "Denied. Explained that the defenders for the purposes of the present action admit liability for the injuries sustained by the said Mr Black."

The pursuers also set forth the patrimonial loss they alleged that they had suffered, and further averred:—(Cond. 6) "The pursuers have further suffered greatly in their feelings through the sudden death of their husband and father, and the distressing circumstances under which the same occurred. Further, his widow has suffered the loss of his companionship and protection, and his children have suffered the loss of his guardianship and influence at an age when such guardianship and influence would have been of specially great importance to them. The loss, injury, and damage, including the sums they are entitled to receive as solatium, caused to the pursuers by the said death are moderately estimated at the sums respectively concluded for."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—The pursuers having sustained loss, injury, and damage in respect of the death of the said Alexander William Black, as condescended on, through the fault of the defenders, are entitled to reparation therefor as concluded for.

The defenders' sole plea in law was;—The sums sued for are grossly excessive.

The pursuers proposed the following issue:—"Whether on or about the 28th day of December 1906, and at or near Elliot Junction, a station on the Dundee and Arbroath Joint Railway, the late Alexander William Black, Writer to the Signet, Member of Parliament, husband of the pursuer Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black, and father of the other pursuers, received injuries to his person from which he subsequently died, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers. Damages laid," &c.

The defenders proposed this issue:—"It being admitted that on or about the 28th December 1906 the late Alexander William Black, Writer to the Signet, Member of Parliament, husband of the pursuer Mrs Ellinor Wilson or Black, and father of the other pursuers, received injuries to his person at or near the railway station known as Elliot Junction, near Arbroath, from which he subsequently died, through the fault of the defenders: What is the amount of the loss, injury, and damage sustained by the pursuers? Damages laid," &c.

On 23d October 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) approved of the issue proposed by the pursuers, and disallowed the issue proposed by the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—I approve the form of issue proposed by the pursuers in this case, as against the form of issue proposed by the defenders.

"In the case of Morton (Cooley's Factor) v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Company, 13th December 1845, 8 D. 288, Lord Moncreiff stated that, prior to the date of that case, issues in both forms had been allowed by the Court, although it does not appear whether the question between the two forms of issues had ever been debated. But the point was carefully considered in Cooley's case, by a Court composed of the Judges of the First and Second Divisions; and by a majority of five (Lord President Boyle, Lord Justice-Clerk Hope, and Lords Fullerton, Jeffrey, and Moncreiff) to three (Lords Mackenzie, Medwyn, and Cockburn), the form of issue proposed by the pursuers in this case was preferred. In considering the case

The defenders reclaimed, and gave notice of a motion to vary the issue by bringing it into conformity with the issue which had been proposed by them. On 9th November 1907 the First Division sent the case to be argued before themselves, with three Judges of the Second Division. The hearing before the seven Judges took place on 19th November 1907.

Black v.
North British
Railway Co.

Argued for the defenders and reclaimers;—Where liability was admitted, as here, the only question for the jury was the amount of loss suffered by the pursuers. Admitting that the form of issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary was the issue approved in similar circumstances in the case of Morton (Cooley's Factor),¹ and followed in practice ever since, yet that form of issue ought now to be reconsidered, for it permitted the whole circumstances of the accident to be gone into before the jury, including the sufferings of the deceased and the amount of fault on the part of the defenders, which might have a of Cooley, it must be kept in view first that the action involved the element of assyhtment, which the present case does not at least bear to do; and second, that whereas in this case the defenders merely admit 'negligence,' the defenders in Cooley's case admitted 'culpable' negligence.

"After Cooley's case, the issue there approved seems to have been followed for ten years, without question, in cases of admitted liability. In 1856, the same point was again brought before the Court in Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Company, 18 D. 862. None of the Judges of the First Division before whom Dobie's case came (Lord President M'Neill, and Lords Ivory, Curriehill, and Deas) sat on Cooley's case. They took the case to avizandum, and the Lord President delivered this opinion:—'We have looked into the case of Morton to see whether there was any distinction between it and the present case, and whether it disposed of the question on its merits and on principle, and we find that in no feature is it distinguishable from the present case on the point now before us, which was very fully considered there. We cannot disturb that judgment, and therefore we approve of the issue for the pursuer.'

"Since Dobie's case, the Cooley issue has been followed. See Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, 1889, 16 R., per Lord Shand, p. 389, compared with Lord Adam, p. 390. I am informed that the point was again brought under the notice of the First Division in the recent case of M'Bride v. Loudon & Inglis (although the question was not fully debated), and an issue was approved in the same form. In these circumstances, it is obviously my duty, whatever my view on the merits, to approve the pursuers' issue.

"But as I heard an argument on the merits, and as the question is one of general importance (see Glegg on Reparation, 1905, p. 118, where a view favourable to the defenders is stated), it is right that I should express my opinion. During the discussion, my impression was with the defenders. I have now arrived at an opposite conclusion, and think that the decision of the majority in Cooley's case was right in principle.

"The real question underlying the point now at issue between the parties, is whether the quantum of the defenders' negligence is relevant for the jury to consider in estimating damages. Had the defenders admitted simpliciter the whole averments of the pursuers as to negligence, and had the case gone to trial on the defenders' issue, the same point would have arisen for the Judge's decision at the trial, when the pursuer's counsel proposed to read and found upon the defenders' admissions. In this case, the defenders make a bald admission of 'negligence,' and deny all the pursuers' averments relating to negligence, with the result that the case might be one of a merely

Jan. 18, 1908. Black v. North British Railway Co. considered.¹ Although the form of issue allowed in *Morton's case*² was followed in *Dobie*³ and Cunningham,⁴ these cases were not in point, for the former was at the instance of the injured man, and the latter was an action of slander. (3) The practice in England was in support of the defenders' contention. The law on this matter was regulated there by Lord Campbell's Act,⁵ and the jury were confined to the pecuniary loss suffered. In the English case of *Blake*⁶ the Scots authorities were pressed on the Court, but the Court refused to extend the English practice. Further, the theory of awarding exemplary damages where there was gross fault, as known to the law of England, was not applicable to the circumstances here, as it could not apply where the wrongdoing was that of a servant.⁷

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—The decision in *Morton's case*² ruled this case, both on the ground of practice and of principle. (1) Practice.—It was admitted that the unvarying practice was in favour of the pursuers' contention, and as this was an appeal on a point of procedure, viz., a variation of an issue, the established practice with regard to it was conclusive. Further, this form of action was introduced into Scots practice about 100 years ago, and was founded solely on custom,⁸ and being founded solely on custom all that could be appealed to was custom, and custom was in favour of the form of issue allowed. (2) Principle.—The decision in *Morton's case*² was also sound in principle. There were two grounds on which compensation could be awarded in such cases under the law of Scotland—damages for patrimonial loss, and solatium for wounded feelings. Solatium was fully recognised as a ground for damages in Scots law.⁹ Its origin was no doubt obscure. In the Digest¹⁰ it was referred to, but not in any technical sense, only as an equivalent to compensation. The references to Stair¹¹ and Erskine¹² were of no value, for these works were written at a date previous to the introduction of this form of action. It was not the case that solatium had been confused with the action of assythment. Assythment was based on criminal responsibility only,¹³ and did not really enter into the principle decided in *Morton*² and the other cases. *Morton*² was really decided on the same considerations as were applicable here. Into solatium as now recognised there entered, as a consideration in the assessment of damages, both the laceration of feelings caused by the sufferings of the deceased, and the grossness of the fault of the defenders. The distinction between culpa lata and culpa levis still existed, though culpa levissima had now dropped out.¹ Culpa lata was a consideration for increased damages.² Jan. 18, 1908. The circumstances of the case as affecting the question of fault must therefore be inquired into.³ (3) The analogy from English law supported this view. Although the jury in England were limited to the consideration of the pecuniary loss suffered, the extent of fault of the defendant was considered relevant.⁴ Much more should it be so considered in Scotland, where lacerated feelings were a ground for damages. As to the analogy of an award of exemplary damages in England, the fact that the claim was against the master and not the servant made no distinction—qui facit per alium facit per se. Black v. North British Railway Co.

At advising on January 18, 1908,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action raised by the widow and children of the deceased Mr Black against the North British Railway Company. The deceased gentleman lost his life owing to injuries received in a collision while travelling as a passenger in a train of the defenders; and the summons concludes for very considerable sums of money to each of the pursuers. The condescendence sets forth that the collision in question was caused by the gross negligence of the defenders, the specification of said negligence consisting in setting forth alleged faults of the driver of the train which ran into the train in which Mr Black was seated, and of the station-masters at two stations. The sums concluded for are said to be due to them as reparation and solatium for the injury done to them by the death of Mr Black through the fault of the defenders. The defenders, while not admitting the particular fault condescended on, put in the following statement:—“Explained that the defenders, for the purposes of the present action, admit liability for the injuries sustained by Mr Black.”

Technically, the only question raised in the case is the form of the issue. But really the controversy between the parties goes deeper, and is concerned with the question of what are, if I may so express it, the true ingredients of the damage suffered by the pursuers; and the form of the issue is only material in so far as it lends itself to the proper or improper admission in evidence of circumstances which, according to the one view or the other, are relevant to the question of what the damage amounts to.

Viewed as upon authority I do not think we could, so far as form is concerned, go back on the case of Morton,⁵ followed by the case of Dobie.⁶ The defenders, however, have frankly stated that they wish to take the opinion of the House of Lords on the subject, and it therefore seems right that we should not send up the case without considered opinions. But besides that there is another reason why I think it desirable that we should state our views apart from authority. Though Morton's case⁵ has ruled

Further, I think there has been the unfortunate effect that directions in the matter have varied according to the views of individual Judges. The Lord Ordinary has called attention to this by comparing what was said by Lord Shand and by Lord Adam in the case of Cunningham.² It seems expedient, therefore, that true principles should be laid down by the Court of highest resort, and that they should then be followed in all cases.

Black v.
North British
Railway Co.

Ld. President.

There is no question as to the liability of the defenders to compensate for direct patrimonial loss which the widow and children have suffered by the death of the husband and father viewed as the breadwinner of the family. The question in dispute arises in considering what are the matters which it is relevant to consider in estimating what is due in name of solatium, and they really resolve into two points. First, are the pursuers entitled to enhanced damages if they shew that the deceased was subjected to pain and suffering before his death; second, are they entitled to enhanced damages if they shew that the negligence of the Company was gross negligence. If they are, then it is evident that the pursuers are entitled to insist on proving first, the circumstances of the collision so far as they affected Mr Black, and second, the circumstances of the collision so far as shewing the causes which led to it.

I cannot say that I have been able to find any authoritative pronouncement on what is the true definition of solatium. The word occurs in the Digest in two places—viii. 4, 13, and xxvi. 7, 33—but not in a sense which is in the slightest degree technical or calculated to throw any light on the subject. In the first passage it is used for the payment which must be made if one wishes to take stones out of another man's quarry; and it is used as an equivalent to "solarium," which in fact is the word in some of the MSS. There seems, therefore, little doubt that the word had not a technical origin, but was used, as was often the case, by the old Scottish lawyers as a convenient Latin tag to express what might have been expressed, but with less conciseness, in English. We were told at the Bar that the first time the word appears is in the case of Brown v. M'Gregor,³ the case which may be, I think, taken as the first instance of the modern "actio injuriarum,"—I quote the words of Lord President Inglis in Eisten,⁴—as contrasted with the older action of assythment. This is, however, not so. The word is used as far back as 1741 in a case of Moodie v. Sir James Stuart, reported by Monboddo, and to be found in 5 Brown's Supplement, p. 709. The report is so short and to the point as to be worth quoting:—"The question here was about the quantity of an assythment, whether it contained only the expenses laid out by the relations of the defunct in the prosecution of his death, together with an aliment to those of his relations who stood in need of being alimented, and whom the defunct would have been obliged to aliment; or whether it did not likewise contain something in solatium to the relations for the loss they had sustained. This last the Lords found." And the word is also used by Lord Kames in his law tracts discussing assythment.

It seems, therefore, tolerably certain that it had its origin in the action of Jan. 18, 1908. assythment, and probably without very much consideration found its way ^{Black v.} into the action of damages. As to the modern action I do not think I can ^{North British} add to what is said by Lord President Inglis in the case of Eisten.¹ ^{Railway Co.} Originally I take it the two actions stood side by side—at least, that is what I ^{Ld. President.} should gather from the way in which Stair treats the subject in Book 1, Title 9, sections 4, 6, and 7. And probably the change from the old to the modern practice was not very well marked. The civil action could, of course, be in the Session alone, while assythment might be in Justiciary or modified in Exchequer or by action in the Session. But Justiciary and Exchequer came to be abandoned.—(See Lord Deas in Greenhorn v. Addie.²) The transition stage is, I think, well marked by comparing Black v. Cadell,³ which seems to go on assythment alone (and is accurately reported in Morrison under the heading of Assythment), with Brown v. M'Gregor,⁴ which although professedly based on Black v. Cadell,³ is clearly an actio injuriarum and not assythment. For the test I think is not doubtful, being that laid down in Eisten,¹ viz., was the act complained of a crime? In Black's case³ conceivably the defender might have been indicted for culpable homicide, though I infer that the chances of a conviction would have been remote. In Brown's case⁴ it would have been impossible. The end of it all is that I think solatium, borrowed from the action of assythment, has in the actio injuriarum come to mean reparation for feelings—in short all reparation which is not comprehended under the heading of actual patrimonial loss. And as such it is I think a legitimate ingredient to consider the laceration of the feelings of the widow and family in contemplating the pain and suffering to which the deceased was exposed before death actually supervened. This answers the first question put in the affirmative.

Turning now to the second question, I first inquire what are the supposed grounds on which the contention for enhanced damages rests, and I find they are two. Certain Judges in Morton's case⁵ countenanced the idea that damages are partly imposed in pœnam, and that consequently if the fault is gross the penalty ought to be great. I do not think this view will bear a moment's examination. Take an accident like the present where there were over a score of sufferers. What is to be the province of each particular jury? Are the rights of each set of pursuers to depend upon the accident whether the defenders have been already sufficiently mulcted by a former jury? The whole argument seems to me so faulty that, if it were not that it has had the sanction of very eminent men, I should have used the term absurd.

The other ground is that, where fault is great, damages ought to be what is termed "exemplary." I am bound to say I find no authority for any distinction between damages and "exemplary damages" in the law of Scotland. The very heading under which it is treated in our older books "Reparation" excludes the idea. There is, however, a great deal of authority in the law of England. I do not feel entitled, sitting in this Court, to review the English judgments. But I will permit myself two remarks. In

Jan. 18, 1908. the first place, I will take as a specimen what is said in a well-known work, Black v. Mayne on Damages—"If then malice can render an innocent act wrongful, North British it must therefore render a wrongful act more wrongful, and therefore be Railway Co. provable in aggravation of damages." It seems to me that the basis of this

Ld. President. reasoning needs to be reconsidered in the light of the House of Lords decision in Allan v. Flood.¹ In the second place, it seems to me that malice is the foundation of the doctrine, and that its application to the present class of cases is because culpa lata dolo equiparatur. If then malice is the foundation, it surely cannot apply to cases where the person sued is not the actual wrongdoer, but is only held liable on the ground of respondet superior. In the present case there is no averment of fault of system which could be laid at the door of the directors of the Railway Company. The "gross negligence" as alleged is negligence of three separate officials, as to none of whom it is said that they were improperly selected for their posts.

I should like to add that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says,—“It is, I imagine, a fact in human nature that grief may be aggravated and loss embittered by the knowledge that the slightest care on the part of those causing the injury would have prevented the accident. On the other hand, if the case is only by a technicality outside the category of inevitable accident, the situation is accepted with greater resignation and the mind sooner recovers calmness.” It seems to me that this all depends on the particular mind. To many it might be as the Lord Ordinary says. But to others it might be different. They would feel more acutely such a case as, e.g., when a loosened brick from a bridge happened to fall on the head of a railway passenger at that moment looking out of the window. At anyrate I do not think there is any general consensus of feeling on which a rule for awarding increased damages could be founded.

I therefore come to the conclusion that it is not relevant to inquire whether the accident was caused by gross or by ordinary negligence—in other words, that if the defenders admit negligence no more proof on the subject of the cause of the accident should be allowed, as to do so would tend to confuse the jury. If this is clearly understood by the presiding Judge, I think the form of the issue immaterial—I mean as between the two competing forms before us. Were the slate absolutely blank I might perhaps prefer that tendered by the defenders, and the reasons for doing so are well stated in a note of Lord Johnston in reporting the case of Hillcoat.*

* The case of Hillcoat v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company was reported by Lord Johnston (Ordinary) to the First Division, but was settled by joint minute, to which the Division interposed authority on 1st November 1907. His Lordship's note in reporting the case was as follows:—"This action is raised by Mrs Hillcoat against the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company to recover compensation for the injury occasioned to her by an accident which occurred to one of their trains, in which she was travelling, at Saltcoats Station on 18th August 1906. The circumstances were that the train in which the pursuer was travelling was standing at Saltcoats Station when another train of the defenders' company ran into it from behind, causing a collision in which the pursuer was injured. I do not touch upon the allegations of fault which led to or caused the collision, because the defenders admit the

But, as I have already said, I think we are bound by authority to adopt Jan. 18, 1908. the form proposed by the pursuers, and that form will not prevent me, if I Black v. am trying the case, from giving effect to the views I have already expressed North British Railway Co. in the admission or rejection of evidence. It will be for the House of Lords to approve or disapprove of these views, and I need scarcely say I Ld. President. shall hold myself bound to follow what is laid down by them, whether it does or does not agree with the opinion I have just delivered.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship's exposition of the principles upon which damages should be assessed in this case. With reference occurrence of the collision and the pursuer's consequent injury, and accept liability for the accident which caused it. They cannot accept liability without, for the purposes of the action, admitting fault for which they are responsible.

"The nature of the injuries alleged are serious internal injuries occasioned by the twisting of the pursuer's body in the collision and shock to her nervous system.

"I am called upon to adjust issues for the trial of the case. The pursuer has proposed the ordinary issue in cases of personal injury, viz, whether on or about Saturday, 18th August 1906, at or near Saltcoats Railway Station, the pursuer while a passenger in a train of the defenders was injured in her person through the fault of the defenders, to her loss, injury, and damage.

"While on the authorities as they at present stand the pursuer is entitled to demand this form of issue, the propriety of granting it has been much canvassed in the profession, and the question has been brought into prominence by the recent serious accident to a North British Railway train at Elliot Junction in the county of Forfar. There have been several actions arising out of that accident, in one of which I myself and in another one of my brethren in the Outer-House had determined to report the point to the Inner-House. But these and other actions arising out of the same accident have been settled with the exception of that at the instance of Black and Others v. North British Railway, in which Lord Guthrie has after mature consideration granted the ordinary issue. That case, however, has been taken to the Inner-House, and will afford an opportunity of reconsidering the question should that Court think it proper to do so.

"In these circumstances I hesitate to adjust an issue, as I may well adopt one of which the Inner-House may be found to disapprove by their judgment in Black's case, and at the same time I think it doubtful whether I have any right to delay adjusting an issue. I therefore report the case to the Inner-House that they may have it before them along with that of Black. I do so the more readily as Black's case is one in which the death of a father occurred, giving rise to an action at the instance of his widow and dependants, while in the present case there was nothing but a personal injury not resulting in death, and the action is directly at the instance of the injured party. The Court will therefore have the matter before them from both points of view.

"I must add that had Black's case not occurred I should have taken the course of reporting this question, because I could not take upon me to disregard a practice founded, as after mentioned, on an Inner-House decision, however I might think that it ought to be altered. Where a matter of practice is a matter upon which parties in their dealings have come to rely and pecuniary interests are affected, though the practice may be a bad one, every Court would hesitate to disturb it. But where, as here, the practice is not one upon which any person has relied to the affecting of patrimonial interest, if the practice is now seen to be wrong, I conceive that the Court will not hesitate to reconsider it, and it is in that view that I should have

Jan. 18, 1908. to the form of the issue if we were not bound by precedent I should be disposed to prefer the form suggested by the defenders—what is the damage Black v. North British Railway Co. —on this ground that I think that in our system of sending a question for the consideration of the jury it is always an advantage if the form of the issue comes as near as possible to the actual question which the jury have to try, first because the form of the issue itself fixes the attention of the jury upon the precise question submitted to them, and also because it may have a restraining effect in preventing the jury from taking into account any extraneous considerations which they might imagine to be covered by an issue of a more general form. But I agree with your Lordship that the practice has been in favour of the issue proposed by the pursuers, and that the advantage of altering the form would not be sufficient to outweigh the general objection to altering forms that are well established.

ventured respectfully to submit it for the reconsideration of the Inner-House. I should have done so because I think the practice to be founded on unsound principle, and liable to be unfair and dangerous in result. The question was first considered in 1845 in the case of Cooley v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., 8 D. 288, where, in a consulted judgment of the two Divisions, it was determined, in an action of assythment and damages by the children of a party killed in a railway accident, that though the defenders admitted the death, and that it was caused by fault, negligence, or want of skill on the part of their employees, for whom they were responsible, and that there was consequent loss, injury, and damage to the pursuers, yet the pursuers were entitled to put all these matters in issue just as if there had been no admission.

"The matter came again before the Court in the case of Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Company, 18 D. 862, when the First Division had come to be entirely differently constituted, and the Court found that they could not distinguish Cooley's case from the one before them, and refused to disturb that judgment. There is, therefore, no indication of whether they approved it in principle or not.

"These two cases have regulated the practice in adjusting such issues down to the present day. But although the form of issue has remained the same, I have very grave doubts whether the principle upon which the majority of the Inner-House in Cooley's case determined it has been allowed, at anyrate for a considerable time, to influence the presiding Judge in admitting evidence and directing the jury. If I am right in this, it is manifest that a false issue has been in use to be presented to juries, the continuance of which ought not to be perpetuated.

"For the principle on which the issue was adopted and must now be defended there is no support but the case of Cooley already referred to. If the opinions in that case be examined it will be found that while there was manifest doubt in the minds of some of the Judges, those who were clearly in favour of the issue as allowed based their judgment entirely upon the principle that in arriving at the measure of damages the degree of negligence is a material matter for the consideration of the jury. With very great respect for the learned Judges who held this opinion, I conceive that principle to be unsound when applied to cases of personal injury. It would justify the same verdict for the loss of a finger under circumstances of gross negligence and for the loss of a hand under circumstances of very slight negligence. I think that the error in adopting it arose from allowing the somewhat scholastic distinction between culpa lata and culpa levis to intrude itself into the consideration of a class of cases to which it is

been read by your Lordship in the chair, and I entirely concur.

Black v.
North British
Railway Co.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur in the judgment delivered by the Lord President, and have little to add.

I think that the degree of negligence or fault in cases of the class presently under consideration ought not to form an element in arriving at the amount of damages. It would be considered wrong that any Judge should direct a jury, who are trying an action of damages in respect of the death of a man killed in a railway accident, to the effect that they should find small damages because the fault which led to the accident was a slight one; and I think it would be equally wrong if, on the other hand, the Judge should direct the jury that because there had been gross negligence on the part of the Railway Company's servants the amount of damages to be awarded ought to be inapposite. It is true that there are cases arising out of contract in which the degree of negligence affects the liability, but that is no justification for maintaining that in these or any other class of cases the degree of negligence is to affect not the liability but the measure of damages. In the case of injury from negligence where no question of contract is concerned, liability depends upon negligence, and where negligence is established liability follows independently of the degree of negligence, and it is not the negligence but the liability to compensate which determines the damages. In such cases Lord Cranworth's dictum in Wilson v. Brett, 1843, 11 M. & W. 113, that 'gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet' holds good, and Lord Willes's further dictum in Lord v. Midland Railway Company, L. R., 2 C. P. 339, that 'any negligence is gross in one who undertakes a duty and fails to perform it,' is equally applicable.

"I think that the judgment in Cooley's case is also open to this criticism, that it is inconsistent with itself. It accepts the position that the jury may not give vindictive damages, and that it is the duty of the presiding Judge so to direct. If by vindictive is meant the satisfaction of the legal analogue of the natural vendetta, the statement may be justified in relation to the principle adopted. But if, as I think it must be, the expression means punitive or exemplary, I do not see how it is possible to avoid giving such damages if the jury are entitled, and if entitled bound, to take into consideration the degree of negligence.

"When I say above that I think the issue has become a false issue, because presiding Judges, or many of them, do not subscribe and give effect to the principle which underlies it, I have the support of Lord Shand and Lord Adam in the case of Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, 16 R. 383, where Lord Shand says, at page 389—'I do not for myself say that I should recommend a jury to make the nature and extent of the company's fault an element in determining the amount of damages to be awarded'; and Lord Adam adds (page 391),—'No doubt the question of fault is laid before the jury, but in my experience a jury is never asked to enlarge or diminish the amount of damages on the ground of the extent of fault on the part of the defender. That has not been, in my experience, the nature of the inquiry in actions of damages for fault or negligence.'

"If Lord Adam is right the customary issue is a false issue. It is liable to hamper the Judge and to mislead the jury. The issue which I should, but for the practice following on Cooley's case, have approved is—It being admitted that on or about 18th August 1906, and at or near Saltcoats Railway Station on the line of the defenders, the pursuer, while travelling in a train belonging to the defenders, was injured in her person through the fault of the defenders or those for whom they are responsible, to her loss,

Jan. 18, 1908. increased. But, while this is my opinion, I do not think it necessary or expedient to change the form of issue which has been found to work well in Black v. North British Railway Co. practice since 1845.

Lord Ardwall. I may be allowed to add that in the course of thirty-five years' practice at the Bar it so happened that I was engaged at first as junior and latterly as senior counsel in a large number of actions of damages for injuries or death caused by alleged fault on the part of the defenders in such actions; in the great majority of these cases I acted for the defenders, and I cannot recall any case where an admission of liability having been made on record, but not in the issue, time was wasted in the leading of unnecessary evidence. The usual course in such trials where the liability was admitted was that the narrative of how the accident occurred—which I think the jury are always entitled to hear so as to enable them to know the circumstances out of which the action arose—was allowed to be taken from one, or, if necessary, more witnesses, and thereafter the Judge stopped all further examination on the matter. If this be recognised as the proper practice, I think the want of an admission in the issue will not lead to any unnecessary prolongation of trials or waste of time in their conduct.

Further, I cannot recall any trial where the Judge, if it was suggested by the pursuer's counsel that the jury should take into consideration, in fixing the amount of damage, the gravity of the fault on the part of the defenders or their servants, did not direct the jury that that was not a matter for them, but that what they had to assess was simply the loss, injury, and damage caused to the pursuer. It may be that the experience of others may have been less fortunate than mine, but if that has been so, and if there has hitherto been any dubiety as to the Judge's duty in this matter, that will be set at rest by the judgment in this case.

Further, I may point out that it is by no means impossible that if a rule such as the defenders contend for regarding admissions being inserted in issues were adopted, it might lead to some undesirable consequences. I may illustrate this from the present case. The issue proposed by the defeninjury, and damage—What is the amount of compensation to which the pursuer is entitled in respect thereof? Damages laid at £1500.

"If the pleas in law are examined it is found, as might be expected, that it is compensation for injury which is the subject of the action, and that what the parties have joined issue about is whether the compensation sued for is reasonable or excessive. These pleas are consistent with the right and the liability that arise out of the circumstances.

"I am not apprehensive that the form of issue which I would adopt would exclude any relevant matter from proof. There are (1) circumstances relating to the position of the individual party injured, as, for instance, occupation and prospects in life; (2) circumstances surrounding the accident to the individual injured—where shock must always be a factor in the consideration it is an essential to know the circumstances surrounding the occasion of the injury to him or her; (3) circumstances surrounding the cause of the occurrence which occasions the injury. To establish liability proof on the last two heads is relevant and necessary. But where liability is admitted proof on the first two is all that is required. And it would be admissible though fault is not formally put in issue. Whereas if it is formally put in issue, I do not see how the presiding Judge can either exclude or restrict proof on the last head."

ders contains an ample admission of fault, but as I read their answers on Jan. 18, 1908, record there is no such admission of fault on record, but only an admission of liability for the purposes of the present action, and I would not approve of an issue consisting of a mere admission to the effect that the defenders admitted liability for the purposes of the action, followed by the bald question of amount of damages, being sent to a jury, and it is possible that if the rule as to admissions proposed by the defenders were adopted there might be frequent disputes and discussions as to the form that the admission should take. In the next place, I think that an issue in the form proposed by the defenders might have the effect of leading to captious objections to the admissibility of evidence which might be led for the legitimate purpose of putting the jury in possession of the facts out of which the action arose, and that the time of the Court and of the jury might thereby be wasted. I prefer that the issue should be kept in the established form, and that the Judge presiding at the trial should, whenever necessary, direct the jury in the manner pointed out in the opinion just delivered by the Lord President.

The Lord President intimated that LORD STORMONTH-DARLING and LORD PEARSON, who were absent at advising, also concurred.

THE COURT adhered.

Entail—Disentail—Consents—Date of Entail—Trust to entail lands—Failure of trustees to carry out trust—Lands in Scotland subsequently entailed in terms of the trust—Option to settle lands either in England or Scotland—Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), secs. 2, 27, 28.—By his testamentary writings a testator bequeathed £150,000 to certain trustees for the purpose of purchasing lands in England or Scotland, and settling them on a certain series of heirs in such terms as would have imported, with regard to lands in Scotland, a strict entail. The testator died in 1840, and the trustees never accepted office or took any steps to carry out the purposes of the trust. In 1866 the general representative of the testator executed a disposition and deed of entail of a Scotch estate that he had purchased at a price exceeding £150,000. The disposition and deed of entail proceeded on the narrative of the trust created by the testator, was in favour of the series of heirs specified therein, and declared that the present deed was executed in fulfilment of that trust. In 1907 the heir of entail in possession of the estate, who was born in 1864, presented a petition to disentail, in which he claimed the right to do so without the consent of the next heir, on the ground that the date of the entail must be taken to be the date of the coming into operation of the trust, viz., the testator's death in 1840.

Held (by a Court of Seven Judges, diss. Lord M'Laren and Lord Pearson) (1) that the entail was an entail in execution of the trust; (2) that although there was an option to settle lands either in England or Scotland, the lands actually settled being lands in Scotland the provisions of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, were applicable; (3) that in virtue of sec. 28

Jan. 18, 1903. of that Act the date of the entail must be taken to be the testator's death, and therefore, in virtue of sec. 2 of the Act, the Earl of Mansfield v. Lord Scone's Tutor. was entitled to disentail without consents; and (4) that could be drawn with regard to the portion of the estate that exceeded £150,000 in value.

Bill Chamber. ON 27th February 1907 Alan David sixth Earl of Mansfield presented a petition to the Court under the Entail Acts 1848 and 1850 for the disentail of the estate of Logiealmond in Perthshire. The circumstances under which the petition was presented were as follows:—

1st DIVISION. with three consulted Judges. Junior Lord Ordinary. On 11th June 1838 William third Earl of Mansfield by a codicil to his testamentary writings, by which codicil he bequeathed to Sir George Clerk, Baronet, William John Cuthbert Ellison, the sum of £150,000 in trust, that the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators or survivor, should, as soon as a proper and convenient purchases could be found, lay out and invest the money in the purchase of hereditaments in England or Scotland, of a clear and free estate or inheritance in fee-simple, either freehold or leasehold, or both, and settle and assure the same or cause the same to be conveyed, settled and assured so and in such manner as they might go along with and be holden and enjoyed by such persons as for the time being should, as heirs-male of the body of the said Earl, be entitled to the peerage, honour and title of Earl of Mansfield of the county of Middlesex, which he then had, and was entitled to, and to be unalienable and inseparable therefrom so far as the law or equity would permit, with certain remainders to be taken care that no son then in esse or issue male then living or to be born so far as the rules of law or equity would permit should have a greater estate or interest in possession in such hereditaments than he held in his life without impeachment of waste, and that proper provisions were inserted in such settlement to trustees for preserving the said remainders thereby to be limited. The codicil further directed Sir George Clerk, William John Law, and Cuthbert Ellison, the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators or such survivor, should invest the money or such part as was then in their hands, and declared that any profits arising from the investments should be added to the capital sum directed to be invested, and that the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds arising therefrom should be paid to the person or persons as would be entitled for the time being to the rents, issues, and profits of the land and hereditaments so to be purchased, in case the same were purchased and settled as aforesaid.

The third Earl died on 18th February 1840.

The trustees nominated in the said codicil never acted, and nor did they at any time take any steps to carry out the trust.

The third Earl was succeeded in the title, and also as executor and general representative, by his son William David sixth Earl. In 1846 the fourth Earl purchased the estate of Logiealmond in Perthshire at the price of £203,000. On 2d February 1847 the fourth Earl executed a disposition and deed of entail of Logiealmond, settling the same on the series of heirs special.

above-mentioned codicil to his father's will. That disposition and deed of entail, after reciting the said codicil, proceeded on the following narrative:—"Considering further that the said William Earl of Mansfield, my father, having died on or about the 18th day of February 1840, and his said last will and testament having been duly proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury on the 28th day of March thereafter, I, as sole executor thereby appointed, proceeded to realise the personal estate of my said deceased father, and in that character acquired and became possessed of funds to an amount exceeding the said sum of £150,000 given and bequeathed by the before-recited codicil to the said Sir George Clerk, William John Law, and Cuthbert Ellison, as trustees for the purchase and settlement of lands and heritages as therein directed, and whereas the said trustees did never accept or act in the execution of the said trust, and I did not pay over to them the said sum of £150,000, but have retained that sum and have been in the enjoyment of the interests and annual proceeds thereof since the time when the same came into my hands, and I am still a debtor to the said trustees therefor; and whereas at the term of Martinmas 1846 I purchased and acquired in fee-simple the lands, baronies, and others hereinafter described and disposed, commonly called the lands and barony of Logiealmond and others, at the price of £203,000, conform to disposition in my favour by James Brown, accountant in Edinburgh, and James Condie, writer in Perth, factors, commissioners, and attornies nominated and appointed by Sir William Drummond Stewart of Grandtully and Logiealmond, Baronet, dated the 15th day of May 1847 and the 3d day of August 1848, and instrument of sasine following thereon, registered in the General Register of Sasines, at Edinburgh, on the 21st day of May 1852, and that I have been in possession of the said lands, baronies, and others, since the said term of Martinmas 1846, but no conveyance thereof in favour of the said trustees, nor deed of settlement or entail, in terms of the said codicil, has yet been executed by me, and now seeing that I am willing and desirous to carry the trust committed to the said Sir George Clerk, William John Law, and Cuthbert Ellison, trustees foresaid by the codicil before narrated, into execution, in so far as the same relates to the application of the said sum of £150,000 in the purchase of lands and heritages to be settled and entailed as aforesaid, by conveying and settling or entailing the said lands, baronies, and others, in manner herein underwritten, and whereas the said Cuthbert Ellison, one of the trustees named in the before-recited codicil, died on the of , and the said Sir George Clerk and William John Law, being now the only surviving trustees, have declined to accept of or act in the said trust, and have devolved the whole purposes of the said trust and of the execution of the same, and of the whole powers and instructions specified and contained in the said codicil, upon me, conform to their declination and devolution of trust, dated the 30th day of July and 3d day of August, both in the year 1863; therefore, in implement of the trust created by the said codicil, I have assigned, disposed, and conveyed, as I by these presents assign, dispose, and convey. . . ."

The petitioner, the sixth Earl, who was born in 1864, succeeded under the destination in that entail to the estate of Logiealmond. The next heir under the entail was his only son, Lord Scone, who was a pupil, being born in 1900.

of the trust in pursuance of which the entail was executed. (1) The trust here was a trust to which sec. 28 applied, and that was not negatived by the circumstance that there was an option to purchase and settle land in England. All that was necessary was that the entail should have been made "in execution of the trust," and this entail was made "in execution of the trust," namely, that part of it which directed the purchase and settlement of land in Scotland. To hold otherwise would be to open the door to evasions of the purpose of the Act,¹ for all that would be necessary to avoid it would be to insert after a direction to entail lands in Scotland the words "or elsewhere." *Black v. Auld*² was a direct authority for this view, for there the option had existed. The *Lord Advocate v. Stewart*³ did not apply, for the trust there had not been executed, and the option to purchase and settle lands in England instead of Scotland could still have been adopted.⁴ (2) The disposition and deed of entail by the fourth Earl was a valid execution of the trust created by the third Earl. There was no doubt that de facto it was a carrying out of the trust purposes, for this estate was worth at least £150,000 and had been entailed on the prescribed series of heirs. The fourth Earl had really acted as a trustee in place of the nominated trustees who had declined to act, and there was no invalidity in that arising out of the doctrine of delectus personarum, for the executors of the original trustees had been included in the nomination. The original trustees could have assumed the fourth Earl as a co-trustee and then resigned, and they had practically done the same thing, though in an unusual manner, by devolving the trust on him. Nor was the question affected by the fact that Logiealmond was said to be worth more than £150,000. There was nothing to shew what the surplus value really was, and in any event if the fourth Earl chose to give it as an equivalent for the £150,000 he was entitled to do so.

Argued for Lord Scone's tutor ad litem;—(1) The option to purchase lands in England prevented sec. 28 of the Act of 1848 from applying here, for that Act only applied to Scotland, and so that section could only apply to a trust fund indefeasibly dedicated to the purchase and entailing of land in Scotland. That had been settled in Lord Advocate v. Stewart,⁵ where the distinction between money which must be entailed and money which may be entailed was clearly pointed out. *Black v. Auld*² was not an authority to the contrary, for the point had not been raised there, and the decision could not have been as it was if that point had been taken. Further, the expression "such money" in sec. 28 referred back to the definition of it in sec. 27, and was incomplete without it, and therefore, unless the definition in sec. 27 applied to the fund in question here, sec. 28 could not come into effect. But sec. 27 could have no application at all to this fund, for there never could be under this trust anyone who would be in a position to present a petition under that section. There never could be any nominal "heir in possession" until the option had been exercised by entailing land in Scotland, and as soon as that was done the opportunity for presenting a peti-

LORD PRESIDENT.—William third Earl of Mansfield died i of his testamentary writings consisted of a codicil by which of £150,000 to trustees whom he named. The trust purp phraseology used is technical and appropriate to English con it may be taken, in accordance with the decision of the Hou Studd's case,¹ that, had the trustees bought land in Scotlan have appropriately complied with the direction by executing of strict entail.

William third Earl was succeeded in the title by his son W fourth Earl, who was also his general representative. The sion greatly exceeded £150,000. The trustees named in the accept office, and nothing was done. So matters stood till 1 year the fourth Earl of Mansfield executed a deed of entail o Logiealmond, which he at that time held in fee-simple, havin for a sum exceeding £150,000. The narrative of that follows:—(His Lordship read the narrative, quoted supra).

By this time the state of the family was that the fourt only son, Lord Stormont, who had three sons, of whom the t in 1864, is the present and sixth Earl. As such he has su the destination in the said entail, and he presents this petitio the said estate. His only son Lord Scone, born in 1900, is a apparent under the entail. The point, therefore, to be decie the date of the entail. If the date is the date of the execu then, as the petitioner was born before that date, he can on having his son's consent valued and dispensed with; but the entail is the date when the trust-deed first came into o 1840, then the petitioner being born after 1st August 1848 without consents.

as follows :—" And be it enacted, that for the purposes of this Act the date Jan. 18, 1908. at which the Act of Parliament, deed, or writing placing such money or other property under trust, or directing such land to be entailed, first came into operation, shall be held to be the date at which the land should have been entailed in terms of the trust, and shall also be held to be the date of any entail to be made hereafter in execution of the trust, whatever be the actual date of such entail." The expression "such money . . . such land" refers us back to the 27th section, the opening words of which are :—" Where any money . . . has been or shall be invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed, or where any land is or shall be directed to be entailed, but the direction has not been carried into effect," &c.

Mansfield v.

Ld. President.

The first objection that is made to the petition is that in this case the entail was not made in execution of any trust. I do not think this view is correct. It is true that the actual trustees did not accept and proceed to entail. But what was the position in 1866? The fourth Earl was still debtor in the sum of £150,000. It seems to me that at any time from 1840 till the expiry of the period of the long prescription the machinery of the trust could have been reconstituted, the fourth Earl, or his representatives if he had died, been made to pay the £150,000, and the lands been bought and the deed executed. If, then, the fourth Earl, knowing all this, chose as he did to execute the entail himself, he being proprietor of the land to be entailed, and the value being admittedly over £150,000, I do not think that the transaction altered its quality because of that fact. Suppose the trustees had accepted, been paid the £150,000, and bought land of a third party. It would have been a perfectly competent form of conveyancing to execute the entail in the form of a disposition and deed of entail by that third party, leaving out altogether any conveyance to the trustees. That being so, can it be said to alter the matter because Lord Mansfield, the debtor in the £150,000, does the whole thing himself without going through the form of going to the Court to appoint trustees who would then merely ask him to execute precisely the deed which he did execute. And, further, that Lord Mansfield thought that the entail was being made in execution of the trust is clearly shewn by the narrative of the deed itself. Another test is this, if the entail is not in execution of the trust-deed, then up till 1880 the trust-deed could still have been made available. Suppose the trustees, if alive, had tardily accepted, or if new trustees had been appointed by the Court, could they after 1866 have sued Lord Mansfield for £150,000? Surely the execution of the entail would inevitably have furnished a sufficient defence.

The second argument for the respondent raises a more general point. They call attention to the fact that the expression "the trust" in section 28 refers you back to section 27, and they say that "in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed" must necessarily mean Scotch land, for that alone can be "entailed"; and that, inasmuch as this trust permitted of the purchase of English land, it cannot be a trust of the kind contemplated; and they rely on the case of The Lord Advocate v. Stewart.¹

Jan. 18, 1908. So far as decision goes this case seems ruled in terms by Earl of Mansfield v. Lord Scone's Tutor. Black v. Auld.¹ A reference to the report will shew that in that case there was an option to buy either English or Scotch land.
 But we must face the fact that, first, this point does not seem argued; and, second, the judgment of the House of Lords in *Advocate v. Stewart*² had not yet been pronounced. I am of opinion that *Black v. Auld*¹ was rightly decided, and that it there laid down rule in this case.

The question in *The Lord Advocate v. Stewart*² was whether in trust did or did not answer the description of "entailed Finance Act, and was or was not liable to settlement-duty. Now as money is not land, it could only become "entailed land" by statutory definition. The House of Lords held that what was destined by trust purpose for the purchase of land to be entailed land or not—as to which there was a difference of opinion the Judges of the Court of Session and certain of the noble Lords—that could never be predicated of money which under the trust might never purchase lands which could be entailed, but purchase lands in a country other than Scotland to be settled in forms than those of Scottish entail; and, in accordance with the limitation of all taxing statutes, unless the property was specified under the tax, it must go free.

But the question here is what is the date of the entail for the requirements of the Entail Statutes, and I think that section entails as it finds them and fixes an artificial date. And what *Black's case*¹ comes in as an authority is not because it is an example of a trust-deed where land other than Scotch might be bought (for as I said that point was not argued), but because in the entail once having been made, in a case where antecedent have been truly said that there was no certainty that the entail be made. In *Black's case*¹ the entail was not to be made until Black reached at least the age of twenty-five; it was to be made was thirty. Antecedently, therefore, it was not certain till Captain became twenty-five that the entail ever would be made. Never time having come when it ought to have been made—i.e., Captain having passed the age of thirty—it was held that the date was the trust-deed and not the date when Captain Black became twenty-five or thirty. I refer especially to the remarks of Lord Pres. which are too long to quote in full, but which shew clearly the difficulties of the situation were present to his mind. I quote his conclusion³:—"The words in the section which probably greatest difficulty are those which enact that that date shall be the date at which the lands should have been entailed in terms of the deed; and it does seem a little startling at first sight that what to the directions of the truster, it is not possible that lands should been entailed in terms of the trust for a long period after the trust came into operation as a trust-deed, yet still that the date of the

is to be held to be the date at which the lands ought to have been entailed. Jan. 18, 1908. It seems as if in a case like this it was a provision of the statute that the direct contrary of what the truster provided shall be carried into effect. But that is really not so, because it is a mere artificial date that is here created, and created for a special purpose—for the purpose of securing the full and effectual operation of the disentailing clauses of the statute. And it was a provision of a very necessary kind, because if this clause were to be read otherwise, a man might succeed by means of trust directions in keeping up the money or the land for so long a period before it was actually entailed, that there should be parties in the enjoyment of the money or the land substantially under all the restrictions and fetters of an entail, although the entail has not been executed down to a very late period, it may be for two or three generations. The consequence of that, in regard to such a trust-deed, would be to defeat the leading object of the statute, and to enable a truster to bind a succession of persons not born at the date of his trust-deed. Now, that, I think, is a conclusive argument against the construction of the 28th section contended for by the respondents; and upon that ground I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor."

Mansfield v.
Lord Seone's Tutor. .
Ld. President.

Upon that I make two remarks. First, that in one sense *Black's case*¹ was a fortiori so far as difficulty was concerned, because while there was impossibility during the period up to the vesting of the entail to be executed, here there is only uncertainty; and, second, that so far as defeating the statute is in the truster's mind, it would indeed be an easy way to defeat it by inserting a power in a trust-deed to make it optional to buy foreign land. Put in its simplest form my opinion comes to this, that section 28 applies to all entails as it finds them; and that if an entail has been de facto made in virtue of the directions of a trust, then section 28 settles the date as the date of the trust first coming into operation, even although there may have been contingencies which, if they had operated, would have prevented an entail ever being executed at all.

Last of all, the respondents argue that in so far as the estate of Logiealmond exceeds £150,000 in value, it must be held to be entailed for the first time in 1866. I do not think we can inquire into that matter. It seems to me that by the narrative of the deed the fourth Earl was content, so to speak, to give up Logiealmond as in exchange for the discharge of his debt of £150,000; and that we cannot go into the question of the exact value as at that date.

I am, therefore, for granting the prayer of the petition.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am afraid I am unable to concur with the majority of the Court in this case. The case has been reported by the Lord Ordinary to this Division of the Court on the question whether the petitioner, the Earl of Mansfield, is entitled to disentail the estate of Logiealmond without consents, or whether he is in the position of being unable to disentail without the consent of the nearest heir, in which case, as the nearest heir is a pupil, the required consent can only be given by his tutor ad litem, Jan. 18, 1908. after the value of his interest has been fixed and provided for.

 Earl of tion again depends on the date, actual or constructive, of the Mansfield v. which the lands are held. The estate is held under a dispositi Lord Soane's of entail made by William David fourth Earl of Mansfield, Tutor. 2d February 1866, and registered in the Register of Entails 16 Lord M'Laren. If the date of the deed of entail (1866) is to be taken as the date of the entail, then the petitioner, who was born on 25th C is not in a position to disentail without consent. But the t petition is that the deed of entail was executed in fulfilment o stituted by the testamentary writings of William third Earl, the year 1840, which we were asked to hold to be the date o
 If it is so determined, Lord Mansfield would be entitled to estate without his son's consent, because he was born after

The question arises in this way: By a codicil to the last third Earl, the testator gave and bequeathed to three trustees (w accept the trust) the sum of £150,000, in trust, to lay out and sum of money in the purchase of lands and estate in England and to cause the same to be settled and assured so as to be enjoyed by such person or persons as, for the time being, should to the peerage, honour, and title of Earl of Mansfield. The scribed certain further limitations which it is not necessary to directed that the annual proceeds of the invested money should the persons who would be entitled to the rents of the lands to b in case the same had been purchased and settled as aforesaid.

The testator made another codicil, dated 11th June 1838; I stand that, in the events which have happened, this codicil d upon the question under consideration.

It appears from the narrative clause of the deed of entail the grantor, the fourth Earl, was his father's sole executor, and character he had acquired and become possessed of funds to exceeding the prescribed sum of £150,000; that, as the enta
 "the trustees did never accept or act in the execution of the s I did not pay over to them the said sum of £150,000, but I that sum and have been in the enjoyment of the interests and ceeds thereof since the time when the same came into my hand still a debtor to the said trustees therefor." It is then narr 1846 Lord Mansfield had purchased Logiealmond at the price and that he was desirous to carry the trust into execution b and settling or entailing this estate in manner underwritten. H assigned and disposed Logiealmond in terms of his father's t tion, and under the fetters of a strict entail.

The determination of the date of the entail for the pur Entail Amendment Act (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36), depends on but the 27th section has also to be considered. The effective ing to the 28th section, is "the date at which the Act of Parli or writing, placing such money or other property under trust such land to be entailed, first came into operation." The part which bears on the construction is the introductory expression, money or other property, real or personal, has been or shall be invested in Jan. 18, 1908. trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed"; in the case there defined the party who would be the heir in possession of the lands may get payment of the money in question under the same conditions as would apply to the acquisition of lands in fee-simple.

As affecting the legal date of the entail under consideration three questions arise—(1) Considering that under the codicil which directed the settlement of landed estate, the trustees had an option to purchase lands either in England or in Scotland, can it be held that a trust for the execution of a Scottish entail came into operation until an election was made as between English and Scottish estate? (2) Can it be held that there was in any true sense an investment in trust for the purposes of the codicil until the estate of Logiealmond was settled by a deed of entail? (3) If these questions are answered in favour of the petitioner, is not 1866 the true as well as the actual date of the settlement as regards the excess of the value of the lands over £150,000?

On the first question my opinion is that it ought to be answered in the negative. The hypothesis of the 28th section is that there is a deed or writing placing money under trust, and by referring back to the 27th section we see that the trust in contemplation is a trust "for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed." No other species of trust are contemplated except a trust of purchase money, or a trust of lands to be entailed. I think it is also clear that the entail considered in section 28 is an entail of Scottish estate, because the provisions of the statute have exclusive reference to Scotland. On this hypothesis the 28th section provides that the date when the deed or writing "first came into operation" shall be held to be the date of any entail to be made thereafter in execution of the trust. Now, to put the case most favourably for the argument of the petitioner, let it be supposed that Lord Mansfield's trustees had accepted the trust, that the money had been paid over to them, and that in the year 1866 the entail of Logiealmond was executed by the trustees. At any time before 1866 it would have been open to the trustees to purchase and settle a landed estate in England, and I do not see how in the case supposed the codicil could be said to have come into operation as a trust for the purchase and entailing of lands in Scotland until the trustees had made their election. At most it was only a power or an alternative direction. But then the alternative direction only comes into operation as a Scottish trust, when the trustees have elected between the two members of the alternative. This brings the case within the principle of the case of Lord Advocate v. Stewart (Sprot's Trustee),¹ where it was held by the House of Lords that an alternative direction of this nature did not bring the money into the category of "entailed estate." The fact that the second alternative is the purchase and settlement of lands in England does not seem to be very material to the question. The case would be just the same if the alternative had been to establish a picture gallery or to make provisions for the family of the heir. Again, I think that it makes no difference in this question that the money was never paid to trustees. The fourth Lord

Jan. 18, 1908. Mansfield took it upon himself to administer the trust, and his action has been accepted. But if it is granted that he was a viceroy, then he had an election as between English and Scottish law. If he was not a trustee, then the entail is his own act, and the date of the deed is the date of the entail.

Lord M'Laren. It is necessary, however, to attend to the principle of the decision in Black v. Auld,¹ because there the testator had directed an entail, which could not come into operation so as to confer a benefit on any person until the institute of entail (the testator's second son) had attained the age of five, and yet it was held that the date of the testator's death was the date when the trust first came into operation. This is a decision of seven Judges, and the leading opinion, that of Lord President Inglis, proceeds largely on the policy of the Entail Amendment Act, and the motive of the 27th and subsequent sections, which was to put an end to the enactments restricting the duration of entails by the insertion of trusts, liferents in succession, or other limitations in perpetuity. Then I think the determining element in *Black v. Auld*¹ was that at the death of the testator it was irrevocably fixed that there was to be an entail, if there were heirs to take, though the benefit to be conferred by the institute was postponed. As it happened, the institute was then in existence taking benefit under the trust, and he was thus enabled successfully to claim the fund, but that circumstance was not allowed to affect the construction of the Act of Parliament, and the entail was held to come into operation when according to the conception of the testator there was an unqualified, though postponed, trust purpose for constituting an entail. In the present case there was not an unqualified purpose of constituting the entailing of land in Scotland, and while it is easily seen that in the case of alternative directions the duration of a proposed entail may be postponed to an extent somewhat exceeding the contemplation of the Entail Amendment Act, yet, if this result follows, it is only because the Act has not explicitly dealt with this particular mode of prolonging an entail. The statutory provisions are altogether within the domain of positive law, and I do not think we can be guided by analogy or can hold that a trust purpose had come into operation at a time when consistently with the wishes his money might have been diverted into a different investment.

If my opinion is well founded, the date of the entail is the date of the death of the testator. The petitioner will be under the necessity of purchasing the consent of the heir. But it is proper that I should also answer the other question which may arise. On the second of these questions, and reading the 27th and 28th sections together, I think the 28th section presupposes that the land was invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed. The words I am quoting are in the 27th section, but I think that in the construction they must be read into the 28th, because the 28th section is to some extent of the nature of a proviso to the 27th, and does not repeat in words at length all the conditions of the cases with which the 27th deals. Now, in the present case, there never was any specific invest-for the purpose of providing an entailed estate in favour of the Earls of Jan. 18, 1908. Mansfield in their order. On the declinature of the appointed trustees it would have been open to any of the prospective heirs of entail to have the trust constituted by the appointment of new trustees or a judicial factor. Or again, the fourth Lord Mansfield might have voluntarily put the sum of £150,000 beyond his control so as to impress it with a trust for the purposes of the codicil. But neither of these things was done, and until the year 1866 the money, or its equivalent in land, remained subject to the order and disposition of Lord Mansfield. I consider, therefore, that there was no effective trust in the sense of the statute during the period antecedent to 1866.

Mansfield v.
Lord Scone's
Tutor.
Lord M'Laren.

On the third of the questions I have stated, I think it is perfectly clear that in so far as the value of the estate of Logiealmond exceeded the sum of £150,000 plus any profits derived from investments of that sum before the purchase, the surplus value of the entailed estate must be taken to be property settled by the fourth Lord Mansfield. To the extent of such surplus value the entail is not an instrument in execution of any antecedent trust, and in any view of the case this value would not be acquired in fee-simple by the present Earl except on the basis of the consent of the next heir.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with the Lord President. The question really is whether the petitioner holds the estate of Logiealmond under an entail executed in terms of a trust for the purchase of land to be entailed. If he does, then, upon the plain terms of the 27th and 28th sections taken together, the date of the entail under which he holds must be the date of the deed which put the money in trust. It is beyond all question that the third Earl by his will, which came into force in 1840, did put a sum of £150,000 in trust in order that it might be applied either in the purchase of land in Scotland to be entailed according to the law of Scotland, or else in the purchase of land in England to be entailed on the same series of people according to the law of that country; and it is beyond question that the deed upon which the present Earl holds purports in terms to be executed by the fourth Earl in performance of the trust created by his father's will. If that is a true recital, then the question is plainly answered in favour of the present Earl.

But then it is said that that is not a correct recital, and that in truth the estate of Logiealmond was not entailed in execution of any trust, but for some other cause, which I understand to be the mere will and pleasure of the fourth Earl to settle his own estate upon a series of heirs of his own selection. There are two points taken by the respondent in support of his contention. In the first place, it is said that the trust undoubtedly created by the third Earl's will never came into operation. The trustees declined to act, nothing was done in execution of the trust, and the fourth Earl, who made the deed of entail, was not acting in the execution of a trust, because, although he was the heir and executor of the truster, no trust had been committed to him. It is quite true that the trustees declined to accept, but then it is elementary and fundamental that the failure of trustees to accept does not affect the beneficial interest of the objects of the Chancellor, I think, puts it quite clearly that nobody can call money entailed Jan. 18, 1908. estate except by the application of some interpretation clause in the Finance Act which the House of Lords was then considering. But apart from verbal criticism I think it clear enough upon the authority of the Lord Advocate v. Stewart,¹ and for my own part I should say that it was clear upon the plain construction of the statute, even if we had no authority to guide us, that so long as money remains, subject to a discretion vested in trustees to buy land in Scotland or to buy land in England, it cannot be treated as if it were already converted into entailed land in Scotland, so as to support a demand for immediate payment under the 27th section of the Entail Act, because such a claim would be completely defeated by a resolution of the trustees to buy land in England. So long then as the destination of the money is in suspense, the right given to a future heir of entail by the 27th section cannot be put in force. I think this follows from the judgment of the House of Lords in the Lord Advocate v. Stewart.¹ But the moment the suspense is determined by the purchase of land and the execution of a deed of entail it is ascertained at the same time that land has been purchased and entailed in the due performance of a trust. It is nothing to the purpose that an alternative course might have been followed. The trustees have none the less executed a trust by which money was put into their hands for the purchase and entail of land in Scotland. If this be so, the fact that during the interval while the final destination of the money was uncertain, the person who ultimately became heir of entail could not require immediate payment to himself, does not create the slightest difficulty to my mind in referring the terms of the 28th section to the terms of the 27th section for the mere purpose of ascertaining what is meant by "the deed placing such money under trust." Any difficulty which might have arisen in the construction of the 28th section itself is removed by the decision in Black v. Auld,² which I agree with the Lord President is directly in point. It must be kept in view that the artificial date which is created by the 28th section is not the date of the performance of the particular trust. It is the date when the deed itself comes to be operative, and therefore there can be no difficulty in the application of that enactment owing to any lapse of time, or any contingency which might postpone the specific performance of the trust to buy and entail land. It is just because such purchase and entail may be indefinitely postponed that the statute creates an artificial date for determining the conditions of disentail. The date to which the statute refers is the date when the deed came into operation, and I apprehend that the deed comes into operation, when it is a testamentary deed, on the death of the testator, and that nothing which happens afterwards can alter that condition of things.

I cannot say that I think much difficulty arises from the phrase "the date at which the land should have been entailed in terms of the trust." I do not say that I have no difficulty in fixing the exact meaning of that phrase. But I take it to be clear that it does not refer to any date at which it can be found that the trustees ought in fact, and in the due execution of their duty, to have made a deed of entail, because that time never can by any

Jan. 18, 1908. possibility coincide with the date when the deed creating into operation. There must always in the nature of things be time, less or more, between the coming into force of a trust time when the trustees proceed to carry out their trust, and obvious that the contingency for which the enactment provides an undue delay by trustees to perform their duty, but also postponement contemplated by the trustor himself. The of the words seems to be that we are to assume that instead land or his money in trust for the purpose of an entail, the have made the entail himself. But any practical difficulty removed by the subsequent part of the clause, which really of more than one construction, and it is that the date of coming into operation shall be held to be the date of any entail hereafter in execution of the trust, whatever be the actual entail. The true answer to all the criticisms which have been the 28th section seems to me to be that of Lord President statute for its own purposes has imposed an artificial date upon of a certain class, and it is of no consequence that this artificial not square with the facts which have determined the actual particular deed of entail. I therefore agree with your Lordships that the petition must be granted.

WILLIAM SMITH, Defender (Appellant).—Lip.

Bankruptcy—Notour Bankruptcy—Constitution of notour where imprisonment for debt incompetent—Expired charges expenses—Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 39) sec. 1—Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 21) sec. 1. The Debtors Act of 1880 by sec. 4 enacted that no person should be imprisoned on account of any civil debt (excepting taxes, rates, and tithes), and by sec. 6 enacted that "in any case in which the provisions of this Act imprisonment is rendered incompetent by bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with imprisonment on account of debt." The petition was granted on the charge without payment.

Held that sec. 6 of the Debtors Act, 1880, applied to imprisonment under that Act incompetent, even though the imprisonment was incompetent under a previous Act.

Black v. Watson, Nov. 29, 1881, 9 R. 167, commented on and explained. Jan. 18, 1908.

Observed that sec. 1 of the Small-Debt Act, 1835, which enacted that it should not be lawful to imprison any person on account of any civil debt which shall not exceed the sum of £8, 6s. 8d., "exclusive of interest and expenses thereon," had not the effect of rendering imprisonment incompetent in the case of a debt of £40, although that debt consisted of expenses only, where the expenses had been awarded in an action in which the principal sum decerned for exceeded £8, 6s. 8d.

On 9th May 1906 Marion Harvie, of Little Auchengree, Ayrshire, obtained decree in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Kilmarnock against her tenant, William Smith, farmer, Little Auchengree, in which the Sheriff decerned in her favour for (1) the sum of £12, (2) the sum of £35, and also for the sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses. On 19th July 1906 the said William Smith was charged at the instance of the said Marion Harvie for payment of the sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses contained in the foresaid decree.

The days of charge having expired without payment, Marion Harvie presented a petition for cessio against William Smith in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Kilmarnock. In the petition the petitioner referred to the foresaid charge and averred:—"The said charge has expired without payment having been made, and the defender is notour bankrupt."

A caveat having been lodged by the defender, the Sheriff-substitute (D. J. Mackenzie) heard parties thereon, and on 5th August 1907 pronounced an interlocutor holding that there was prima facie evidence of the notour bankruptcy of the defender, and on 2d September 1907 granted decree of cessio as craved.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Brand), who adhered, and the defender appealed to the Court of Session. The case was heard before the First Division on 18th January 1908.

Argued for the appellant;—The petition for cessio should have been dismissed, as the appellant had not been legally rendered notour bankrupt. The charge which had been delivered here was for a sum of expenses only, and not for any principal sum, and that being so, it could not be maintained that the debt to which the expenses were attached exceeded £8, 6s. 8d. On the face of the proceedings there was no principal debt due at all, much less a debt exceeding £8, 6s. 8d. The claim for expenses, therefore, fell under the provisions of the Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1835,* being a claim for expenses on a sum of less than £8, 6s. 8d., and therefore it could not be enforced by imprisonment. The Small-Debt Act of 1835,* though now repealed, was still in force at the date of the Debtors Act, 1880,†

* The Small-Debt (Scotland) Act, 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 70) [since repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 67)] provided, by sec. 1, that it shall not be lawful to imprison any person "on account of any civil debt which shall not exceed the sum of £8, 6s. 8d., exclusive of interest and expenses thereon. . . ."

† The Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 34), which abolished imprisonment for debt, except in certain specified cases, enacts, sec. 6,—“In any case in which, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is rendered incompetent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with a duly executed charge for payment followed by the expiry of the days of charge without payment, or where a charge is not necessary or not competent, by insolvency concurring with an extracted decree for payment followed by the lapse of the days intervening prior to and therefore imprisonment for this claim could not be rendered incompetent by the Act of 1880, as it was incompetent at the date of that Act. The provisions of the Act of 1880 were therefore not applicable here,¹ and the only method of making the appellant notour bankrupt was by following the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act of 1856,² which had not been amended. Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point which we have to decide is one, namely, whether there was here good evidence of notour bankruptcy on which a petition for cessio might be granted.

Now, the evidence of notour bankruptcy on which the petition was granted was an expired charge for a sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses which the defender was charged to pay under an extract of a decree in foro. On comparing the decree with the execution of it, it appears that the sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses is the amount contained in the decree.

The point raised by the appellants is that the provisions of section 6 of the Debtors Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 34), which rendered imprisonment incompetent, applied to this case. The heading of that section is "New Mode of constituting notour bankruptcy," and the section says,—“In any case in which, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is rendered incompetent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with a charge for payment, followed by expiry of the days of charge without payment, or where a charge is not necessary or not competent, by insolvency concurring with an extracted decree for payment followed by the days intervening prior to execution without payment having been made.” And then the section proceeds,—“Nothing in this section contained shall affect the provisions of section seven of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856.”²

The appellant says that the section I have just read is not applicable to this case, because this is not a case in which imprisonment by its provisions was rendered incompetent, inasmuch as imprisonment was already incompetent at the date of the Act of 1880. In other words, he seeks to put a gloss on the expression “rendered incompetent” to the effect that it really means “rendered for the first time incompetent.” I do not think the appellant has any right to put such a gloss on these words. There were other ways of constituting notour bankruptcy than imprisonment, and the case of *Black v. Watson*¹ cited by the Lord President really points to that, though Mr Lippe's argument at first sight is supported by the form of expression used by the Lord President in his judgment in that case that the 6th section of the Act of 1880 provides, not for the first time, that previous to that Act imprisonment was incompetent but to the effect that previous to that Act imprisonment was rendered incompetent, by the provisions of that Act itself. That form of expression, however, is not applicable to the case at hand.

went, I think, beyond the requirements of the case. The point really decided by the case was that the grounds of constituting notour bankruptcy detailed in the Act of 1856 stand on their own basis apart from the Act of 1880. But when imprisonment for debt was abolished practically in toto, it became necessary to provide a new method of constituting notour bankruptcy in those cases in which under the old law imprisonment was required, but it was not necessary to interfere with the other methods of constituting notour bankruptcy, which still stand. Accordingly I do not think the appellant has any right to put on the words of the 6th section the gloss he proposes. The Act applies to all cases in which by its provisions imprisonment is incompetent. The matter can be very well tested by supposing that the respondent had attempted to imprison the appellant. I think in that case he would at once have been met by the Act of 1880.

Apart from that, however, it is necessary that for the argument of the appellant he could have been met by the Act of 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70, also, which provides that imprisonment shall not be competent in respect of debts less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d., exclusive of interest and expenses. That is, it says that such debts shall not be swollen by interest and expenses. Now, the objection here is that the sum charged for consists solely of expenses. But if we look at the decree here we see that the principal sums decreed for were each of them greater than £8, 6s. 8d. It is no answer for the appellant to say that you can only find that out by looking at the decree. It is for the person objecting to the notour bankruptcy to shew that it was wrongly constituted on the ground that the principal sum to which the expenses related was a sum less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d. He cannot shew that here, and I am therefore of opinion that on both grounds the appellant has failed.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is not surprising that the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 does not make provision for rendering a person notour bankrupt under a decree for expenses of a small-debt action, for sequestration under that statute could only proceed on the application of a creditor whose debt amounted to not less than £50—or in the case of more than one creditor to £70 or £100, as the case might be—and it was not to be expected that the expenses of a small-debt action would amount to such a sum. Accordingly, when imprisonment for debt was abolished by the Debtors Act of 1880—except in the case of alimentary debts and debts due to the Crown—it became necessary to have some mode of constituting notour bankruptcy in cases where under the older law diligence by imprisonment was competent.

Now, the appellant contends that the provisions of the 6th section of the Debtors Act regarding the constitution of notour bankruptcy in such cases do not apply, inasmuch as imprisonment was not, in the present circumstances, rendered incompetent by that enactment. I do not think it is a good objection to the applicability of the Debtors Act to say that it did not for the first time render imprisonment incompetent in cases where at the date of the Act it was already incompetent under the prior Act of 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70). The two Acts are to be read concurrently.

I also agree with your Lordship in thinking that no question under 5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 70, arises, for if you suspend a charge, or bring an action

Jan. 18, 1908. to enforce payment of a debt, we are always entitled to look on which the decree is founded. Doing so here, one sees Harvie v. principal sums in the decree are each of them greater than Smith. viz., £12 and £35, and it has not been shewn that the sum Lord M'Laren. of modified expenses is a sum of the nature described in the Will. IV. c. 70.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The Act of 1880 provides that, with certain exceptions, “no person at the commencement of this Act, be apprehended or imprisoned for any civil debt.” There is no question that the appellant is entitled to the benefit of that general enactment. Then it goes on to say, in effect, that where, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is competent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by certain proceedings and procedure which do not involve imprisonment. I think that procedure applies to cases where a debtor might have escaped imprisonment even if the Act of 1880 had not been passed. The intention was to provide a new method for creating notour bankruptcy in place of the method which the Act had abolished; and if the debt is one within the provisions of the Act, cannot be enforced by imprisonment, then for bringing about notour bankruptcy in a different way will avail nothing, and the debtor may be protected from imprisonment by an earlier enactment than as by the Act of 1880.

I am not satisfied, however, that the appellant's construction of the Act of 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70) is correct. What is there said is that imprisonment shall not be competent in respect of debts of less amount than £8, 6s. 8d., “exclusive of interest and expenses.” This is not a general enactment that no person is to be imprisoned for a debt consisting merely of interest or expenses. What the statute does say is that there is to be no imprisonment for any lesser sum than £8, 6s. 8d. Debts of a smaller amount shall not be brought up to the statutory sum by adding interest or expenses to the principal. If the debt amounting to more than that sum I see nothing to prevent the creditor recovering the principal, interest and expenses, in any way known to the law at that time. I am not satisfied therefore that the charge in question for £40, 3s. 6d. is outside the scope of the Act 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 70. But that is merely a technical question, for whether the debtor would have been protected by the Act or not, it is certain that he is protected by the Act of 1880. The Act prevents his being imprisoned for the debt in question, and therefore he cannot be made notour bankrupt by such imprisonment.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), Schedule I., sec. 1—“Where death results from the injury”—Suicide of workman who had become insane in consequence of accident.—The widow of a workman, John Malone, who had committed suicide, brought a claim against his employers for compensation for his death. She averred:—The deceased, who had already lost the sight of his left eye in the course of his employment, received an injury to his right eye by a splinter of iron penetrating it. As a result of the injury the sight of that eye began to fail, and eventually he became almost blind. “Owing to the gradual loss of sight in his right eye and consequent blindness, the said John Malone's mind became affected and he became insane, and on 20th August 1907 he committed suicide in his house at 401 Rutherglen Road. The death of the said John Malone was due to the foresaid accident.”

The arbiter having dismissed the claim as irrelevant, the Court recalled his determination and remitted to him to allow a proof.

MRS MARY ANN MULLEN OR MALONE, widow of John Malone, 1st Division, hammerman, residing at Rutherglen Road, Glasgow, having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, against Cayzer, Irvine, & Company, shipowners, Glasgow, for the death of her husband, the matter was referred to the arbitration of one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow (Davidson), who dismissed the application as irrelevant, and at the request of the claimant stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the claimant had made, inter alia, the following averments:—“(2) On or about 25th May 1907, and for some months prior thereto, the said deceased John Malone was in the employment of the respondents at their said repairing shop in Finnieston Street as a hammerman. About twenty years before the date of said accident the said deceased John Malone had met with an accident which caused him to lose the sight of his left eye, and when he was injured on 25th May 1907 the sight of his right eye immediately began to fail, and became gradually worse until he was rendered almost blind. re lost the sight of his other eye, and the injury was such his remaining eye, according to the averments, immediately and became gradually worse until he was rendered almost continues the claimant—I now read textually,—“In consequence of the injury, the said John Malone received a severe shock, and he became completely broke down. Owing to the gradual loss of sight and consequent blindness, the said John Malone’s health was affected and he became insane, and on 20th August 1907 he died in his house at 401 Rutherglen Road. The death of the said John Malone was due to the foresaid accident, which arose out of and in connection with his employment with the respondents.”

That statement of the facts the learned Sheriff-substitute, in this case came as arbiter, dismissed the application as irrelevant. The claimant has appealed to your Lordships, and the motion before your Lordships is to send the case back to the Sheriff and tell him to allow a proof of the facts which I have read. Of course there can be no question, if the accident having actually happened,—that is to say, the injury to his eye, but what happened afterwards is evidently a question on which there may be controversy.

The rule in the statute is that the death must be the result of the injury. The views which I hold have been so extremely well expressed by Lord Collins, when he was Master of the Rolls, that I prefer to follow his lead and has said rather than try to re-express them myself. The case which I am going to cite is taken from the case of Dunham v. Clare.¹ The facts in that case was that a man was carrying some heavy goods which slipped and fell on his foot, inflicting a wound in his foot which he took into an hospital, and a disease called phlegmonous erysipelas. The evidence was that erysipelas of this description was the consequence of a wound of the kind, and that, according to the medical authorities at present obtains, was caused by the introduction somehow of a germ. Lord Collins says this—“The applicant for damages, therefore, has to shew an accident causing injury, and death resulting from the injury. In the present case there was an accident causing injury, and the only question is whether death resulted from the injury. If death in fact resulted from the injury, it is irrelevant to say that death was not the natural or probable consequence of the injury. The question whether death resulted from the injury is a question which involves an inquiry into the chain of causation. If the chain of causation is broken by a novus actus interveniens, so that the old cause goes and is substituted for it, that is a new act which gives a fresh set of consequences. In dealing with an obligation created by contract, or in dealing with a case of contract or tort or with a liability in tort. In the case of contract, a person who commits a breach of contract is liable for the consequences which naturally follow from the breach. In cases of tort, when the question arises whether a person is liable for a breach of some duty imposed upon him, he probably, and certainly, comes under a somewhat larger liability than

Jan. 29, 1908. would be the case if it were a breach of contract, but still measured by what are the reasonable and probable consequences of a breach of duty. That lets in the consideration of reasonableness. The question of reasonableness comes into the present discussion.

Malone v. Cayzer, Irvine, & Co.
Ld. President. imposed the liability irrespective of any error of judgment on the part of the employer. The only question to be considered is whether death or incapacity in fact result from the injury? That is, in my opinion, and, if that is so, I think that the Sheriff-substitute is quick here in dismissing this case as irrelevant upon the face of the pleadings.

I do not think I ought to say much more, except to explain that I am very far from saying that upon the face of this pleading there is no case made out, because the question is whether causation is proved or not, and it may be a somewhat uphill matter for the claimant to make out a case. I should like to say that she will have to do something more than say simply that there was a possibility of death arising from the injury in such a way; she must shew that it was in fact the result of the injury. I have some doubts as to whether the state of knowledge of the facts and the logic is so fixed as, in circumstances like this, to enable one to draw a definite conclusion, but I do not think we could try the matter from the facts on such subjects. Therefore, I am of opinion that we should dismiss the case to the Sheriff-substitute, and order him to allow an inquiry in the case to be averred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If we were to criticise the statements of fact made in this case with the same strictness which we do in questions of relevance in this Court, there is a great deal, I think, to be said against the averments, because I cannot gather from the Sheriff-substitute's statement anything more than this, that the man committed suicide in consequence of the depression of mind brought on by his blindness. The averment of insanity in the physiological sense of a result of injury to the brain, but merely that a man has committed suicide and is supposed to have done so under some insane impulse. It seems to me that in construing the Act of Parliament, and particularly the beginning of the First Section, we must hold that when the Act prescribes as a condition of compensation that death results from the injury, what is within the contemplation of the statute is a bodily or material injury with death materially resulting therefrom. To explain what I mean regarding insanity—if a person, being sane, were to receive a blow or a wound on the head which set up inflammation in the brain, and a medical expert came to the conclusion that the inflammation of the brain was the result of the blow on the head, and if the inflammation continued and left the man in an insane condition, from which, eventually, he died, then I should not for a moment doubt that the man's death was the result of the accident. But, on the other hand, it is easy to figure out a case where death resulting only from the moral effect of an accident. If, for example, a man in consequence of the loss of his sight took to drinking and led a dissipated life by intemperance, that would be a very clear case for not granting compensation; because, although in a sense his death was the result of the accident, it was not a material but a moral result. Now, in this case I am not disposed, any more than your Lordship, to construe the statute in that way.

ness. I think there ought to be a proof; and as the parties ring the case before us again, I hope the Sheriff-substitute attention to the point whether this is insanity that would be ical evidence of the symptoms, or whether it is anything mode of stating the supposed cause, because there must be be suicide. I agree that it is desirable to have the facts as, and I notice that in the case of Dunham,¹ which you there had been an inquiry, and the judgment of the Court a statement of the facts proved in the case.

AR.—The question whether death has resulted from an ys a question of fact. Therefore, I think it is indispensable or should have the facts ascertained before he decides it. I hat the case should go back to the learned Sheriff in order er may have an opportunity of proving her case if she can think the less one says about the prima facie aspect of the facts probably the better; but one cannot help seeing that difficulty in connecting the accident with the alleged result chain of connection. The exact point where the difficulty ot know, but, speaking for myself, I do not think I have edge of the pathology of insanity to form even a provisional e with your Lordships that the facts must be ascertained.

d in the sixth purpose formed the whole of the Black residuary legatees under the eighth purpose were the nephews and nieces of the testatrix, and a brother of her husband.

Her niece Christina Black, mentioned in the sixth purpose, died on 7th November 1905. She had never been married. Her niece Jane Black, to whom £750 was bequeathed under the eighth purpose of the settlement, was married to Alexander Black and died on 7th January 1879, thus predeceasing the testatrix and leaving one child, Stephen Strachan Allan.

In 1892 Alexander Milne Allan, as tutor of his pupil Stephen Strachan Allan, brought an action against the trustees, in which he claimed the payment of the legacy bequeathed to the pupil's mother under the eighth purpose, and of the estimated amount of her share of the residue of the eighth purpose. It was decided by the Court that the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit did not apply to the legacies to the nephews and nieces under the fourth purpose, but that it did apply to the residuary legatees under the eighth purpose—Allan v. Thomson's Trustees 20 R. 733.

The issue was whether the conditio si institutus sine liberis decesserit applied to the sum of £750 contingently bequeathed to Jane Black or whether consequently it was payable to her son Stephen Strachan Allan or fell into residue.

The surviving trustee of Mrs Thomson thereupon, as pursuer, brought a multiplepinding for the determination of the following claims:—(1) the surviving residuary legatees and representatives of deceased residuary legatees other than the testatrix's niece Mrs Compton; (2) Stephen Strachan Allan. No claim was lodged for the children of Mrs Thomson.

The compearing residuary legatees and representatives of deceased residuary legatees claimed to be ranked and preferred in medio to the extent of $8\frac{2}{3}$ eleventh shares thereof to each of the five children of the testatrix's husband, to the trustees of her brother-in-law, and $1\frac{1}{3}$ shares to the testatrix's nephews, Charles Boswell Black and George Black, each claiming in addition to their share a third of a share as one of the next of kin of Miss Black.

Stephen Strachan Allan claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, or alternatively, to one-eleventh share of the fund.

His first above mentioned plea was;—(1) The fund is the residue of the deceased's estate, the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred thereon in terms of the will, on a sound construction of the trust-disposition and the circumstances in consequence of Jane Black's having predeceased the testatrix, the sum destined to her fell into residue, and the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of the will.

His second plea was;—(1) The fund having fallen into residue, but having been carried to the credit of the testatrix, the claimant is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of the will, by virtue of the implied conditio si sine liberis decesserit.

was against the application of the conditio, and, taken along with the other circumstances present here, was sufficient to shew that the conditio did not apply in this case. The cases of Roughley v. Trustees,¹ and Taylor,² were all cases in which the gift was not a family provision, and the result of holding that the conditio did not apply would have been intestacy. These cases were special, and depended upon the recognition of any general rule, but upon their facts and circumstances.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am very clearly of opinion that the decision of the Lord Ordinary in this case is right and ought to be affirmed. The question whether a bequest in this case was considered in a former case by this Court, and it was decided that a bequest under it of a share of a fund was under the conditio si sine, but it was also held that a specific legacy being a personal bequest for an individual described as "memento of me," was not of the nature of a family provision, and the doctrine could be held to apply.

In my opinion it would be inconsistent with that judgment to hold that the sums bequeathed to certain individuals by a destination other than the original disposal went to other people altogether were family provisions. The sum in dispute here was not a share of a fund to be equally shared by the other members of the family. It was a specific sum directed to be paid to an individual. The bequest had all the characteristics of an ordinary legacy as distinguished from the disposal of the residue, which was expressly ordered to be divided among a class.

There is here no ground for presuming that the testator intended to provide for the possible contingency of the person instituted legatee dying before the testator, and in the absence of such ground there is no reason for applying the conditio and applying it to the gift. Here the testator, having provided for the possibility of a sum of £2500 not being taken by those named in the will, intended primarily to favour, gave specific directions that it was to be paid with by paying specific sums of varying amount to individuals named in the will, in a mode of disposal in marked contrast to a family provision for the benefit of persons.

On these grounds I would move your Lordships to adhere to the decision of the Lord Ordinary.

I may add that I have had an opportunity of considering the opinion prepared by Lord Stormonth-Darling, which goes more fully into the details of the case, and in which I entirely concur.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The fund in question in this matter consists of the balance of residue, so far as undistributed by the testator and acting trustee, of the estate of the late Mrs Christina Stephenson, widow of Mr Charles Duirs Thomson, solicitor in M.

viz., £76, 1s. 9d.; (4) that on or about 20th June following made a complete examination of said goods, and that thereof were not conform to sample; (5) that of the pursuers intimated the disconformity to the defenders and that of 69 pieces of the said goods—64 being now agreed to be returned—intended—and the said 69 pieces were sent back to the pursuers at Manchester; (6) that the pursuers at the same time intimated to the defenders their acceptance of the balance of the goods, and that a portion of the said goods returned to the defenders had been received in July 1905, and are now, by agreement of parties, again in the pursuers' hands; (7) that the defenders refused to agree to the attempted rejection, and have refused to accept re-delivery of the goods; they have never recognised or acquiesced in any distinction of the contract of sale in relation to goods accepted and goods rejected. Finds in law (1) that the intimation of rejection was not valid, that in respect it related only to a rejection of part of the goods delivered under one contract of sale there was no valid rejection required by the Sale of Goods Act, section 11 (2); (2) that the acceptance or retention of the balance of the goods was a valid retention under the said section of the said Act, and that although the said attempted partial rejection was invalid, the pursuers cannot now claim to retain all the goods and sue for the balance. Therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions sought and decerna."

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who, by his decision dated 6th December 1906 and 24th January 1907, recalled the defender's appeal, found that the pursuers were entitled to reject the defective pieces and retain those that were conform to sample,* that they were entitled to repayment of the price paid for them for the defective pieces, and to payment of a sum in name of damages, and therefore decerned against the defenders the sum of £45 sterling under the first alternative of the petition.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, where the appeal was heard before the Second Division on 13th and 17th January 1907.

It was agreed between the parties that if any sum was awarded under the second alternative prayer of the petition, the same was payable as £26, 18s. 3d.

Argued for the defenders and appellants;—By the counsel for the defenders, as it stood prior to the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the pursuers were competent for a buyer under a contract of sale to reject

* The Sheriff based his judgment on sec. 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

The Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict. cap. 71), section 11 (2). "In Scotland failure by the seller to perform a part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the seller as in breach, and to claim compensation or damages."

Sec. 30 (3). "Where the seller delivers to the buyer the goods contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description, the buyer may accept the goods which are in conformity with the contract, the buyer may accept the goods which are in conformity with the contract and reject the rest, or he may reject the whole."

tain part.¹ He had to reject all or none. The reason the seller had not delivered goods of the quality contracted for was to rescind the contract. If the contract was rescinded, the buyer could not retain part of the goods. Under sec. 11 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the buyer was entitled either to reject the goods or to retain them and claim damages. But that subsection gave him no right to reject part of the goods and retain the rest. He was merely given an alternative to his common law remedy of rejection, and he was bound to choose between the alternatives: he must take one or the other, and could only take one.² The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, did not apply to such a case. The word "description" related only to genus or quality. The defective goods here were defective in kind. They were not different in kind. Although inferior "maroon twills." Further, the heading of section 30 was "wrong quantity," and the section was really intended for cases where the whole of the goods ordered had been delivered with, and in addition to them, goods of a different kind had been ordered.³ Examples of the sort of case to which section 30 was to be found in Levy v. Green,⁴ and Nicholson v. Little.⁵ The case of Jaffé v. Ritchie,⁶ upon which the decision was in the defenders' favour. There the whole of the goods were rejected, and the difference was a difference of a kind, and not of a quality.⁷ The pursuers' rejection of part of the goods and their election to retain the remainder was therefore incompetent and invalid. If they had not exercised their right to reject validly, they could not now elect the remedy of rejection, and could not now claim damages. Under sec. 11 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, the buyer must elect one or other of the remedies given to him. He cannot have both. He must either affirm the contract or disaffirm it. The application to this class of case of the principle of election was simply the application to this class of case of the principle of election. Once he had repudiated the contract, he could not go back upon his repudiation, readopt the contract, and claim damages. He must elect either to repudiate the contract and by it, and his election once made was irrevocable. It was that even if he exercised his right of rejection and consequently ineffectually, he could not thereafter elect to affirm the contract for he had elected to repudiate the contract.⁸ The pursuers had elected to repudiate the contract, and therefore could not claim damages. Aitken, Campbell, &
Co., Limited,
v. Boullen &
Gatenby.

Argued for pursuers and respondents;—(1) Not more than three courses were open to the pursuers here, viz.:—(a) rejection of the whole of the goods; (b) retention of the whole of the goods and a claim for damages; (c) rejection of part of the goods and retention of the balance. Sec. 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, applied here. The word “description” referred to quality, and not to genus or kind. Difference of description might refer (a) to difference of genus, e.g., chalk and cheese; (b) to difference of species, e.g., stilton and cheddar; (c) difference of quality of the same species, e.g., different qualities of cheddar. If the word “description” only applied to difference of genus, then it was superfluous. A buyer was required to entitle a buyer to reject such of the goods as were of a different genus from the goods ordered. The kind of case referred to by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis in sections (1) and (2) of section 30 exhausted the possibilities of rejection of quantity. Subsection (3) applied to quality. The pursuers were therefore entitled to reject the defective part of the goods and retain the balance even if the defect was only one of quality. Here the defective goods were goods of a different species from the samples sent. “Tender” goods were goods of a distinct class from goods which were merely “slightly defective.” But if the pursuers were not entitled to reject the goods and retain the balance, they were now entitled to retain the goods and claim damages as for breach of contract. If rejection was invalid, then the goods were really retained. A defective attempt to reject partially did not prevent the pursuers from electing to claim damages.² The case of Electric Co. v. British Electric Co., Limited,³ was the decision of a majority only, and although it was followed in Croom & Arthur,⁴ its soundness had been questioned. In view, both these cases were distinguishable. The ground on which there was that by keeping and using the goods the buyers were precluded from exercising their right to reject, and that having elected to retain they could not afterwards claim damages. Here the pursuers had made any final election. They had merely made an attempt to reject in part, which had not been consented to. The case of *Thorn & Co.*⁵ was also distinguishable. The claim negative of the right to really both to reject and to retain, which, of course was not possible. All these cases were cases of personal bar. There was no personal bar here. The defender had suffered no prejudice from the attempted partial rejection.

LORD LOW.—I am of opinion that this is not a case to which section 30 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, applies. That enactment applies to a case of a seller delivering to a buyer “the goods he contracted for” with goods of a different description not included in the contract.

"description" is there plainly used to denote the kind of J. for, and that the right of partial rejection conferred upon A only to cases where goods of the kind contracted for are C of a different kind, and not to cases where all the goods C contracted for, but part of them is not of such good quality G bound to supply. Here the goods contracted for were L and the goods delivered were "maroon twills," but 64 out re not of such good quality as the samples which formed contract. I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuers to reject the 64 pieces and to retain the remaining 69, and interlocutor of the learned Sheriff must be recalled.

Question is whether the pursuers are barred by having attempted pieces from retaining the whole goods and claiming damages at the defenders have failed to perform a material part of What happened was that the pursuers actually returned the defenders, but the latter sent them back, and they are now of the pursuers awaiting the issue of the present action. As regards the pursuers' claim for damages the defenders way prejudiced by the attempt to reject the 64 pieces, but maintain, and the Sheriff-substitute has given effect to the the pursuers, having elected to follow one course, cannot to adopt another. The authority mainly relied upon is Instruction Co. v. Hurry & Young.¹ The pursuers in that a dynamo to the defenders which was disconform to con- siderers intimated to the pursuers that they rejected the urtherless they continued to use it for several months. The ought an action for the contract price, in answer to which ntained that they were entitled to retain the machine, and of damages against the price. It was held by a majority e having elected to reject, were not entitled to fall back ive of retaining the machine and claiming damages.

It is that that judgment has no application to the present d of judgment was that the statute having specified two which the buyer might adopt, he was bound to make up f the two he would follow, and could not be allowed first e seller that he was to take one course, and then, when he ore to his advantage to do so, to adopt the other course. t what happened in this case. No doubt the pursuers which they could not insist upon taking as a matter of nders might have consented to the course proposed, but o so, and they were quite entitled to refuse. I can find in that position of matters to debar the pursuers from ng either of the courses open to them under the statute, eir attempt to reject part of the goods had not put the rse position than they would have been in if the pursuers ed to proceed in conformity with the statute. As I have , nothing of that sort is suggested.

v. Boullen &
Gatanby.

Lord Low.

Suppose that when the defenders refused to take back the pursuers had at once also returned the remaining 69 pieces. I am not entitled to say that they repudiated the contract and rejected the goods. I cannot imagine any ground upon which it could have been said that they were not entitled to follow that course. But I think they are entitled to say to the defenders,—“I have taken back the goods which are disconform to sample, we shall keep along with the goods which are conform to sample, but we claim damages in respect that you have failed to perform a material contract.”

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong in his decree that “although the partial rejection was invalid, the pursuers are entitled to claim to retain all the goods and sue for damages.”

It appears that the pursuers paid the contract price of the goods. They discovered that part of them was not conform to contract. Their claim is for repayment of the amount of the loss they have sustained in respect of part of the goods not being conform to sample. I understand that the parties have adjusted the amount to £26, 18s. 3d., and accordingly I am of opinion that decree should be pronounced for that sum.

LORD ARDWALL.—In April 1905 the defenders sold to the pursuers 133 pieces of maroon twills, and delivered them to the pursuers on 6th May following. On 22d May the pursuers paid to the defenders £76, 1s. 9d. as the price of the goods. On 20th June following the pursuers, having made a complete examination of the goods, discovered that certain pieces were not conform to sample, and they intimated to the defenders of these pieces, and returned to them 64 pieces which were not conform to sample. At the same time they intimated to the defenders their acceptance of the balance of the goods. The defenders refused the attempted partial rejection, and have never accepted the goods, nor otherwise acquiesced in the said rejection. The pursuers, however, have now in their hands the rejected goods, and also those which were kept as being conform to sample.

In these circumstances the present action is raised for £50, 19s., being the price of the rejected goods, or, alternatively, for £25, 16s., being the loss and damage sustained by the pursuers in footing of their retaining the whole goods.

The Sheriff-substitute held that the pursuers were not entitled to reject part of the goods, and, that having attempted to reject part of the goods, they are barred from now keeping the whole of the goods and claiming damages. He accordingly absolved the defenders. The Sheriff-substitute, on the ground that the pursuers were entitled to reject part of the goods in virtue of the provisions of section 30 (3) of the Goods Act, 1893. He accordingly has given decree for £36, 10s., the price of the defective pieces which were rejected, and a sum of £8, 7s. 9d. in name of damages.

I propose to deal first with the question whether the provisions of section 30 (3) of the said Act apply to the circumstances of the

the following terms:—"Where the seller delivers to the buyer goods which he contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description included in the contract, the buyer may accept the goods in accordance with the contract and reject the rest."

In the present case what was sold was maroon twills equal to samples proved that 64 of the 133 pieces sent were not equal to the sample, but that they were more "tender," as it is called, than the sample. "Tenderness" in goods of this kind, it is explained, is an effect of softness or weakness in the goods, and there is some effect that when goods of this description are of such quality as to be called "tender" it is usual to sell them by the pound and not by the yard, and on the strength of this practice of the trade it is the pursuance of the Act that "tender" goods are goods of a description which were conform to the sample within the meaning of the Act. I confess I cannot accept of this. I am of opinion that the whole of the goods sent in fulfilment of the contract were goods of the same "description," namely, maroon twills, and their conformity or disconformity to sample fell to be determined by the varying degrees of strength on the one hand and softness on the other; and from the proof I think it sufficient to show that the gradation in the texture of the goods varied greatly, and that at any point in the variation from strong to tender it could be predicated that goods at any one part of the variation were of a different "description" from the goods immediately next to them on either side of strength or of "tenderness."

I do not think that the subsection in question applies, and I think it can be said that any part of the goods delivered was of a different description. I am of opinion that the words "different description" implies a difference of kind, not merely of quality, and the cases which were cited as illustrations of cases to which the section applied were all cases where there was a difference of kind and not merely of quality in the goods.

In *Levy v. Green*¹ crockery of a different pattern and contents than the articles from those ordered was sent in a crate containing only the articles which had been ordered. In Nicholson v. Bradfield Union,² in the sale of coal, the sellers put in a lot of coal from a different source than that ordered, which got mixed with the first delivery; and in *Leitch v. Ritchie*³ a seller of yarns, which were described as containing several spindles containing yarns composed of a mixture of flax and jute, and it was there held that this did not answer to the contract for "flax yarns," and that accordingly they were properly rejected. No case was cited in which a mere difference in quality was sufficient to divide goods into goods of different "descriptions."

Thus I am of opinion that the said subsection does not apply, and that the pursuance of the Sheriff, which proceeded upon the application of the pursuers, must be recalled.

Lord Ardwall.

The next question for consideration is whether the pur rejected part of the goods sent, are now barred from retain along with the goods which they had not rejected and claimin respect of defective fulfilment of the contract. I confess I ha to be a question of some difficulty. The cases of the Electric Company v. Hurry & Young,¹ and Croom & Arthur v. Stewart were cited as authorities for the proposition that after intima rejection of goods as disconform to contract a buyer is not e back on the alternative remedy provided by the Sale of retaining the goods and claiming damages for the seller's failu a material part of the contract. I may notice in passing tha two cases together the above proposition as one of universal a questioned in the first case by Lords Kinnear and Low, and by Lord Kyllachy, and it is possible that in some other ci may deserve reconsideration. But accepting the views of t each of these cases as absolutely sound, I am of opinion tha case is capable of being differentiated from them. In both t whole of the subject sold was rejected, and in both of them was complicated by the buyers, after intimating rejection of t taining to use them for considerable periods of time. Now, i case the pursuers did not reject the whole of the subject of did they, by keeping possession of the rejected portion, in any so far as that portion was concerned, the interests of the sellen accordingly not in the position of having elected to take one o provided by the Act, and therefore by implication of having the other. What they did was to adopt neither the one alter other, but to make a partial rejection which they were not ent and which they did make in a mistaken view of their own matter. In other words, they attempted to do what they wer to do either under the Act or at common law. But the fact o made this mistake does not involve them in the dilemma Court considered the sellers had placed themselves in the tw referred to, and I am of opinion that nothing else has occurre from now adopting the alternative remedy provided by sectio tion (2), of the said Act by retaining the whole goods and clai for breach of contract.

On these grounds I think the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor 1906, with the exception of its findings in fact, ought to be decree given for the alternative sum of £26, 18s. 3d. cla pursuers.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with your Lordships in hol tion 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act does not apply to this case the grounds so clearly stated by Lord Low. I am therefore of the interlocutor of the Sheriff must be recalled. Further, I a opinion expressed by both your Lordships that in the circumst case the purchaser of the goods has the right still, retaining the damages for the disconformity of a portion of the goods to a by the sample upon which the purchase was made. The Electric Company,¹ which was founded on at the debate, was of a different character from the present. The sale in that case was of a specific article—a machine for developing and transmitting electrical transmutation. The party in that case did not return the machine, they intimated that they rejected it, but kept the machine for months. The decision in that case, which seems somewhat doubtful as to its soundness, has no bearing on this case, which is one of disconformity in respect of some part of the goods being of a different kind. The sellers suffered no damage by the course which was taken, a mistaken course under the Act. The Sheriff-substitute, in the Electric Company case,¹ held that the buyer was not entitled to claim damages for that part of the goods which was not of the kind described. I concur with your Lordships in holding that the goods were "of a different kind" in the sense of the Act, and that the section applies to a difference of kind and not of quality—such as in the crockery case, where different articles were sent among those which had been ordered. The case of yarn and flax yarn² was similar. I therefore agree with the majority of the judges as decided by Lord Low.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING was absent.

The Lord pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard the counsel for the parties on the appeal for the defenders and the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff of Lanark, dated 14th May and 6th December 1906, and the Lord's judgment of 14th January 1907, sustain the appeal, and recall the interlocutors appealed against: Find in fact in terms of the findings in fact in the said interlocutor dated 14th May 1906, but omitting from the seventh of said findings the twenty-six words following the word 're-delivery': Find in law in terms of the first two findings in law in said interlocutor of 14th May 1906: And further find in law (3) that the said attempted partial rejection was invalid, the pursuers are entitled to retain all the goods and sue for the value thereof, the defenders having been in no way prejudiced by the partial rejection of the goods, the value of which has been ascertained at the sum of £26, 18s. 3d.: Therefore ordain the defenders to make payment to the pursuers of the said sum of £26, 18s. 3d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation till payment, and Find the pursuers entitled to expenses in this and in the inferior Court, which modify to one-half the taxed amount."

In order to found jurisdiction the pursuers, on 21st August used arrestments in the hands of the Missouri Land and having its registered office at 16 Castle Street, Edinburgh, as the pursuers averred, they attached 755 shares of

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders are subject to arrestment to found jurisdiction executed against them.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No jurisdiction.

The Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) allowed a proof on the LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships. The question of diligence, is highly technical, and therefore more bound to follow the decisions which have stood for years and have fixed the practice. Nobody disputes that a stock company is attachable for the debt of a shareholder. The question is whether the proper diligence to attach it is arrestment. I say that is the only question, because it has not been held that it can be reached by poinding, or that it is protected from arrest altogether. Now, I think there is a series of decisions which establish this case even apart from the decision in Sinclair v. Staples.¹ There are many decisions to the effect that the interest of a partner in an ordinary business is attachable by arrestment, even although it may be said that the money due at that moment to the partner, and although upon a balance it might be found that there was no balance in his favour. I have thought these cases in point; but any doubt I should have been removed by the decision in Sinclair v. Staples,¹ which is a decision directly in point, and which I think we are bound to follow.

Crown S.S.

v. Leitch.

Ship—Affreightment—Bill of Lading—Unloading of cargo—Steamer can deliver—Charges necessary for quick dispatch to consignee.—A bill of lading for sugar shipped from the ship at Greenock contained this provision:—"The goods to be received by the consignee from the ship's tackle as fast as the steamer can deliver at the port to the contrary notwithstanding, and all charges being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick dispatch of the goods to the owner or consignee of the goods."

Held (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) that under this contract the ship was entitled to put the cargo out on to the quay as fast as she could, and the consignees, provided they had fair notice of the intention to discharge, were bound, whatever might be the custom of the port, to make arrangements for having the cargo removed from the quay as fast as it was put out; and that if they failed to do so, and so caused the ship to remain at the quay, which interrupted the discharge, the ship was entitled to employ men to clear the block, and to recover the expense of so doing from the consignee.

times, although it was the exception to the general rule, run into the sheds as it was put out of the ship, and into the sheds. That was an exceptional course to follow, sometimes done, and was quite lawful. The consignee followed the course of weighing on the quay at the ship.

The "Crown of Granada" commenced to discharge on the morning of the 28th of June 1906. The ship had men to discharge the cargo at each of the four main hatches, enabled the derricks to be kept constantly at work, and the cargo to be discharged as fast as it could be delivered from the ship. The consignees on the other hand had only one gang of men and one weighing machine at each hatch. The result was that the men could not weigh the sugar and remove it to the sheds, so it was put out of the ship, and the consequence was that in time the quay became blocked with bags of sugar which the consignees' men were unable to deal. When that happened the employment of the ship cleared the quay by running the loaded bags into the sheds without being weighed. If this had been done it would have been necessary to stop the discharge until the block occurred until the consignees' men were able to remove the bags which had accumulated.

The discharge proceeded continuously on Thursday 29th, and Saturday 30th June, and finished on Monday 3rd July.

The owners of the "Crown of Granada" claimed from the consignee the sum of £40, 19s., "for expenses incurred in removing cargo consequent on failure to take delivery of the ship's tackles as fast as steamer delivered it. 4476 bags weighing 468 tons at 1s. 9d." This sum was claimed as Leitch's share of the total sum paid by them to their stevedores for the removal of the cargo to prevent a block as above mentioned.

Leitch having refused to pay this claim the Crown S.S. Co., Limited, as owners of the "Crown of Granada" brought an action against him in the Sheriff Court at Greenock, for the sum claimed by them.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(2) The said expenses were necessarily incurred for the steamer's quick dispatch, the consignee of the said sugar, is liable therefor, in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading.

The defender pleaded, inter alia ;—(3) The expense was not incurred through the fault of the defender, nor in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading, the defender is entitled to a decree Separatim, the sum sued for is excessive.

The facts regarding the question raised by the defender sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Judges infra.

By interlocutor dated 21st December 1906 the Sheriff (Neish), after a proof, assolized the defender.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session. The appeal was heard before the Second Division on 15th and 20th December 1907.

Argued for the pursuers and appellants ;—Under this clause the obligation of the consignee was to take delivery as fast as it could put out the goods, no matter what might be the circumstances at the port. The clause was unambiguous and imperative. It was absolute, and the consignee could not excuse himself by shewing it according to its terms by shewing that there were circumstances beyond his control, or that he had done pursuers must prove that the defender prevented quick dispatch was not responsible for delay caused by any other cause, even although the case was treated as if the defender was the sole consignee, it was not proved that this expense was necessary to give quick dispatch. The pursuers must prove, that but for whom they employed, the steamer would not have got quick dispatch. They had not done so. It was not proved that the steamer would not have been as quick if these men had never been employed.

 The delay that occurred was due to the waste of time on the ship before beginning to discharge, and to the confusion of the method of discharge adopted. In the case of *Macdonald*³ the expression used was "discharge," not "deliver," and the consignee was only held liable because he had caused undue delay of the steamer. *Macdonald*⁴ the consignee was taken bound to receive "quick dispatch." In any view the sum sued for was excessive.

At advising on 31st January 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers claim from the defender of providing labour to facilitate the discharge of a cargo of sugar from a vessel. They make this claim in respect of a clause in the bill of lading under which the consignees were bound to take "from the steamer as fast as the steamer can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding." The consignees were taken bound to pay all expenses necessary for the steamer's "quick dispatch."

It is the fact that the defender was only consignee of the cargo, but it does not appear to me that this fact in any way affected the decision of the question in this case.

It cannot be disputed that the arrangements made by the defender did not admit of the cargo being cleared from the quay as quickly as the steamer could deliver, for it is quite certain that with one set of scales and one hatch—which was all that the defender provided—the bagging of the hold could not be weighed fast enough to keep the steamer waiting for further discharge. To prevent the blocking of the discharge by the provided gangs of men, who, when there was a tendency to accumulate goods back into the shed behind, so as to clear a space for the steamer to move forward.

cargo. Such a removal before weighing was not according to the rules, but it was a procedure which was sometimes followed. The question is, What is the meaning to be put upon the clause in

It is, I think, very definite and clear, and there is no error. All custom is excluded ; the bargain sharply is for as the ship can bring the goods forward to the ship's side. It is to be vain to contend that in the words excluding the port custom the practice of weighing at the ship's side is excluded. They exclude everything that can hamper the ship's speed. It is not undoubted weighing at the ship's side may do, if the scales are not sufficient to weigh as rapidly as is necessary to the ship's tackle, the ship delivering by her ordinary method in the case here.

However, maintains that the latter part of the clause, in "quick dispatch" are used, has a less extensive meaning than the earlier part of the clause, and must be read to mean dispatch according to the circumstances existing at the time. It seems to me to be here in a dilemma. If by "the circumstances" means general circumstances, then I think it hopeless to escape from the application of the clause as one clause, "quick dispatch" referring to the concrete phrase "as fast as can deliver." If, on the other hand, by "circumstances" means particular circumstances, his contention is expressly excluded by the words "notwithstanding." As I read the second part of the clause, it gives nothing more than a right to the ship, if dispatch is required, to claim the expenses she is put to in clearing away the obstruction which is causing the hindrance, and exempt her from any penalty of the consignee for any unusual expense he may be put to in the reception of the goods in such order that the ship shall not be forced to discharge more slowly than her appliances when she is free to do full work.

er it necessary to notice the argument of the defender
sion of the House of Lords in the case of Hulthen v.
o say that the question in that case related to demurrage, sense a case for demurrage. The sole question is whether d to give the ship the dispatch stipulated for, and whether as I think is the case, the only difficulty in fast delivery the defender to weigh at the quay, he cannot, as I think, except as being a port custom, and this ground is expressly rms of the bill of lading. I am therefore of opinion that entitled, when the defender failed to receive cargo and the ship's tackles delivered, to provide force to effect this expense of the defender, seeing that the rate of delivery d to them, and it was pointed out to them that if they t the quay, extra scales would be necessary.

v. Leitch.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

As regards the charge made by the pursuers, I do not think it is held just. There is evidence that the 1s. 9d. they charge is in excess of what such work is usually contracted for by the gangs for quay work, and there is no counter evidence. The pursuers' charge is in fact the result of the pursuers bringing a large gang all day to Glasgow daily. In my opinion the pursuers' charge should be reduced to the sum represented by 6d. per ton, which comes out at 4s. 6d.

LORD LOW (whose opinion was, in his Lordship's absence, delivered by Lord Justice-Clerk).—The question in this case depends upon the construction of a clause in the bill of lading of a cargo of sugar brought by the pursuers' s.s. "Crown of Granada" from Greenock. The clause is in the following terms:—"The consignee to receive the goods as fast as they can be delivered by the ship's tackles as fast as they can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding, and to pay the charges incurred after being discharged necessary for the dispatch to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods."

The circumstances in which the question arises are these:—The pursuers were consignee of a part only, although a large part, of the cargo. I do not think that the main question in the case (the meaning and effect of the clause in the bill of lading) is affected by that circumstance. The question would have been the same if the defender had been consignee of the whole cargo. (Lordship then stated the facts ut supra.)

The pursuers now claim from the defender the expenses incurred in clearing the quay when a block occurred, and the question is whether that is a claim which they are entitled to make under the clause in the bill of lading which I have quoted?

It seems to me that, so far as the language used is concerned, there is no ambiguity in the first branch of the clause. The consignee is bound to receive the goods as fast as they can be delivered by the ship's tackles, and that obligation is not to be limited by any custom of the port.

Upon that part of the clause I have two remarks to make. In the first place, I think that the words "any custom of the port" refer to all events included, the custom of weighing the sugar on the quay before it was removed into the sheds. That is the only custom of the port of which there is any evidence, and it is plainly a custom which materially affects the rate of discharge, because it is admitted that if, instead of weighing the sugar upon the quay, it had been at once run into the sheds, the consignee would have had no difficulty in receiving the cargo as fast as it was delivered it.

In the second place, although, in my judgment, the words of the clause now considering are unambiguous, I have no doubt that the question must be construed reasonably, and that the extent of the consignee's obligation must depend a good deal upon the circumstances existing in the particular case. For example, if the shipowner devised some means by which the cargo could be discharged much faster than the consignee had any reason to expect or be prepared for, I do not think that his failure to take advantage of it was tendered would be a breach of his obligation. For n tly, however, I do not think that any case of that kind has the second branch of the clause, which is much more difficult than the first. I repeat the words: "All charges being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick dispatch to the owner or consignee of the goods."

I compute that the words "after being discharged" mean after being discharged, but I think that it is also plain that they do not mean that the goods have been discharged, because if all the goods were discharged the ship would be free, and there would be no room for delay to ensure quick dispatch. The clause therefore referred to might require to be done during the course of the discharge, the only thing, so far as I can see, to which it could possibly refer is the very thing which happened, namely, a block occurring, which interrupted the discharge if the pursuers had not cleared the words "quick dispatch." The pursuers argued that they referred back to the first part of the clause, and that the expression "steamer's quick dispatch" was just a short way of saying "to order to discharge the cargo as fast as she can deliver from the ship." The defender, upon the other hand contended that the expression "quick dispatch" must be read according to their ordinary significance, meaning that the ship should be discharged with reasonable speed in all the circumstances.

The construction for which the pursuers contend is in accordance with the intention of the clause. If it were not so, the stipulation was laid upon the consignee by the first branch of the clause, which is inoperative and ineffectual, because unless the shipowner complied with the second branch of the clause, and clear away any obstructions which would otherwise interrupt the discharge, the shipowner would incur no penalty for failing to implement his obligation to deliver the cargo as fast as the ship could deliver them. I further think that the expression "quick dispatch" is a flexible expression which may be interpreted in the manner which I have indicated if the context requires it, in the sense in which it was used. It is also important to note that, in any view, the custom of the port is excluded. That was the defender's counsel. Now, if the custom of the port had been different, and if the stipulation had simply been that, in discharge of the cargo the steamer should get "quick dispatch," I think that the pursuers would have successfully maintained that he was entitled to weigh the cargo upon the quay, and to employ the number of men and of weighing-machines which he did employ, because that was in accordance with the custom of the port. As the clause stands, however, the defender cannot rely upon the custom—it is expressly excluded—and as I have already said, the pursuers admit that if he had not weighed the sugar upon the quay, but had received the cargo as fast as it could be delivered from the steamer, he would have received the cargo as fast as it could be delivered from the steamer. Except the custom of weighing the sugar upon the quay, the circumstances which would have prevented the defender

Jan. 31, 1908. from taking, or justified him in not taking, delivery as fast as he could. The ship was discharged.

Lord Low.

It is said, however, that the claim of the pursuers is contrary to an established principle which was finally settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Hulthen v. Stewart & Company.¹ That principle is that if a specific number of days is fixed within which the discharge of the ship is to be accomplished, then if these days are exceeded, demurrage is due whatever the actual circumstances were. If, upon the other hand, a specific number of days is not fixed, but the contract is to deliver the goods "all dispatch" or "as fast as steamer can deliver," or expressed in similar terms, the question whether demurrage is due depends upon whether the discharge has been carried out with reasonable expedition and diligence, having regard to the whole circumstances.

If the pursuers had been claiming demurrage I agree that their claim would have fallen under the latter category, because I cannot regard the clause in the bill of lading as fixing a specific time for the discharge. But the question of demurrage does not arise. The only question is whether under the contract the pursuers were entitled to do, at the defender's expense, the work which the defender was under obligation to do himself. The object of the agreement was to prevent the steamer being delayed, and that does not make the pursuers' claim one for demurrage. It does not necessarily introduce a principle which would have been applicable if the claim had actually been for demurrage.

The difficulty in this case seems to me to be entirely one of construction. But suppose that there had been no ambiguity in the language of the bill of lading, that the bill of lading had provided in the clearest terms that the consignee should receive the goods as fast as the steamer could deliver them by its tackles, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding. Suppose the consignee chose to weigh the goods upon the quay he should employ a sufficient number of men and of scales to enable him to do so without interrupting or retarding the discharge; and that if he failed to do so the ship should be entitled, at his expense, to do what was necessary to complete the discharge being interrupted or retarded, by removing the goods without being weighed any bags of sugar which the defender might have weighed as fast as they were delivered by the ship's tackles—that is the bargain between the parties—as I think it truly was expressed in quite unambiguous language, I fail to see why it should not be regarded as a lawful bargain, and enforceable according to its terms.

The only ground upon which such a contract could be held unenforceable would be that it was not sufficiently definite. Now, in the present place, I think that the obligation laid upon the consignee was sufficiently definite for the purposes of the contract, because I imagine that persons experienced in the unloading of ships would know, with sufficient accuracy for practical purposes, what was involved in an obligation to deliver goods as fast as they could be delivered from the ship's tackles. I do not regard the obligation as being absolutely unconditioned, nor do the witnesses say anything to the contrary. In the second place, I do not regard the obligation as being absolutely unconditioned.

COURT OF SESSION, &

circumstances which, in my opinion, the obligation to take delivery as fast as the discharge of the cargo which actually occurred (except the custom of the port, which the defender cannot found) which prevented it as it was tendered.

A circumstance which might have been required for exact fulfilment of his contract is (and no means clear on this point) the number of men to discharge the cargo. The defender had been taken by surprise and was not expected to be prepared for the discharge. That consideration might have had some effect on his liability. But no such defence was given ample notice of the manner in which the cargo was to be discharged. He was told that the sugar was to be discharged by four derricks at the rate of not less than four tons at each derrick," and that he was to have two slings of 5 bags each, with each derrick. He told that "if you intend to weigh the cargo, it will be necessary for you to have at least four men." He was also told that, failing his receiving the cargo, the owners would put the cargo on the terms of the bills of lading.

The defender took no objection to the rate of discharge. At the time of the discharge did he take any objection to the pursuers of men to clear away the cargo? In correspondence the pursuers proceeded to discharge the cargo. The bills of lading was that for weight of the cargo. The defender took no objection. It was not until the payment of the sum now sued for that the defender was not justified by the bills of lading. It is somewhat difficult for the pursuers to show that the contract is something different from what was at the time, and upon the faith of which the pursuers incurred their expense.

The pursuers are of opinion that the pursuers were justified in what they are entitled to recover from the defender. They were injured by them in running into the sugar. The amount paid by the pursuers to their stevedores was £103, 14s. 7d. The pursuers have no consignees in proportion to the weight of the cargo. For the defender 468 tons of sugar. The total cost, for which the pursuers are entitled to a rate of 1s. 9d. per ton, which, the pursuers say, is the rate.

In that, I think that he is right. The pursuers had their anxiety to secure that the defender should not incur any expense. They had a very strong desire to run the sugar into the

Jan. 31, 1903. occurred, and the bulk of the men were brought from Glasgow course, cost more than if they had been hired in Greenock.
 Crown S.S. Co., Limited, independent evidence was led by the pursuers to shew that the
 v. Laitch. by them was a usual and reasonable charge. One witness, Lord Low. adduced by the defender—Mr Harvey, secretary of the Greenock Sugar Association—who said: "Part of our business is running and piling up sugar discharged from steamers at the quays. Our rate is 6d. per ton. I was prepared to run in the cargo in question if it had been ordered." That was the whole of Mr Harvey's evidence, which was not cross-examined. His evidence, therefore, is not challenged, and it must be held as establishing that the running in of the cargo must have been done for 6d. per ton instead of 1s. 9d. That brings the sum to £11, 14s., for which I think that the pursuers are entitled to be paid.

LORD ARDWALL.—I have found this case to be one of much interest. If it were a question of demurrage that was here raised it appears that the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Hulthen v. Stewart, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, would have been against the pursuers. But, what is here sought to be enforced is a contract under which I am of opinion that it was the duty of the parties that should delay occur in the removal of the goods by the ship from the quay at the ship's side the shipowner should employ men to run such goods into the sheds in order to give a quick dispatch—that is, dispatch as quickly as the goods could be run over the ship's side. The document is very obscurely worded, but it has not been that the parties, both in the correspondence and at the discussion on the appeal, assumed that what was provided in the bill of lading was charges for removing goods from the side of the ship after they had been put over the ship's side, I should have been guilty in construing the clause at all. I think that the evidence of the custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding¹ prevented the defender from pleading, as he might otherwise have done, that the delay was caused by his endeavouring to weigh the sugar before it was run into the sheds. Therefore it must be taken that his obligation was to keep the front of the quay from being blocked by goods either by weighing machines opposite each hold to weigh the sugar as the ship could deliver it, or failing that to run the sugar straight into the sheds leaving it to be weighed afterwards, which was what actually happened to a considerable portion of the cargo in question. I do not go into detail either with regard to the construction of the bill of lading or with regard to the law applicable thereto, as I have had the advantage of my brother Lord Low's opinion, and agree with the views expressed. The next question is whether the sum sued for is "necessary for the steamer's quick dispatch," for it is only such sums which, according to the bill of lading, are "to be paid by the consignee of the goods." Now I think it is clearly proved that at the time in the discharge of this steamer a block took place, and proved by the intervention of stevedores' men provided by the pursuers, this being so, the only remaining question is as to the charges. Now, I think it clear that the shipowners here were in the business of discharging the vessel in a most extravagant manner. They did not content themselves with getting stevedores or quaysmen, but brought them all the way from Glasgow, and employed quite unnecessary numbers. It is proved by the uncontradicted evidence of Mr Harvey, a witness for the defenders, that 60 men were allowed for running in and piling sugar from the vessel on the sheds, and I think it is only that sum that should be allowed in the present case. It is said that there were 468 tons run in, and on this amounts to £11, 14s., and for this amount I think the pursuers are entitled to decree.

I must add that it appears to me that the clause under discussion is a new one, is not much of an improvement upon the clause hitherto in use in bills of lading, and instead of being of any benefit to shipowners, is likely to cost them a good deal of money. It is saved, at all events if they follow the course that was followed by the shipowners in the present case; and I must also add that, on a sound construction of the peculiar contract which was entered into by the bill of lading, the pursuers were not justified in so hastening on as they did the dispatch of the vessel. The time saved was of comparatively small amount, and was not worth all the trouble and expense which the shipowners incurred. Indeed it appears on the evidence they would have saved a good deal of money instead of beginning the discharge of the vessel on the 28th of January, and indeed it immediately on her arrival on the afternoon of the 28th they would have been content with the usual rate of discharge of sugar from the vessel.

THE LORDS.—I am sorry that I cannot reach the conclusion which your Lordships have arrived at. The action is one by the pursuers against the consignee of part of a cargo of sugar carried by the pursuers' ship to the port of Greenock. The claim is not for the cargo, but for a contractual substitute therefor. The clause in the bill of lading to which the action is laid is in these terms:—"The goods to be delivered to the consignee from the ship's tackle as fast as the steamer can deliver them from the port to the contrary notwithstanding, and as soon as after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick return, to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods." The pursuers have incurred certain charges to a stevedore from Glasgow in landing the cargo consequent on failure to take delivery from the ship, and the steamer could deliver it, and the proportion of the charges is claimed by the defender's consignment (which consisted roughly of one-third of the total cargo), the pursuers estimate, so far as the charges of the men, at £40, 19s. It is plain, and was indeed admitted by the pursuers' counsel, that this estimate must, in any view, suffer considerable deductions in amount.

The pursuers' substitute, from whom the appeal is brought, has found the

Jan. 31, 1908. the pursuers have not proved that the sum sued for consisted of expenses incurred after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quayside service in terms of the bill of lading, and he accordingly has assailed the pursuers' case with expenses. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's decision ought to be affirmed.

Darling.

The proposition which lies at the root of the pursuers' case is that a clause in the bill of lading requiring "the goods to be received by the consignee from the ship's tackles as fast as the steamer can deliver at the port to the contrary notwithstanding," is practically equivalent to a clause fixing the number of days or hours during which the delivery is to be completed. It is true, they say, that a definite period of time is not prescribed, but a standard is fixed, viz., the ship's capacity of delivering when her tackles are working as fast as they can, and this standard can be perfectly well known to the shipowner, and can be ascertained by the charterer or consignee if he takes the trouble to inquire. They say, therefore, they say, vague or uncertain about a clause of this kind imports a mechanical equivalent for a definite period of time, and there is no reason for attaching to it different consequences from those which would follow down in plain terms a certain number of days or hours for delivery. Unfortunately for this argument the point has been considered and determined the other way in a recent judgment of the House of Lords in Stewart & Company,¹ affirming a decision of the Court of Appeal. The claim in that case was no doubt one for demurrage, whereas here it is a claim for something in the nature of demurrage, and intended to produce the same deterrent effect. Demurrage being simply "the agreed sum of damage which is to be paid for the delay of the ship caused by the charterers at either the commencement or the end of the voyage," a demurrage clause has been held elastic enough to cover damage caused in that way as being "in the nature of demurrage" (see case of Hulthen's case,² therefore, seems to me directly in point—as a claim for demurrage or of something in the nature of demurrage. If it had prevailed that the two clauses were practically identical (the one fixing a mechanical equivalent, and the clause fixing a definite time), the obligation in the case before us would have had to be treated as an unconditional one on the part of the consignee to take delivery within the time which could be shewn to be the utmost capacity of the ship's tackles to give delivery, without regard to the actual circumstances of the case, just as if a definite time had been prescribed. But what would the learned Lords say? After stating the opposing contentions, Lord Macnaghten said: "It is certainly satisfactory to find that the result of decisions, some in this House and others of great weight in England and in Scotland, which leave little or no room for argument, has been established that, in order to make a charterer unconditional, it is not enough to stipulate that the cargo is to be discharged 'as fast as dispatch,' or as 'fast as steamer can deliver,' or to use expressions

These daughters maintained that they were entitled to the payment of their respective shares of residue on the ground that the provisions secured by "antenuptial contract" being inapplicable to the daughters who were already married was ineffectual to burden the residue, and fell to be disregarded.

The testator's intention that the shares of the daughters, married at the date of his death, should be secured to them and their children being born after his death, that intention was not to be defeated simply because he adopted a particular method of carrying out his wishes which was not precisely the method in every case, and that the trustees were bound (subject to the provisions of the will) to settle the shares of daughters, married at the date of his death, in trust in names of the trustees or of other trustees, as they might see fit, in behoof in liferent and otherwise as directed by the will.

A granite merchant in Aberdeen, died on 18th July 1906, leaving two sons and eight daughters, and predeceased by his wife. He made a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 15th January 1906, by which he conveyed his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his trustees.

The purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement provided for was:—"In the seventh place, I direct my trustees, as they may find convenient, to realise and divide the residue of my estate, whether moveable or immoveable, real or personal (including the proceeds of my business and others, if not taken over by my said daughters) among my children, in such proportions as I shall by my will appoint, and failing such appointment, equally among Questions having arisen as to the disposal of the trust-estate, a special case was presented.

The case set forth as follows:—

The testator's two sons, William Fyfe and John Fyfe, had exercised the option conferred on them by the sixth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement, and had taken over the business, and accepted the legacies of £5000 bequeathed to them by the fourth purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement. They therefore took no share of the residue of the trust-estate under the trust-disposition and settlement.

The first parties were the trustees under the trust-

Jan. 31, 1908. should have been conferred on such children by such settlement.

Fyfe's
Trustees v.
Duthie.

The fourth parties maintained that they had taken a vested interest in the fee of the share of residue provided to their mother by John Fyfe or Duthie, and that the capital of such share was to fall on the death of their mother, fall to be divided among the first parties along with any children that might thereafter be born to the first parties to such provision, if any, in favour of Mr Duthie as might be presently made by Mrs Duthie.

The fifth parties maintained that they were entitled to the intestate of the testator to the fee of the shares of any of the first parties who might die without leaving issue born after the testator's death.

The questions of law were, inter alia, as follows:—

" 1. Has an unqualified right of fee in their respective shares of residue vested in the second parties, and are they entitled to payment of the capital of their shares? or

" 2. Are the first parties bound (subject to the power of appointment) to procure said shares settled in trust in the names of the first parties or of other trustees for behoof of the second parties respectively in liferent and otherwise, in terms of the truster's directions for the settlement in trust of daughters' provisions contained in the trust-deed for the purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement? or

" 3. Has an unqualified right of fee in their respective shares of residue vested in the third parties, and are they entitled to payment of their shares? or

" 4. Are the first parties bound (subject to the power of appointment) to retain the shares of the third parties, and to pay to the third parties respectively only the income thereof, so long as they are unmarried, and in the event of any of the third parties becoming after married, to procure her share (subject to the power of appointment) settled in trust for behoof of her in liferent and otherwise, in terms of the truster's said directions for the settlement in trust of daughters' provisions? or

" 6. As regards the share of residue provided to Mrs Duthie by John Fyfe or Duthie, do the fourth parties (together with any children who may be born to her) have a vested right of fee in said share? or

" 8. Does the fee of the share of any daughter who may die without leaving issue, born after the testator's death, fall to the first parties as heirs ab intestato of the truster?"

The arguments sufficiently appear from the contentions of the first parties.¹

At advising,—

LORD LOW (whose opinion was read in his Lordship's absence by the Lord Justice-Clerk)—The questions raised in this special case relate to the construction of the residue clause in the trust-disposition and settlement left by the deceased John Fyfe. The truster's sons have taken certain other provisions instead of sharing in the residue, and the legatees are the truster's daughters, of whom there are eight. The first parties, Mrs Duthie and Mrs Weber, are married. They were as we have seen, is to be paid to the daughters during their lives, and therefore the securing of the capital must be primarily for the benefit of the children. But it was argued that there was nothing to show the precise nature of the right to the capital which was given to the daughters. It might be an absolute and unqualified fee, the daughters to have it to a life interest, or it might be a right which depended upon the children surviving their mothers. The language used, it was contended, was consistent with either of these alternatives. I do not think the contention is well founded. It seems to me that there are strong grounds for holding that the right given to the children depended upon their survivance of their mother.

In the first place, to restrict the daughters to a life interest in the capital would be inconsistent with and repugnant to the initial gift to them of the capital. In the second place, there is no destination over of the share of the capital if the daughter survives the period of vesting but has no children. If, however, the fee is conferred upon the daughter by the initial gift, and if the subsequent directions were merely to burden that fee with a trust for the children in the event of the daughter being survived by children, there would be room for a destination over in the event of failure of children.

It therefore seems to me that this is a case of the kind of fee which in *Dale's Trustees*¹ is the most recent example, and that a fair construction of the language used is that a fee was given to the daughters, the fee to be burdened with a trust for the purpose of securing to the daughters the income of their shares during their lives, and the capital to be paid to the children who should survive them. The result would be that in the event of a daughter dying without leaving children, her share would be paid to her will, if she left one, and if not would pass to her heirs ab intestato.

For these reasons I am of opinion that as regards unmarried daughters the directions in question sufficiently disclose the intention of the testator, and I shall now consider the case of the daughters who were already married.

In the first place, it seems to me to be certain that the directions were intended to apply to all the daughters. They are introduced by the words "As regards said provisions to my daughters, I hereby appoint that the capital of the same shall not be paid to them"—words which apply to all the daughters. Then in the clause immediately following, in question the testator authorises his trustees to pay a certain portion of the capital to his daughters. The clause is in the following terms: "Notwithstanding what is before written, my trustees shall, in the event of the marriage of such daughter to pay to her, or to pay to her if already married at my death," a portion of her share not exceeding one-tenth. Now, there the testator does contemplate that a daughter may be already married at his death, and obviously there would be no objection to empowering the trustees to pay a portion of the capital to a daughter already married at that position unless the previous direction to the trustees to pay the capital was applied to daughters already married.

is one of very considerable difficulty, but I have come to t the directions are capable of being applied, as they were Mulvein v.

Murray.GEORGE MULVEIN, Pursuer (Respondent).—Mac
JOHN MURRAY, Defender (Appellant).—Wi

Contract—Pactum illicitum—Restraint of Trade—Agreement—Severability of agreement.—By agreement between Mulvein, boot and shoe factor, Maybole, and Murray, Mulvein engaged Murray as a retail traveller, salesman, and collector in his said business of boot and shoe factor, and Murray bound himself "not to sell to or to canvass for the said Mulvein's customers, or to sell or travel in any of the districts traded in by the said Mulvein for a period of twelve months from the termination of this engagement."

Murray having left Mulvein's employment, Mulvein, pursuant to the agreement, brought an action to have Murray interdicted from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any persons who were customers of Mulvein prior to the date when the defender left the pursuer's employment, from selling, travelling for, or trading in, boots and shoes in the districts specified.

The defender pleaded that the agreement founded on was unreasonable in respect that it was in restraint of trade, and was more compulsory than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the pursuer's business.

From a proof it appeared that the districts specified in the petition were the districts in which the defender had travelled during the pursuer's employment, and further that the pursuer did business in other parts of Scotland.

Held that the obligation not to sell to or canvass the pursuer's customers for a period of twelve months from the termination of the agreement was reasonable and valid.

Held further (dicta. Lord Low), that quoad ultra the obligation was unreasonable and invalid, both because the area within which the defender bound not to travel was unnecessarily wide, and because it took him bound not to travel in any trade whatsoever—Lord Low expressing the opinion that while the obligation not to travel as it stood was wide as regarded area, an obligation not to travel in the districts in which the defender had travelled was severable from the rest of the obligation, and was valid and effectual; and further, that the obligation related to the boot and shoe trade, being contained in an agreement between a boot and shoe factor and his traveller.

Lanarkshire.

ON 6th February 1905 George Mulvein, boot and shoe factor, Maybole, engaged John Murray as a retail traveller, salesman, and collector, under a minute of agreement in the following terms:—
"This minute of agreement entered into between George Mulvein, boot and shoe factor, Maybole, and John Murray, present in 1 Coral Hill, Maybole, witnesseth that the said George Mulvein hereby engages the said John Murray from the 6th day of February 1905, as a retail traveller, salesman, and collector in his said business of boot and shoe factor, . . . and this engagement shall be terminable by either party, by giving a fortnight's written notice to the other party of his intention to terminate it; and that the said John Murray binds himself not to sell to or to canvass for the said George Mulvein's customers, or to sell or travel in any of the districts traded in by the said George Mulvein for a period of twelve months from the date of the termination of this agreement.
In witness whereof," &c.

On 27th October 1906 Murray, having given the required notice, terminated his engagement with Mulvein.

In November 1906 Mulvein brought an action in the against Murray, praying the Court "to interdict the J^r selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any parties who M of the pursuer prior to 27th October 1906, and from M ng for, or trading in boots and shoes in the following ly—Cambuslang, Tollcross, Parkhead, Kinning Park, , Rutherglen Road, Tradeston, Auchencairn, and Spring- tricts traded in by the pursuer, and in particular from ollowing persons or their representatives for orders for s, namely— . . . and to grant interim interdict o ordain the defender to pay to the pursuer the sum g."

averred:—(Cond. 5) "The pursuer has learned and defender, in violation of said provision, has, since the his employment, actively canvassed for and obtained rious parties in certain of the districts specified in the petition. On leaving the yment the defender entered the service of a boot and urer in Ayr, as a commercial traveller, and in that ed and canvassed in districts in which he had travelled when he was in the pursuer's employment. In parti- der canvassed persons who were customers of the pur-

On 8th May 1907 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interdictor:—" Finds (1) that at the date of this action defender had been canvassing for orders in the districts specified in the prayer of the petition; (2) that his doing so was in contravention of his agreement with pursuer, No. 7 of process: Therefore grants interdict as craved in toto ultra assailing the defender."

The defender appealed, and argued;—(1) The clause prohibiting the defender from selling or canvassing did not specify in what capacity the defender was prohibited. That being so the clause was to be read as prohibiting the defender only in the capacity of principal and not as agent for a third party;¹ and as it was not suggested that the defender had either sold or canvassed as a principal, he had not violated the restriction, assuming it to be a valid and effectual restriction. (2) The restriction was invalid and ineffectual. Contracts in restraint of trade were not favourites of the law, but such a contract would stand if it was reasonably necessary for the protection of the interests of the person in whose favour it was granted.² Tried what standard the restriction here was bad in the first place because the prohibited area was unnecessarily wide and indefinite, and to limit the pursuer in the prayer of the petition asked the Court to do, in places where the defender had actually travelled for the pursuer, was in effect to make a new contract for the parties, which was not legitimate.³ No doubt if the restriction consisted of two separate parts, one of them bad and the other good, the bad would fall and the good would stand. Here, however, there was a single obligation not "to sell or travel in any of the towns or districts traded in by" the pursuer. In the second place the restriction was bad because it was an absolute prohibition of all trading, and not merely of the boot and shoe trade.

Argued for the pursuer;—The agreement was to be construed from the point of view of a business man.⁴ So construed, it in the first place prohibited the defender from selling and canvassing both as principal and as agent, and in the second place, it was a prohibition only against selling and canvassing in the boot and shoe trade. A more serious objection was that the agreement, as regarded the area of its operation was unreasonably wide. The soundness of that objection depended upon whether the agreement was separable into parts or must stand or fall as a whole. As regarded the obligation not to canvass any of the pursuer's customers—which meant any of the pursuer's customers as at the date when the defender left the pursuer.

that plainly and in point of expression was separable from the clause, and consequently was valid and effectual. The agreement in its terms was too wide in prohibiting the pursuer from selling or canvassing in any of the towns or districts by the pursuer, but it was legitimate to go outside the deed to ascertain the circumstances of the case; and if that were found, it could be found that there were two perfectly ascertainable areas, wider, the area of the pursuer's whole business operations, and narrower, the area in which the defender had travelled or the pursuer. That being so, the obligation was severable, and as far as applicable to the narrower area was effectual.²

JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt that in this case the restrictive obligation was for a time specified, and, in so far as it was an obligation upon the pursuer not to canvass customers, that it is valid and must be sustained. The obligation not to travel in any of the towns or districts traded in by George Mulvain for a period of twelve months is in a different position. This is an unreasonable restraint. There is an absolute want of definiteness. The word "district" seems to me to be a most indefinite expression of area. It leaves the application of the restriction to be made by the court. It may turn out that the pursuer has been in the past doing business in a particular area, but what are the limits assigned to the expression "district" is nowhere stated. I cannot but think that such a restrictive bargain should be subject to a ready and easy of interpretation, and applied with definiteness to the area to be protected.

When we come to look at the subject of agreement the same indefinite character appears. By the letter of the agreement the limitation does not apply to any particular business, but is absolutely general in its terms. It is said that the words must be read as limited to the particular trade in boots and shoes in which the defender was engaged. That would be to infer a limitation of the pursuer's future action merely from the designation of the defender's business. It seems that if the conditions agreed to were not bad, as being in restraint of trade, that the defender could have resisted a general interdict against him from trading in the prohibited places. The case of *Baker v. Baker*³ seems to militate against such a view.

It is the opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is erroneous, and should be recalled, and that the interdict should have been limited to the sale of boots and shoes to persons who were customers of the pursuer in October 1906, naming the persons stated in the prayer of the petition, and being of those persons, and that no interdict going further should be granted.

REMARKS.—This case belongs to a class which has given rise to much discussion, and to considerable diversity of judicial opinion, but the law as to such cases has been settled by the judgment of the House of Mulvein v.

Murray.

Lord Low.

I think that the result of that judgment is that the question whether the agreement entered into between the pursuer and the defender is or is not enforceable depends upon whether, in view of the circumstances, the restraint imposed upon the defender was reasonable, in the sense that it did no more than afford a fair protection to the interests of the pursuer.

In so far as the defender was taken bound not to "sell or to canvass" any of the pursuer's customers for a period of twelve months from the date of the termination of the agreement, I have no doubt that the restraint was reasonable; but more difficulty arises in regard to the additional obligation which is laid upon him not "to sell or travel in any of the towns or districts traded in" by the pursuer for the same period.

A commercial traveller becomes acquainted with his employer's customers in the district allotted to him, and he gets to know the possibilities of the district in regard to the extension of the trade in which he is engaged. I therefore think that it would be reasonable for his employer to take him bound, in the event of his employment coming to an end, not to use the knowledge which he had gained for the purpose of carrying on the same trade, either on his own account or as traveller for another, within the district in which he had acted as traveller, for such a period as might be supposed to be necessary to enable his successor to become acquainted with the customers and with the district. That I take to have been the object of the agreement in question, and if the second branch of the restraining clause had been limited to the districts in which the defender travelled, I should have thought it was reasonable. It, however, extends to "all the towns or districts traded in" by the pursuer. That is extremely wide, because although the volume of business done by the pursuer does not appear to be very large, it extends over a wide area. He says in his evidence that his business extends to Ayrshire, Renfrewshire, Lanarkshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, and Linlithgowshire, and he also says that he employs eight travellers. There is nothing in the evidence to shew that it was reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the pursuer's interests that the restriction placed upon the defender in regard to towns and districts should extend over so large an area.

The pursuer, however, only seeks to interdict the defender from selling or travelling in districts in which he was actually employed as traveller, and the question arises whether it is competent to grant an interdict so limited. The general rule is that if such an obligation is severable, that part of it which is lawful may be enforced; but if the obligation is not severable, then if it cannot be enforced to its full extent, it cannot be enforced at all, because for the Court to make a severance which the parties have not made would be to remake the contract for them.

So far as I can find, all the cases in which the obligation has been held to be severable have been cases in which the severance has been made in the contract; but, on the other hand, the cases in which the obligation has been held to be not severable have been cases in which any restriction of the generality of the obligation would be entirely arbitrary, there being no Jan. 31, 1908. data upon which a definite line could be drawn. Now, the peculiarity in Mulvein v. Murray. this case is that it supplies a perfectly definite line, dividing what is a reasonable and enforceable restriction from what is an unreasonable restriction which the Court will not enforce. Suppose that the restriction had been that the defender should not sell or travel either in the towns or districts in which he had been employed as a traveller, or in any towns or districts traded in by the pursuer, the effect of the restriction as a whole would have been exactly the same as that which was actually imposed, but it would have been plainly severable, and the pursuer would have been entitled to the interdict which he now craves. The reason why he would be entitled to that limited interdict would be that it was certain from the terms of the contract that the whole area covered by the restriction was composed of two ascertained and definite areas, namely, that in which the defender had travelled, and that in which he had not travelled but in which the pursuer had traded. Now, if from the nature of the case it is as certain that the total area is composed of these two areas as if that had appeared upon the face of the contract, I am unable to see any sufficient reason why the same result should not follow here. In neither case would the Court be making a contract for the parties which they had not themselves made, but in both they would be holding that, to an extent which was precisely ascertained, the contract was lawful and enforceable. Lord Low.

I am therefore of opinion that the application of the pursuer for an interdict limited to the districts in which the defender was employed as traveller was competent; and if so, there is no question that the facts proved entitle him to decree.

There is an argument which was strongly urged on behalf of the defender, and that was that the contract was wholly bad, in respect that in the restraining clause the kind of business which the defender was restricted from carrying on was not specified. I am of opinion that this argument cannot be sustained. In the agreement the pursuer is described as "boot and shoe factor," and the defender is described as "a retail traveller, salesman, and collector" for the pursuer, "in his said business of boot and shoe factor." The agreement, therefore, is between a boot and shoe factor and his traveller, and relates to that employment and to nothing else. That being so, it seems to me that the implication is plain that the selling, canvassing, and travelling referred to in the restraining clause relate only to the boot and shoe trade, with which alone the contract is concerned.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutor under appeal should be affirmed.

LORD ARDWALL.—Originally at common law all such agreements as that under consideration in the present case were void as being made in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy. To this general rule exceptions have been from time to time admitted in certain cases, on the ground that the restraint imposed in these cases was reasonable and proper on a consideration of the contract between the parties.

It is a question of circumstances in each particular case whether the restraint imposed is reasonable or not, and the main point to be considered

Jan. 31, 1908. in each case is whether the restraint is or is not wider than is necessary for the reasonable protection of the party desiring to enforce it.

Mulvein v.
Murray.

Lord Ardwall.

With regard to the agreement in question, I am of opinion that the first part of it in which the defender "bound himself not to sell to or to canvass any of the said George Mulvein's customers" is a valid provision, and is separable from what follows. But the contract also binds the defender not "to travel in any of the towns or districts traded in by the said George Mulvein for a period of twelve months from the date of the termination of this engagement." The limitation in time which is applicable to both the clauses I have quoted, is quite reasonable, but I am of opinion that the latter clause I have quoted imposes an unreasonable restraint upon the defender. It is too wide and too vague. For all that appears the pursuer may have traded in every district in Scotland and England too, and I may add that the word "district" is in itself a very vague term, as it is not a known geographical division of either town or country. In short, this provision leaves the defender entirely in the dark as to what towns or districts he is precluded from selling or travelling in, and so far as its terms are concerned it might embrace the whole country, should it turn out that Mulvein had traded in each district thereof, whatever that may mean. It appears that according to his own evidence his business extends to "Ayrshire, Renfrewshire, Lanarkshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, and Linlithgowshire," and he adds after this enumeration, "I have a traveller who goes to Bo'ness in Linlithgow." So apparently the pursuer seems to think if a traveller of his visits one town in a county the restriction will apply to the whole of the county; but be this as it may, I am of opinion that an agreement of this sort in restraint of trade should at least be definite and distinct, and in such terms as that the person who is coming under the restraint should know what he is binding himself to refrain from doing.

It was argued for the pursuer that this second clause might be held to be valid with regard to towns or districts which the defender had himself traded in while in the pursuer's service and invalid quoad ultra. I cannot assent to this argument. I think that to introduce such a limitation into the clause would really be to re-form the contract, and would be contrary to the law laid down in the cases of the Dumbarton Steamboat Company v. MacFarlane,¹ and Baker.²

But further, I am of opinion that the second clause I have quoted is invalid, inasmuch as it is a restraint against selling or travelling for any purpose in any of the towns or districts mentioned. Now I think it was wholly unnecessary for the protection of the pursuer that the defender should be prohibited from selling or travelling for any purpose whatever in these towns or districts, and was unreasonable in respect that the defender had a right to engage in any sort of business for himself, provided he did not interfere with the pursuer's class of business in such towns or districts.

It was pleaded for the pursuer that this clause must be held to be limited to selling boots and shoes or travelling for the purposes of the boot and shoe trade, because the pursuer is designated "boot and shoe factor" in the commencement of the agreement; and the defender is engaged as a retail salesman and collector in the said business of boot and shoe factor, Jan. 31, 1908. but I am unable to hold that the mere designation of the pursuer or the statement of the purpose for which the defender was to travel modifies the absolutely general obligation of the defender not to sell or travel at all in the towns and districts indicated, and I am of opinion that under that obligation, if valid, he might have been prevented from selling or travelling in any trade whatever.

Mulvein v. Murray.

Lord Ardwall.

I may point out that in the case of Baker,¹ where the obligation was not to carry on any business whatever, it was held to be of no moment that in the beginning of the agreement the employer was designated as "of 61 High Holborn, tailor," and the employee was designated "skilled foreman cutter and general superintendent," and the employer was not permitted, by limiting the agreement for the purposes of the action to an injunction against carrying on the business of a tailor, to render the agreement valid or the action good. It was accordingly there held that the agreement was void, and the injunction was refused. Applying that case to the present, I am of opinion that the limited restriction in the prayer of the petition against selling, travelling, or trading in boots and shoes will not render the agreement valid so as to entitle the Court to grant the limited interdict asked for; and similarly I am of opinion that the limitation of the districts, against trading in which interdict is sought, will not have the effect of rendering the agreement valid to that limited extent. I regard the obligation, as one and indivisible and not separable or restrictable in part, as suggested by the pursuer.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 8th May 1907 ought to be recalled, and that we should find that at the date of the action the defender had been canvassing the persons mentioned in the prayer of the petition, being customers of the pursuer, for orders for boots and shoes; that his doing so was in contravention of his agreement with the pursuer, and in respect that the period of twelve months fixed by the contract has now expired, should find it unnecessary to grant interdict against the defender from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any parties who were customers of the pursuer prior to 27th October 1906, and in particular from selling to or canvassing the persons specially named in the prayer of the petition or their representatives for orders for boots and shoes, and quoad ultra should assoilzie the defender.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that at the date of the action the defender had been canvassing the persons mentioned in the prayer of the petition, being customers of the pursuer, for orders for boots and shoes; that his doing so was in contravention of his agreement with pursuer; but as the twelve months referred to in the said agreement have long since expired, find it unnecessary to interdict the defender from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any parties who were customers of the pursuer prior to 27th October 1906, and in particular from Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Sched. par. (12)—Review of weekly payments—Refusal of workman to undergo surgical operation.—In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the employers prayed the arbiter under the First Schedule, par. (12), of the Act to review and end or diminish a weekly payment which was being made to a workman who had been totally incapacitated in consequence of an injury to his left hand. The following facts were proved, viz. :—That the workman's loss of the use of his left hand was caused by the removal of the third finger and the top of the thumb, the existence of pain in the palm, and the permanent curvature of the second finger into the palm ; that three doctors, who had examined the workman, recommended that the second finger should be removed, and that a nodule in the palm, which they believed to be the source of the pain, should also be removed ; that the proposed operations were simple or minor operations, not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and were likely to restore to the workman in large measure, or altogether, the use of his hand for the purpose of his former work ; that the workman refused to undergo the operations ; and that "his continued incapacity to use his left hand and any continued pain in his left palm are fairly attributable to the want of such operations."

Held by a Court of seven Judges (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Pearson) that the workman by refusing to undergo the operations had precluded himself from any right to receive further compensation.

Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

THIS was an appeal by stated case against a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) at Stirling, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between William Donnelly, appellant, and William Baird & Company, Limited, respondents.

The case set forth :—"This is an arbitration under said Act, in which the Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan at Stirling was asked to review and end or diminish a weekly payment of 7s., of which the appellant was in receipt in virtue of an agreement entered into by the appellant and the respondents on 24th May 1904.

"On 9th January 1906 the then Sheriff-substitute found that the appellant was still totally incapacitated, as the result of injuries sustained by him while in the employment of the respondents, and entitled to the weekly payment of 7s. in virtue of the agreement before mentioned. On 9th April 1907 a minute was lodged by the respondents again asking the Court to review and end or diminish the weekly payment before mentioned, and on 1st June 1907 I found (1) that the respondent (the present appellant), on or about 28th January 1903, lost the use of his left hand, in consequence of injuries sustained by him while in the employment of the petitioners (the present respondents), and that respondent still continues to be without the use of said hand ; (2) that by agreement between petitioners and respondent, entered into on or about 24th May 1904, respondent

 incapacity, and that payment thereof has been made to him up to the present time; (3) that respondent's loss of use of his left hand Donnelly v.

 or near the knuckle from which said finger was removed, and the curvature into the palm and permanent fixing in that position of the second finger; (4) that the respondent has been examined by five doctors, three of whom were asked to examine by petitioners, and that the said three doctors recommend that the crooked second finger should be removed at the knuckle, or the joint next the knuckle, and that a nodule in the palm of said hand, which they believe to be the source or centre of the pain complained of, should also be removed; (5) that said proposed operations are simple or minor operations, not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and operations likely to restore to respondent in large measure, or altogether, use of his said hand for the purpose of his former work, viz., "drawing," that is pushing, guiding, or pulling hutchies in a coal pit, or for manual work of some kind in or about a pit, or elsewhere, and to enable him to earn the same wages as before the accident, or wages to some substantial amount; (6) that respondent is of good constitution and in sound general health; (7) that he has not undergone, and refuses to undergo, such operations; (8) that his continued incapacity to use his left hand and any continued pain in his left palm are fairly attributable to the want of such operations; (9) that in these circumstances respondent is not entitled to refuse, and ought to undergo said operations,' and I continued the cause till 1st July 1907, that the respondent (now appellant) might intimate whether he was then willing to submit himself to said operations.

"On 25th July 1907 I, having further considered the cause, and in respect of respondent's (now appellant's) declinature to undergo the proposed operations, found that the compensation payable to him should then end, and granted order accordingly."

The question of law was:—"Whether the appellant by his refusal to undergo the operations has forfeited his right to receive further compensation?"

After a hearing before the Second Division (the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Stormonth-Darling, and Lord Low), the cause was appointed to be heard before seven Judges.

Argued for the appellant;—The question here was—Did a workman who had been receiving compensation under the Act forfeit the right to receive further compensation if he refused to undergo a surgical operation? The Act did not contain one word about surgical operations. Paragraph (11) of the First Schedule mentioned only the examination of workmen by a medical practitioner, and enacted that if a workman refused to submit to such examination, or in any way obstructed the same, his right to weekly payments should be suspended. The Act would surely have contained an analogous provision if it had been intended that the refusal to undergo a surgical operation should have the effect of suspending or ending the right to further compensation. The respondents were really asking the Court to impose a condition which the statute might have imposed, but had not. There was equally no statutory warrant for compelling a workman to submit to medical treatment as distinguished from a surgical operation, but there was a broad and obvious distinction between medical treatment and a surgical operation; and it might be that a workman in refusing to submit to medical treatment was acting so unreasonably as to warrant the inference that his continued incapacity was due to his refusal to submit to medical treatment. If that principle applied to surgical operations at all, it must come up to this, that the workman's refusal to undergo such an operation was totally unreasonable. It had never been held that a workman was bound to submit to a surgical operation as a condition of receiving further compensation. In *Rothwell v. Davies*¹ the Court of Appeal in England emphatically negatived such a notion. Dowds v. Bennie,² the only case in which the compensation was in fact stopped, was not really a case of surgical operation, but rather of medical treatment, and Lord Adam, who delivered the leading opinion, expressly reserved the case of "a more or less serious operation, with more or less probability of a successful case." In *Sweeney v. Pumphreton Oil Company*³ the compensation was continued notwithstanding the workman's refusal to undergo a surgical operation. In *Anderson v. Baird*⁴ the question was kept open by the award of a nominal sum, and in that case Lord Young strongly protested against the notion that a workman was bound to submit to a surgical operation as a condition of receiving further compensation. In the present case it could not be said that the appellant was unreasonable in refusing to submit to a surgical operation. The Sheriff-substitute had not so found, for finding (8) could not be read as equivalent to such a finding, and the preceding findings shewed that the appellant was not unreasonable in refusing to submit to the proposed operations. He had already lost one finger and a part of his thumb, and it was proposed to amputate another finger, and all that could be said in favour of that course was that it was "likely to restore" to him in large measure, or altogether, the use of his hand. The proposed operation might be a "minor" operation from the point of view of surgical nomenclature, but it was a serious operation from the appellant's point of view, and one that he was justified in refusing to undergo. In any case, the compensation ought not to be ended; it ought, at most, to be reduced to what the appellant would have been entitled to had the operation taken place.

Argued for the respondents;—The Act⁵ gave compensation only where the incapacity "results" from the injury, and if the incapacity had come to be due not to the injury, but to the workman's unreasonable refusal to undergo an operation, it could not be said that the continued incapacity "resulted" from the injury. No sound distinction could be drawn between medical and surgical treatment. The respondents did not suggest that a workman was bound to submit to any operation, however hazardous, however painful, and however unlikely to effect a cure. The question was one of degree—Was the workman unreasonable in refusing to submit to the proposed operation? On the facts here stated the appellant was unreasonable. The proposed operations were found to be simple operations not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and likely in large measure, if not altogether, to restore to the appellant the use of his hand. The case was ruled by *Dowds v. Bennie*² and Anderson v. Baird.⁴ In *Sweeney*³ there was a conflict of medical evidence, and in *Rothwell v. Davies*¹ the proposed operation was a dangerous one. Feb. 1, 1908.

 The proposal to reduce the compensation to what would have been payable had the operation taken place was out of the question. It would be hopeless to attempt to form a hypothetical estimate of that sort. There was no middle course between full compensation and no compensation at all.

Donnelly v.
 Baird & Co.,
 Limited.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts necessary for the consideration of this case are—(1) that by the accident suffered by the appellant his left hand was disabled, (2) that by agreement between him and the employers the respondent received compensation at the rate of 7s. weekly, (3) that he has suffered permanent loss of the third finger and part of the thumb, (4) that he still has pain at the stump of the removed finger, (5) that his second finger is fixed in a curved position into the palm. In this state of matters the respondents requested three medical men to examine the hand, and they and two other medical men examined the appellant. There is no statement in the case as to what was the opinion of these latter two medical men, the appellant not having produced their reports to the Sheriff. The three doctors employed by the respondents reported that in their opinion the second finger, or part of it, should be removed, and a nodule in the palm, from which they believed the pain proceeded, should be removed. They reported that the operations were of a simple and minor character, involving no appreciable risk or serious pain, and that what was proposed was likely to restore in large measure the use of the hand for work such as the appellant was accustomed to fulfil, or other pit manual work, enabling him to earn full or at least substantial wages, he being of sound constitution and good health.

I have thought it well in this short form to state the facts which have to be dealt with, for the question of law for decision in this case turns upon the view to be taken of them—do they or do they not justify the position taken up by the appellant, which is,—“I decline to submit to any operation, and demand compensation in respect that my present condition is one of disablement.”

The question whether a refusal to submit to skilled treatment for the restoration, whole or partial, of capacity for work is an unreasonable refusal is necessarily a question of degree. For it cannot be maintained that no matter what may be the severity of the operation recommended, or how great soever the risk to life or general health of the treatment, the workman loses right to compensation unless he brings himself to undergo the treatment and to take the risk. I think the sound view on this matter is well expressed by Lord Adam in the case of Douglas v. Bennie & Son,² when he laid it down that a workman who has been incapacitated is not bound in every case to submit to any medical or surgical treatment that is proposed, under penalty, if he refuses, of forfeiture of his right to a weekly payment—e.g., in the case where a serious surgical operation is proposed with more or less probability of a successful cure.

On the other hand, I hold it to be the duty of an injured workman to submit to such treatment, medical or surgical, as involves no serious risk or suffering, such an operation as a man of ordinarily manly character would undergo for his own good, in a case where no question of compensation due by another existed. In preparing this opinion I find that I have used almost the terms which are to be found in the case of *Anderson v. Baird & Co.*¹ These two cases which I have referred to seem to me practically to rule this case. The appellant refuses to follow the course recommended by the medical men. He has brought no counter evidence for the purpose of inducing the Sheriff to hold that the evidence led should not lead to findings in fact in accordance with that evidence. The Sheriff has found in fact in terms of that evidence, and has in consequence held in law to the same effect as was held in the cases of *Dowds*² and Anderson.¹ In that I am of opinion that he was right, and would therefore propose that the question in the case should be answered in the affirmative, except that I think the word "forfeiture" is an unfortunate one to use. A better form would be that used in *Anderson's*¹ case, that the appellant "is precluded from further insisting on his claim for weekly payments."

LORD M'LAREN.—I cannot say that I have found this case free from difficulty, but the difficulty is not so much in finding a principle of decision consistent with the statutory provisions, as in applying the principle to the facts of the case before us.

There is of course no question of compelling the party to submit to an operation. The question is whether a party who declines to undergo what would be described by experts as a reasonable and safe operation is to be considered as a sufferer from the effect of an injury received in the course of his employment, or whether his suffering and consequent inability to work at his trade ought not to be attributed to his voluntary action in declining to avail himself of reasonable surgical treatment.

In order to test the principle of decision I will suppose a more simple case. A workman whose trade requires the perfect use of both hands—a watchmaker or an instrument-maker for example—has the misfortune to break one of the bones of a finger, and from want of immediate assistance, or it may be from neglect, the bone does not unite in the proper way. The hand is disabled, but he is advised that by breaking the bone at the old fracture and resetting it the use of his hand will be completely restored. I am supposing a case where the operation is not attended with risk to health or unusual suffering, and where the recovery of the use of the hand is reasonably clear. If in such a case the sufferer, either from defect of moral courage, or because he is content with a disabled hand and is willing to live on the pittance which he is receiving under the Compensation Act, refuses to be operated on, I should have no difficulty in holding that his continued inability to work at his trade was the result of his refusal of remedial treatment, and that he was not entitled to further compensation.

Passing to the other extreme, it is easy to figure a case of internal injury where an operation, if successful, would restore the sufferer to health, but where the surgeon was bound to admit that the operation was attended with danger. In such a case it would be generally admitted that there was not only a legal but a moral right of election on the part of the injured person ; and if he preferred to remain in his disabled condition rather than incur the risk of more serious disablement or death, it could not be said that his inaction disentitled him to further compensation.

Feb. 1, 1908.
Donnelly v. Baird & Co., Limited.
Lord M'Laren.

In view of the great diversity of cases raising this question, I can see no general principle except this, that if the operation is not attended with danger to life or health, or extraordinary suffering, and if according to the best medical or surgical opinion the operation offers a reasonable prospect of restoration or relief from the incapacity from which the workman is suffering, then he must either submit to the operation or release his employers from the obligation to maintain him. In other words, the statutory obligation of the employer to give maintenance during the period of incapacity resulting from an accident is subject to the implied condition that the workman shall avail himself of such reasonable remedial measures as are within his power. I think that this statement is in accordance with all the decisions that have been given in similar cases, but in whatever way the condition is defined each case must be considered as a circumstantial case depending on the nature of the proposed operation and its probable results. I do not think that in principle any distinction can be taken between medical treatment and surgical treatment as regards the duty of the patient to co-operate with his professional advisers towards his own restoration to health and working capacity. The distinction only begins when an operation is proposed which may be attended with danger, or the results of which are not in the region of reasonable and probable success.

My difficulty in this case is that, Donnelly not being a skilled workman but a drawer of hutches in a coal pit, I can imagine that the man might honestly believe that no operation on his hand would suffice to remove the sensitiveness to pressure that at present makes him unfit for hard work. This, however, is a point which could not be overlooked by the doctors who have been consulted as to his case, and they have given their opinion that the crooked finger and the nodule in the palm of the hand should be removed, and that the operation is likely "to restore to him in large measure, or altogether, the use of his hand for the purpose of his former work," viz., drawing hutches.

In such cases a prudent and reasonable man will be guided by medical opinion rather than by his own fears ; and, without saying that the case is absolutely clear, my view is that by refusing to submit to the operation the party has disentitled himself to further payments. Any difficulty I have felt in considering the case is almost entirely removed by the consideration that nothing but good can come to this young man from the operation. Even if his hand should continue to be too tender to be useful to him in drawing hutches, it will according to medical opinion be greatly improved, and so the man will be in a more favourable position for doing work in some other occupation where the use of the left hand is not so necessary as in the work of a drawer.

I am therefore for affirming the Sheriff-substitute's determination.

LORD STORMONT-DARLING.—I concur with my brother Lord Pearson.

Feb. 1, 1908.

Donnelly v.
Baird & Co.,
Limited.LdStormonth-
Darling.

His view, and that as I understand of the rest of your Lordships, is that the question of law which the Sheriff has formulated is not quite accurately expressed, and that the proper result of his findings would not be to "forfeit" the appellant's right to receive further compensation. But even taking the case as fairly raising the question which probably the Sheriff intended to raise, viz., whether the workman by his refusal to undergo the particular surgical operation recommended by the three doctors who examined him at the request of the employers has disentitled himself from claiming further payments by way of compensation, I agree with Lord Pearson that the Sheriff's ninth finding is really a finding in law, and therefore not a finding on which the Sheriff is final. As I read the cases, both in England and Scotland, which were cited I think it has never been decided, at all events in explicit terms, that a workman's refusal to undergo a surgical operation, even of a minor kind, can be visited with a practical denial of his right to further compensation.

In *Rothwell v. Davies*¹ the English Court of Appeal negatived such a result. In Dowds v. Bennie & Son,² which was treated by the First Division as a case where the injury was comparatively slight and the treatment proposed simple and common (principally passive movements and massage), and therefore was treated as one where the present condition of the limb was truly due to the injured man's own fault and neglect, yet Lord Adam, in delivering the leading judgment, said that cases might easily be figured of "a more or less serious operation" being proposed where it would be out of the question to say that the workman was bound to submit to it. Even in Anderson's case³ refusal to undergo a "simple operation" as disentitling the workman to a continuance of substantial compensation was (diss. Lord Young) avoided by allowing the matter to be kept open by only awarding him a nominal sum. Lastly, in *Sweeney*⁴ refusal of the workman to undergo a surgical operation which had been recommended by the employers' doctors as disentitling him to further compensation was distinctly negatived in deference to a contrary opinion by a surgeon of eminence.

Therefore I think I am well founded in saying that there is not a single case in either England or Scotland laying down in explicit terms the rule for which the employer here contends, even with regard to a minor surgical operation, however probable the success of it may be. But as Lord Pearson and I are in a minority, it is unnecessary to consider what the practical consequences would be of giving effect to our view.

LORD PEARSON (whose opinion was, in his Lordship's absence, read by the Lord Justice-Clerk).—I agree in the view that the question of law which the Sheriff has formulated is not accurately expressed, and that the proper result of his findings is not to "forfeit" the appellant's right to receive further compensation. But I desire to add that on the question which I think the Sheriff intended to raise, and which was fully argued to us, my opinion is entirely in favour of the appellant. I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff's first seven findings in fact do not warrant the eighth finding, which is that "the appellant's continued incapacity to use his left hand, and any continued pain in his left palm, are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." It appears to me that the principles laid down in the cases of *Dowds*¹ and of *Sweeney*² lead to the opposite conclusion, and that the Sheriff's ninth finding, that in these circumstances the appellant "is not entitled to refuse, and ought to undergo said operations"—which is really a finding in law—is not maintainable. I cannot hold the appellant to be unreasonable in his refusal to submit to the amputation of a finger. I admit, however, the difficulty of giving effect to this view, having regard to the terms of the eighth finding, which is a finding in fact, and is not before us for review, and which, when fairly construed, imports that the conduct of the appellant in refusing to submit to the operation is so unreasonable as to disentitle him to further compensation.

Donnelly v.
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Pearson.

LORD ARDWALL—I am of opinion that the question of law submitted in this case should be answered in the affirmative, with the alteration suggested by your Lordship in the chair.

The compensation at the rate of 7s. a week which has hitherto been received by the appellant under an agreement entered into in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, has been paid and received under the provisions contained in the First Schedule of the said Act, section 1 (b), which apply to cases where "total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury." It is stated by the Sheriff-substitute that certain simple and safe operations would remove the appellant's incapacity to work, and in the eighth finding it is stated that "the appellant's continued incapacity to use his left hand, and any continued pain in his left palm, are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." Accepting this as a fact, it appears that now the appellant's incapacity for work does not result from the injury which he received in 1903, but from his refusal to submit to the said operations, and this being so, compensation is no longer payable in respect of incapacity for work resulting from an injury, and the payment thereof ought to come to an end.

But the appellant pleads that he is not bound to submit to the operations in question, and it was contended by his counsel that no person is bound to submit to an operation in such circumstances as the present against his will, however simple such operation may be, and that if a person in the position of the appellant chooses to take his stand on the ground that he objects to an operation on account of the pain or risk involved in it, he is the sole judge and ought not to be forced by the decision of a Court of law into the alternative of either submitting to an operation or forfeiting the compensation which otherwise he is by law entitled to. This raises a question of general importance, but one which has not now to be considered for the first time.

Three cases involving this question have been already under consideration of the Court—Dowds v. Bennie & Son,¹ Anderson v. Baird & Company,² and Sweeney v. Pumphreston Oil Company.³ I think the result of these decisions is that no general rule can be laid down, but that each case must

Feb. 1, 1908. be determined upon its own circumstances, the questions for consideration in each case, generally speaking, being (1) Whether the operation is a simple or a difficult one? (2) Whether it is attended with serious risk? (3) Whether if performed it will attain the end in view by diminishing or putting an end to the injured person's incapacity for work? (4) Whether it is or is not an operation involving much pain, and if it does involve much pain whether there is serious risk to be encountered by the use of anæsthetics during the operation? And (5) What is the opinion of medical men as to the advisability of the operation?

Donnelly v.
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Ardwall.

Now, in the present case the Sheriff-substitute has found (1) the "proposed operations are simple or minor operations"; (2) that they are "not attended with appreciable risk"; (3) that they are "likely to restore to respondent in large measure, or altogether, use of his said hand for the purpose of his former work"; (4) that the proposed operations are "not attended with . . . serious pain," and that the respondent is of good constitution and in sound general health, from which I infer that there would be no danger to him from the use of anæsthetics; (5) that the respondent has been examined by five doctors, and that three of these doctors recommend that the operations should be performed. Nothing is said with regard to the other two doctors who examined the respondent at his own instance, and I therefore conclude that it must be taken upon the facts as stated that these doctors either did not express any opinion or that if they did their opinion was that they could not state any objections to the operations proposed.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has come to a sound conclusion on the facts of the case; that the appellant has shewn no reasonable cause why he should not undergo the operations in question; and that his refusal to do so disentitles him to a continuance of the compensation which he has hitherto received.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships. The real point at issue in each case of this kind is, I apprehend, whether the workman's incapacity arises from the accident which befel him or only from his own subsequent unreasonable conduct. If the latter is the fact, the workman must take the consequences of his conduct. I think we must assume from what is set forth in this stated case that there was no conflict of opinion among the medical men consulted on both sides as to the nature or the probable effect of the proposed operations. Now, the Sheriff-substitute has found, among other things, that these are "simple or minor operations, not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and operations likely to restore to respondent in large measure, or altogether, use of his said hand for the purpose of his former work"—which was of a very simple nature; that the respondent "is of good constitution and in sound general health"; and that "his continued incapacity to use his left hand and any continued pain in his left palm are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." In this state of matters, it appears to me that a reasonable man would submit to these operations; and that, as the respondent deliberately declines to do so his conduct is unreasonable, and his compensation must be ended. I agree, therefore, with the conclusion at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived; but I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the question stated for our determination is not as it stands in proper form. Feb. 1, 1908.

The Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that LORD LOW, who was absent, concurred with the majority of the Court.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in answer to the question of law stated that the appellant has by refusing to undergo the operation to his left hand precluded himself from any right to receive further compensation: Therefore answer said question of law in the affirmative: Affirm the dismissal of the claim by the arbitrator."

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1 (1)—Accident arising "out of the employment."—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 1 (1), enacts, that if in any employment to which the Act applies "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman" his employer shall be liable to pay compensation. Burley v. Baird & Co., Limited.

Smith and Paton, two drawers in a coalpit, were sitting in a hutch, Smith driving the horse. In passing near the working place of another drawer, Burley, Paton took hold of a hutch Burley had been using and pulled it after him. Burley followed and in endeavouring to recapture his hutch pushed Paton with a prop. Paton then threw some rubbish at Burley; in avoiding the rubbish Burley struck his head against a projection on the wall and was injured.

Burley having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, held (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) that although the accident arose in the course of Burley's employment, it did not arise out of it within the meaning of sec. 1 (1) of the Act.

JAMES BURLEY, miner, Galston, claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from his employers, William Baird & Company, Limited, and instituted arbitration proceedings under that Act against them in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock. The Sheriff-substitute (J. Mackenzie) having awarded compensation, the employers appealed. 2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Ayrshire.

The Sheriff-substitute, in the stated case for appeal, found the following facts proved, namely:—"That the pursuer is a drawer and was employed in the defenders' Maxwood Pit, Galston, which is a mine within the meaning of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; that on 31st May 1907 while in the course of his employment in said pit he sustained an injury to his eye: that two other lads named Smith and Paton, who were also drawers in said pit, were taking an empty hutch to their own working place, Smith sitting on the front of said hutch and driving the horse, while Paton was sitting on the back of the hutch; that on passing the entrance to pursuer's working place Smith and Paton found a hutch which pursuer had brought there for his own use, and that said hutch contained a tree or wooden prop about seven feet long: that Smith and Paton took possession of this hutch and proceeded to carry it along with them by Paton holding it with his hands while he continued to sit on the first hutch ; that when they had passed through a trap-door near at hand, the pursuer, returning to his place, found the hutch gone and went in pursuit of Smith and Paton to recover it ; that the pursuer passed through the trap-door after them and coming up to the hutch in which there was the said wooden prop he raised the end of this prop and pushed it with some force against the front of Paton's body in order to detach the hutch in dispute from his grasp ; that Paton resenting this took up a handful of dust or rubbish and threw it at the pursuer ; that in avoiding this missile the pursuer struck his head against a rough or projecting part of the side of the narrow passage in which they were and received the said injury."

On these facts the Sheriff-substitute found that the accident arose out of and in the course of the respondent's employment, and that the appellants were liable in compensation.

The question of law was :—" Whether, on the facts proved, the personal injury to the respondent was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 ? "

The case was heard before the Second Division on 22d January 1908.

Argued for the defenders and appellants ;—The workman was not entitled to compensation unless the accident arose not only in the course of, but also out of, the employment. The injury must result from something which was a risk incident to the man's work.¹ The accident here did not arise " out of " the employment. It arose out of a scuffle between the workman and his fellow-workman. An injury arising in such a scuffle was not a risk incident to work in a mine. The fact that the dispute which originated the scuffle arose out of the work did not make an injury arising out of the scuffle an accident arising out of the work.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent ;—It was not disputed here that the injury was due to accident happening at a place where the Act applied and in the course of the employment. But it was said that it did not arise out of the employment. That was not so. The controversy and scuffle which caused the injury arose out of the employment. The object of the workman, in acting as he did, was the carrying out of his master's work. The fact that in pursuance of that object he acted violently and improperly did not deprive him of his right to compensation. This case was ruled by M'Intyre v. Rodger & Co.,² where, as here, the scuffle arose out of the employment. *Falconer*³ and Armitage,⁴ cited by the defenders, were distinguishable. There the accident arose from something which was not done in the course of the employment, but which was outside of it altogether. The employment had really ceased for the time. As far as the pursuer himself was concerned the injury here was undoubtedly a pure accident. The fact that it was caused by an intentional criminal act

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I have come to an opposite opinion from that arrived at by the Sheriff-substitute. The facts as stated by him are that two other men in the mine where the pursuer was employed carried off a hutch which the pursuer had brought to his own working place, by one of them sitting on their own hutch, which was in motion, and holding the pursuer's hutch by hand; that on the pursuer going forward and endeavouring to get possession of his hutch by pushing a prop against the man who held it, so as to detach his hold, the other man took up a handful of rubbish out of the hutch and threw it at the pursuer, who, in avoiding being struck in the face by it, brought his head against the side of the passage and was injured. He was naturally alarmed by the other man's action, fearing to receive an injury by being struck by what was thrown, which might be a hard substance.

I am unable to hold that this injury was one arising out of, or in the course of, the pursuer's employment. What caused the injury was not in any sense an accident, but was a fault by a wrongdoer, who was acting in a wilful and unjustifiable manner, and the injury was caused by this wrongful personal act. It was not an accident occurring in the course of work. If a person throws a stone to strike another, and injures him, the fact that both the men are workmen in the place of work where the injury is done will not make the injury one for which the master must pay compensation.

I am therefore of opinion that the question in the stated case should be answered in the negative.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I have the misfortune to differ from your Lordship. There is no dispute that personal injury by accident was here caused to a workman in the course of his employment; and the Sheriff-substitute, holding that the injury arose out of, as well as in the course of, his employment, has awarded him compensation in terms of the Act. The sole question is whether the Sheriff was right in holding that the accident arose out of the employment. I am of opinion that he was, and therefore I should be in favour of sustaining his award.

The injury was to the workman's eye, and it was sustained by the man striking his head against a rough or projecting part of the side of the narrow passage through which he was then passing. No doubt he sustained this injury in trying to avoid a handful of dust or rubbish which another workman in the pit had thrown at the pursuer. And the Sheriff tells us very clearly how this came about. It seems to me that one difficulty in reversing a finding which the statutory arbitrator has come to on the facts—especially when he is so sound and sensible a judge of evidence as we know from repeated experience this arbitrator to be—is that, in a matter like this, a very little difference in the precise mode of stating the facts may make all the difference in the proper conclusion to be drawn from them. Now I take the facts as stated here to be that the lads, who were all

Feb. 7, 1908. "drawers" in the pit, were not engaged in "horseplay" or anything of the nature of a "lark" at all, but were going about their proper business in the pit, though the lads called Smith and Paton had been guilty of a bit of mischief in carrying off a hutch which belonged to the pursuer—in the case, as I think the Sheriff-substitute must have taken it, on the footing that Paton, in throwing the handful of dust or rubbish, was the aggressor.

sense that he was entitled to the use of it—and that Paton was certainly in the wrong in throwing the handful of dust or rubbish at the pursuer, though the act might be very far short of a criminal act, as was suggested in the course of the discussion. To that extent I am willing to take the case, as I think the Sheriff-substitute must have taken it, on the footing that Paton, in throwing the handful of dust or rubbish, was the aggressor.

But is it the law that the moment you find that an injury sustained by a workman dutifully engaged in doing his master's work at the time when he received the injury was caused at some link in the chain of causation by the act of a fellow-workman, the employer is relieved of all liability under the act? I put the question in that form because the proximate cause—the causa causans—of the injury in this case was the striking of the pursuer's head against the projecting part of the narrow passage. If there had been no projection, there would have been no injury. But I am willing to take the case on the footing that what caused the pursuer to duck his head was the throwing of the missile. Even so, is it the law, taking the decisions both in England and Scotland as a whole, that the circumstance of the injury being caused, though not immediately caused, by the act of a fellow-workman, has the effect of relieving the employer from liability? Now, I must rather demur to decisions about a necessarily different set of facts being taken as if they ruled or governed the particular set of facts which are found by the arbitrator, and on which, so far as they are facts and not law, he is final. At all events these decisions can only be so taken so far as they can be said to lay down some definite or consistent rule of law.

What, then, are the decisions which are said to have this effect? There is first the case of Falconer,¹ as to which I must be allowed to say that it was the judgment of two Judges of this Division, against one, Lord Young being absent and Lord Moncreiff dissenting. In the subsequent case of *M'Intyre*² Lord Young, at p. 178, confessed that he would have had very great difficulty in agreeing with the judgment in the case of Falconer,¹ and said that if he had been present he would have been disposed to concur with Lord Moncreiff. That learned Judge admitted in Falconer's case¹ that the result might have been different if the proximate cause of the accident had been something wholly outwith the employment; and his Lordship's dissent was based on the ground, for which at least there was a great deal to be said, that the injured workman was engaged at his work, while the workman who caused the injury was engaged in something wholly different—viz., horseplay.

I admit that *Falconer*¹ was approved of in the English case of Armitage,³ in which it was decided that a workman who was injured through the tortious act of a fellow-workman, which had no relation whatever to their employment, had no claim against the employer, because the injury did not arise out of the employment. The case was one of "larking" pure and simple, because the piece of iron which was thrown by one boy at another missed that other and injured the claimant. The accident was therefore treated as a tortious act, "having no relation whatever to the employment"; these are the very words of the present Master of the Rolls. I do not think, for the reason I have given, that that could be said of the accident in the present case.

Burley v. Baird & Co., Limited.
LdStormonth-Darling.

But what is to be said of the subsequent case of *M'Intyre*¹ in this Court? I greatly doubt whether the case of *Armitage*² would have been decided as it was if the English Court of Appeal had had the case of *M'Intyre*¹ before it, which it could not have, because it was later in date than Armitage.² At all events, I think we are not bound, in deference to an English decision, to disregard a judgment of our own Courts. There the injury to the workman complaining was held to be one arising out of and in the course of his employment, though it was the direct result of a forcible act—pulling a brush out of the hand of the injured workman, which drew his hand across the sharp surface of a piece of machinery which was near, and so cutting his hand. Your Lordship in the chair, who had been one of the majority of this Court in Falconer's case,³ distinguished that case from *M'Intyre's*¹ by pointing out that the workman whose act was the immediate cause of the injury had no intention of injuring M'Intyre; and Lord Trayner, who had been the other member of the majority, drew practically the same distinction, for he said that the act, however careless it was, might still be properly described as "incidental to the employment." That was undoubtedly a "fine distinction," as was admitted by your Lordship in the chair in M'Intyre's case¹; and I cannot doubt that the presence of Lord Young and Lord Moncreiff had something to do with the difference in result. But if the intention of the man who caused the injury had anything to do with the effect in law, what is to be said of Armitage's case,² where there was no bad intention, for the man who threw the missile hit the wrong man?

What, again, is to be said of the later English case of Challis v. London and South-Western Railway?⁴ There, a stone wilfully dropped on a train by a boy from an overhead bridge injured the driver of the train, and it was held to be an accident arising out of as well as in the course of the employment, because it was a matter of common knowledge and experience, in the opinion of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal, that boys should throw stones at passing trains; and therefore they held it to be a risk incidental to the employment of an engine-driver, although it was a matter over which the company had no control. But it was none the less a tortious act committed by a bystander, and, therefore, if the element of tort was to decide the question whether an act was, or was not, to relieve the employer from liability, I do not see why the employer in that case should have been held liable. The case of *M'Intyre*¹ does not appear to have been cited in Challis's case,⁴ although the older case of *Falconer*³ was.

On the whole matter I do not think that the cases cited, when viewed as

If there be any coherent rule of law derivable from the cases, it must be subject to so many exceptions as practically to deprive it of all value as a working rule. For it can be no more than this, that an injury may arise out of, as well as in the course of, the employment, although the act which causes the injury may be the act of a fellow-workman or of a bystander, whether malicious or not, and may have no relation to the employment, except that it is one of the risks to which the injured workman is bound to submit, as being a risk incidental to the employment in which he is engaged.

Burley v.

LORD LOW.—I am of opinion, in the first place, that it is immaterial that the injury which Burley sustained was occasioned not by his being struck by the missile which Paton threw at him, but by his head coming in contact with some projection when he was avoiding the missile. The question, in my judgment, would have been the same if the missile had struck him and caused the injury.

The question is whether the accident was one "arising out of" the employment, because it is not disputed that it arose "in the course of" the employment.

There are two decisions in which the meaning of the words "arising out of" the employment has been construed in reference to circumstances closely approaching those of the present case. The one is Falconer v. London and Glasgow Engineering and Shipbuilding Company, Limited,¹ which was decided in this Division, and the other is Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company,² which was decided in the Court of Appeal in England.

With the exception perhaps of Lord Moncreiff, the learned Judges in both of these cases took substantially the same view of the meaning and effect of the words "arising out of" the employment, and I think that the result may be accurately stated thus:—If an accident occurs by reason of a danger which is incidental to the employment the workman will be entitled to compensation, but he will not be entitled to compensation if the accident is caused by something done by a fellow-workman outside the scope of the employment.

Now, for a workman to throw something at another is not a danger which is incidental to employment in a coal mine, and it is certainly an act which is entirely outside of the scope of the employment. I am accordingly of opinion that the question of law should be answered in the negative.

LORD ARDWALL.—The accident which gives rise to this case was a very regrettable one, but the question which the Court has to decide is whether, in the words of section 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the accident was one "arising out of and in the course of the employment" in which the workman was engaged. There is no question that it arose in the course of his employment, but the difficulty is with regard to the additional condition which must be established in order to entitle him to com-

I am of opinion that it did not, for the reason that it arose directly from the boy Paton throwing a handful of dust or rubbish at the pursuer, in avoiding which the pursuer suffered the injury complained of. It was certainly no part of Paton's employment to throw a missile at any of his fellow-workmen, nor was his doing so a risk incidental to the pursuer's employment which the employers might be supposed to have undertaken the chance of when they employed him. On the contrary, the throwing of the missile in question was a gratuitous piece of mischievous folly on the part of the boy Paton, and I cannot hold that it was such a piece of folly as is common among boys employed in mines.

Burley v.

Baird & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Ardwall.

I may add that in my opinion the present question is covered by decided cases, for I am unable to distinguish it, so far as principle is concerned, from the cases of *Falconer*¹ and Armitage.² The latter case was very similar to the present, for there a boy named Smith pushed another boy named Harrop into a pit, and Harrop becoming angry picked up a piece of iron and threw it at Smith. It missed Smith and hit Armitage on the eye, causing him considerable injuries, and there it was held that Armitage had no claim against the employers.

In the case of Challis,³ where an engine-driver was injured by being struck by the glass of the screen of the engine which had been broken by a stone wilfully dropped on a train by a boy from a bridge, the employers were held liable on the ground that the risk of mischievous boys discharging missiles from bridges was a risk incidental to the employment of an engine-driver, and that the accident accordingly arose out of the employment, but I do not think that case can be held to apply to the present, because, as I have already said, the throwing of missiles by boys or others in mines is not, according to common experience, a risk incidental to a miner's employment.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the accident arose, not out of the employment in which the pursuer was engaged, but out of the mischievous and illegal act on the part of the boy Paton, and that accordingly the only remedy he can have is against the wrongdoer, and not against his employers.

THE COURT found in answer to the question of law that the injury to the respondent was not one arising out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; recalled the award of the arbitrator, and remitted to him to dismiss the claim, and decerned.

Rudman v.
Jay & Co.

Reparation—Wrongous use of Diligence—Imprisonment—Decree ad factum præstandum—Decree for delivery of furniture sequestrated for rent—Diligence—Malicious use of Diligence—Averments of Malice.—J. & Co. took decree in absence against R. for delivery of furniture obtained by him from them under a hire purchase agreement, the instalments due under the agreement not having been paid, and thereafter on 13th May 1907—in the knowledge that the furniture had been sequestrated for rent by R.'s landlord, and that decree of cessio had been pronounced against R.—applied for and obtained a warrant upon which R. was imprisoned on 14th May 1907.

In an action by R. against J. & Co. for damages for wrongous imprisonment on the ground that J. & Co. at the date when they put the warrant in force knew that it was impossible for R. to give delivery of the furniture, held that, notwithstanding the sequestration and the cessio, the defenders were entitled to enforce the decree by imprisonment; and that the pursuer having been imprisoned under a warrant legally obtained and executed, the defenders, in the absence of relevant averments of malice, were entitled to absolvitor.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

TREVOR INGLIS RUDMAN, civil engineer, Edinburgh, brought an action against Jay & Company, cabinetmakers and furniture dealers, Glasgow, in which he concluded for payment of £1500 as damages for wrongous arrestment and imprisonment on a warrant to imprison obtained after an expired charge ad factum præstandum.

The following summary of the circumstances in which the action was brought is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Johnston):—"The pursuer Rudman states that in November 1905 he obtained from the defenders Jay & Company, cabinetmakers, Glasgow, upon a hire and purchase agreement, No. 7 of process, certain articles of furniture which in November 1906 were still in his possession, and constituted the whole plenishing of his house, 12 Inverleith Gardens, Edinburgh. At the latter date the pursuer was in arrear both with the rent of his house and with the instalments due under the hire and purchase contract. Accordingly, on 20th November 1906, his landlord sequestrated the furniture in said house for rent past due and to become due. There was included in the inventory under this sequestration the whole of the articles belonging to the defenders, and possessed by the pursuer under said hire and purchase contract. They remained under the sequestration till a point of time posterior to the circumstances upon which this action of damages is founded. The pursuer next states that, in the end of November and after the landlord's sequestration had attached, the defenders, as they were entitled to do, he being in arrear with the instalments under the hire and purchase contract,* sent their representative with a wagon to his, the pursuer's, house to remove their furniture, but that, on his wife informing him of the landlord's sequestration, and exhibiting to him the schedule of sequestration, their representative declined to intermeddle with the furniture. The pursuer further states that on 20th November 1906 one of his creditors presented a petition for

* By the third article of the hire purchase agreement the defenders were entitled to retake possession of the goods let for hire if any of the payments for hire should remain unpaid for one month after becoming due.

cessio against him in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, on which decree of cessio was pronounced on 22d January 1907. The pursuer alleges that in consequence of the said decree of cessio he left his house at Inverleith Gardens, leaving the furniture in question in it, and informed the trustee in his cessio that he had done so. . . .

Feb. 7, 1908.
Rudman v.
Jay & Co.

"In these circumstances, the defenders, on 4th February 1907, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against the pursuer for decree, ordaining him to deliver the articles of furniture in question to them. That the pursuer was personally served with this summons he impliedly admits, as he alleges that he handed the citation to the trustee in his cessio, and did not himself defend the action. It is common ground that the trustee in the cessio was sisted in this action, and, for his interest, consented to decree being pronounced as concluded for, and that decree in absence was pronounced against the pursuer, with £18, 1s. 10d. of taxed expenses. On 3d May 1907 the defenders gave the pursuer a charge on the decree, and he, not having implemented the decree, they, on 13th May, applied for a warrant of imprisonment, which they obtained on the same day and executed on 14th May 1907, and the pursuer was imprisoned accordingly. He at once presented a note of suspension and liberation, when the defenders consented to liberation, and the note was dismissed, the Lord Ordinary finding the respondents, the present defenders, entitled to expenses. These expenses have not been paid."

The pursuer averred that on 11th May 1907 he by letter requested the defenders "to let him know if they intended to enforce the charge" on the decree for delivery of the furniture "by imprisonment, so that he might suspend the charge before they took that step"; and that "the defenders did not acknowledge this letter, and did not inform the pursuer that they were to imprison him," but without further warning applied to the Sheriff for a warrant. (Cond. 9) "At the time of obtaining and executing the said warrant, implement by the pursuer of the said decree was, to the knowledge of the defenders, impossible, and arrest and imprisonment of the pursuer was wrongously and unjustifiably caused by the defenders. The defenders knew that the pursuer could not personally give delivery, as he was not in possession. The defenders, after notice of the transfer of possession to the trustee by the decree of cessio, were bound to take delivery in his hands, but the defenders have refused to take such delivery. The defenders also arrested and imprisoned the pursuer under the said warrant in the knowledge that the pursuer could not intermeddle with the said articles without being guilty of contempt of Court, both for breach of poinding and for breach of the decree of cessio. The defenders also acted in bad faith in imprisoning the pursuer. He intimated to them that he wished to suspend the decree and charge if they were to enforce the charge by imprisonment, and he relied on their answering his letter of 11th May in order to do so. No answer of any kind was sent. The defenders in hiring the furniture undertook the risk of its being sequestrated under the landlord's hypothec, and of its being affected by the pursuer's bankruptcy, and the liability of the pursuer under the said agreement was qualified by that fact as an implied condition thereof, and the defenders were not entitled to execute the said warrant after the sequestration and cessio. Further, the use of the said diligence was an unwarrantable device to force the pursuer to pay his rent, and when it was no longer possible for him to do so, the defenders persisted in the said diligence, and the arrest and imprisonment of the pursuer was part of a scheme to annoy and injure the pursuer. It was not diligence carried out in good faith to enforce the said decree, but imprisonment used to compel payment of rent, and it was due to malice, and was without probable cause."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having wrongously arrested and imprisoned the pursuer, are liable in damages as craved. (2) The pursuer having been arrested and imprisoned by the defenders maliciously and without probable cause, and having sustained loss and damage thereby, is entitled to be compensated therefor, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (4) The pursuer having been arrested and imprisoned under a legal warrant regularly obtained and executed, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor.

By interlocutor dated 18th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary allowed the parties a proof of their averments.*

* "OPINION.—(After the narrative quoted supra)—The present action is for damages for wrongous imprisonment. To the relevancy of the action the defenders object. They maintain that they acted within their legal rights; that they personally served this action on the pursuer, and, he not opposing, obtained the decree of a competent Court, and followed up that decree by legal and competent diligence, everything being done regularly and with judicial authority. And they maintain further that there can be no actionable wrong in following out a legal right (Allen v. Flood, L. R., [1898] A. C. 1) and that it is no answer on the part of the pursuer that it was impossible for him to implement the decree, without breach of the standing sequestration, for it was always open to him to pay his rent and free the sequestered articles from the nexus laid on by the landlord. They say that there can be no wrong in putting a man in prison on a competent decree, followed by a competent warrant of imprisonment, though there may be good ground, in the discretion of the Court, for letting him out, if he applies in the recognised way for liberation.

"I agree with the defenders that their case is quite different from that of a defender who has proceeded on ex parte diligence. I also discard consideration of certain averments of the pursuer founded on his cessio. His cessio, there being no divestiture by disposition omnium bonorum, or even possession given to and taken by the trustee, was no bar to the pursuer implementing the decree. The effect of cessio and of sequestration are quite different in the matter of divestiture of the bankrupt and investiture of the trustee (Simpson v. Jack, 16 R. 131). Still I am not able to sustain the defenders' contention, as I think their argument misses the true ground of action.

"The case of Graham v. Dundas, 7 S. 876, indeed lays down in unmistakable terms that if a party has 'right to obtain decree, he must also be entitled to enforce that decree by the forms and executorials allowed by law,' without being liable in damages. This was followed in Aitken v. Finlay, 15 S. 683. In both these cases the original decrees were found ultimately to have been erroneous on the merits, but it was held that this did not give relevancy to the claim. In Bell v. Gunn, 21 D. 1008, the same conclusion was arrived at, though the decree, which was the foundation of the diligence, was found not erroneous on the merits, but on a technical objection to the instance, which had not been stated by the defender, who made no appearance, though personally cited. See also Kinnes v. Adam & Sons, 9 R. 698, and other cases referred to. But in Wolthecker v. Northern

The defenders reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 29th January and 7th February 1908. Feb. 7, 1908.

Argued for the defenders and reclaimers;—A warrant of imprisonment on a decree ad factum præstandum was a warrant issued in ordinary course, and necessarily following such a decree if asked. It followed upon a decree which implied a right to demand such a warrant. A decree ad factum præstandum could not be enforced in any other way than by imprisonment. The defenders, therefore, were in the position of having merely used their legal right. A person who had done no more than exercise his legal right of enforcing a decree of Court by the ordinary and proper executorial could not be made liable in damages for so doing.¹ There was here no flaw in the execution of the diligence. It was perfectly regular in itself. That could not be disputed. But it was said that imprisonment could not legally follow on a decree ad factum præstandum if performance was Rudman v.

Jay & Co.

Agricultural Company, 1 Macph. 211, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) predicates an important condition to the freedom from consequences of the litigant who uses any legal right or remedy to which he is absolutely entitled, in these words, 'unless he was shewn to have resorted to it maliciously and without probable cause,' and less definitely where he speaks of such litigant using 'his legal right moderately and in good faith.'

"It is there that the true case of the pursuer arises. He cannot and does not object to the defenders having taken decree against him, nor can he object to their following up the decree by personal diligence per se, but he does object to their doing so in the circumstances in which they and he found themselves, which he says was not the following out their legal rights moderately and in good faith, but oppressively and maliciously.

"What then are the circumstances alleged? The defenders were apprised of the sequestration. Apart from averments of special intimation at an earlier date, they admit that they did learn of the subsistence of the sequestration on 12th May 1907, the day on which they applied for their warrant for imprisonment, and two days before they executed it. They also knew at the time, 19th March 1907, when they took the decree, which was the foundation for the warrant to imprison, that the pursuer was under cessio, for the trustee was a consenting party for his interest to their taking such decree. They must further be held to have known that it was an incident of their contract of hire and sale, of which they took the risk, that their furniture in the pursuer's possession would be subject to the hypothec of the pursuer's landlord. They must therefore have known that their debtor, the pursuer, could not, unless he was able to pay the rent, implement the decree without breach of the landlord's sequestration, and that being a bankrupt under cessio he could not be expected to pay the rent in order to release the furniture. This seems to me a relevant averment to distinguish the case from the general rule of Graham v. Dundas and the other cases above quoted, and from which it is possible to infer the malice which is averred.

"I do not think that it is necessary to follow the interesting argument which the defenders maintained, on the question whether the impossibility of fulfilment excused from contract liability (Gillespie & Company v. Howden & Company, 12 R. 800; Jones v. St John's College, Oxford, L. R., 6 Q. B. 115; Lord Clifford v. Watts, L. R., 5 C. P. 577). There are cases impossible. There was no impossibility in the pursuer's obtempering the decree. There was no physical impossibility. The only difficulty consisted in the pursuer's inability to pay his rent. That did not amount to impossibility of performance in any sense which could have any relevance here. Further, a cessio did not attach acquirenda, so that cessio in January did not necessarily imply inability to pay rent in May. In any view, the pursuer could not in this case found on the impossibility of performance, because he had allowed decree to go against him in absence. A person who had so allowed decree to go against him was in the same position as a person who had contracted to do something impossible.¹ It did not make the pursuer's case any better to aver that the defenders acted maliciously. For if they acted legally it could not make any difference whether or not they acted maliciously. A legal act could not give rise to an action of damages because it was done maliciously.² But apart from that there were no relevant averments of malice. The case of Wolthecker v. Northern Agricultural Company,³ dealt with arrestment on the dependence, and not with diligence in execution of a final decree.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—1. The rule with regard to responsibility for the use of diligence was (1) that where a diligence followed in ordinary course of process, and was granted as part of the ordinary executorial, without the necessity of any ex parte statement or representation to the Court, as in the case of arrestment on the dependence, the party using it was not liable in damages, although it was ultimately found that the decree on which it proceeded was erroneous, unless he acted maliciously and not in the bona fide exercise of his rights; (2) that where a diligence was only granted upon an ex parte statement or representation to the Court, as in the case of interim interdict or a meditatione fugæ warrant, it was granted periculo petentis, and if such statement or representation was not strictly accurate, the party using the diligence so granted was liable in damages, even in which undoubtedly it does not. But they depend on the terms of the contract and the cause of the impossibility. But while in many such cases the impossibility of performance will form no defence to an action for breach, it would, I think, form an adequate defence to an action for specific implement, and even if a decree for specific implement was obtained, I think it would be a very dangerous proceeding to attempt to enforce it by personal diligence.

"The case is in some of its aspects not unlike that of Bottger v. The Globe Furnishing Company, decided by me in June 1906, 14 S. L. T. 117, to the judgment in which I refer. But I desire to add that I had not the benefit in that case of such a full argument and such an exhaustive citation of authority, and to admit that consideration of the question of malice, to which no argument was addressed, escaped me. I understand that the case did not go further.

"I am unable, as I think there is a sufficient foundation laid for the pursuer's averment of malice, to sustain the defenders' plea to the relevancy. The action must therefore go to proof. But I do not think that in the exercise of my discretion I should send the case to a jury. There are, to my mind, several reasons why it will be better disposed of by a proof before a Judge."

although he acted bona fide and without malice.¹ 2. The diligence here belonged to the latter class. Formerly it required letters of caption proceeding on a bill. It still required to be specially applied for upon an ex parte statement, and could only be granted if there was no lawful cause to the contrary.² Application for it in this case involved an implied repetition of the statement on which the decree was obtained, viz.:—That the furniture was in the pursuer's possession, and that he was bound to deliver it but refused to do so. That statement was erroneous. The pursuer could not deliver it, for it was in manibus curiæ, and he was divested of his estate by the cessio. A decree of cessio transferred the property of the bankrupt at the date of the cessio to his trustee. Further, the pursuer was not bound to redeliver the furniture when it had been sequestrated for rent. The obligation to redeliver was qualified by and subject to the landlord's right of hypothec. The warrant having been therefore obtained upon erroneous statements the defenders were liable in damages whether they acted maliciously or not. 3. But apart from that, the execution of the warrant in the circumstances was illegal. Imprisonment could not lawfully be used to enforce a decree ad factum præstandum where performance was impossible. Owing to the sequestration and the cessio performance was here impossible. The enforcement of the warrant was thus an illegal use of diligence and entitled the pursuer to damages even although he could not aver and prove malice. A decree ad factum præstandum was peculiar. Imprisonment for failure to perform the act ordered was awarded as a punishment for contumacious disobedience.³ It was only justified when it was used for the purpose of enforcing obedience. It could not lawfully be used with any other and indirect object. Here the diligence was not used directly to compel the delivery of the furniture. The defenders knew that was impossible. Their purpose was to concuss the pursuer or his friends into paying the rent so as to free the furniture from the sequestration. To allow imprisonment to be used for such a purpose was utterly inconsistent with the whole modern law as to civil imprisonment. The defenders had taken the wrong course here. Instead of bringing an action ad factum præstandum, they should have proceeded as suggested in the case of Lindsay v. Earl of Wemyss.⁴ 4. Even if the diligence here belonged to the first of the two classes differentiated above, the pursuer had a good case for damages, because he had relevantly averred malice. The failure of the defenders to answer the pursuer's letter, the execution of the warrant without warning after receiving that letter, and in the knowledge that delivery by the pursuer was impossible, and the improper motive and indirect purpose with which the diligence was used, were sufficient to infer malice on their part, and to shew that they did not act in the bona fide exercise of legal right. 5. The pursuer was not barred by having allowed decree to go against him in absence.⁵

Jay & Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case is somewhat peculiar. The defenders are furniture dealers who supplied certain furniture to the pursuer on the hire purchase system. When the instalments due for the furniture were not paid the defenders sent to the pursuers and demanded redelivery of the furniture. They were met by production of a decree of Court by which the furniture was sequestrated for rent due for the house in which the furniture was. No doubt that took the furniture out of the control of the pursuer. Then the present defenders as pursuers brought an action against the present pursuer as defender and took a decree in that action for delivery of the furniture. They were quite entitled to take such a decree. That is shewn conclusively by the fact that no one opposed the granting of the decree—neither the present pursuer nor the trustee in his cessio nor anyone else. We must assume that this decree was rightly granted. No one has impugned it. Having a decree ad factum præstandum the present defenders—then pursuers—proceeded to enforce it, and the only way open to them for enforcing it was imprisonment. Accordingly the present pursuer was imprisoned under the decree. He was liberated the next day. The question now is whether the person who was so imprisoned has a good claim of damages in respect of such imprisonment. A number of ingenious arguments have been stated to us in support of the pursuer's case, but I am satisfied that none of these arguments are well founded, and that the pursuer has no relevant case. Further, I am satisfied that the pursuer was imprisoned under a legal warrant regularly obtained and executed, and that the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. I do not go further into details, except to say this, that I do not think there is any relevant averment of malice in the pursuer's record, and there is nothing alleged from which malice could be inferred. I think, therefore, that we should recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustain the second and fourth pleas for the defenders, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING and LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the pursuer has set forth no relevant case, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, the second and fourth pleas in law for the defenders sustained, and the defenders assoilzied.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them at any length.

The defenders, who are furniture dealers in Glasgow, raised an action against the pursuer for delivery of articles of furniture which belonged to them. The present pursuer did not appear to defend the action, but the trustee in his cessio was sisted in the action, and for his interest consented to decree being pronounced as concluded for. The pursuer in the present action not having appeared at all, decree for delivery ad factum præstandum in absence was pronounced against him, with expenses. The defenders gave the pursuer a charge on this decree, and, he having failed to implement the decree within the days of charge, on 13th May 1907 they applied in ordinary course for a warrant for imprisonment on which the pursuer was imprisoned. What the present defenders did was entirely within their Feb. 7, 1908. rights. They merely carried out the decree which they had obtained without objection on the part of the pursuer. The whole proceedings were orderly proceeded, and perfectly regular.

Rudman v.
Jay & Co.

Lord Ardwall.

This is not one of the proceedings which the party setting them in motion is held to adopt suo periculo, such as a summary application for interdict or the arrest of a person in meditatione fuge; and although it is said that the diligence was due to malice and was without probable cause, yet there are no relevant averments of malice or want of probable cause. The pursuer's allegations, so far as they have even a semblance of relevancy, seem to be founded on this, that there was no reason for the diligence of imprisonment being put in force, because, the furniture in question being sequestered, the pursuer did not have it in his power to deliver it to the defenders, and being under a cessio, he had no money wherewith to pay his rent and release the furniture from the landlord's sequestration.

I cannot accept this view of the situation. Under the old law of imprisonment for debt, debtors were frequently put in prison although they had no effects or money in their possession, simply as a compulsitor to make them or their friends find the money to pay the debt, and in the same manner the defenders in this case used imprisonment as a compulsitor to induce the pursuer, by raising money, to get rid of the landlord's sequestration and to deliver the furniture in terms of the decree. This was a perfectly intelligible piece of procedure, and was, as I have said, entirely within the rights of the defenders; and while I am not prepared to say that in no case might it be possible that malice could be relevantly averred against a person using such diligence, such averment would require to be very distinct and specific, and I do not think that any such averment exists in the present action. I regard it as wholly out of the question that any person should be subjected to an action of damages for executing the appropriate lawful diligence following on a decree ad factum præstandum of a competent Court on bare averments that the diligence was used maliciously and without probable cause.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the . . . interlocutor reclaimed against: Sustain the second and fourth pleas in law for the defenders: Assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action, and decern," &c.

Agent and Client—Agent's Rights—Hypothec—Company—Winding-up—Production of Documents—Reservation of Lien—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 115.—Where a law-agent, who has acted for a company, and is its creditor for professional services, in obedience to an

Feb. 8, 1908. order under sec. 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, pronounced in the liquidation of the company, has produced the title-deeds of heritage belonging to the company, without prejudice to any lien which he may have over them, the mere reservation of his lien does not give him a preference over the general assets of the company, unless it can be shewn that, had the titles not been ordered to be delivered up, he would have had an effectual lien over them for his account.

Circumstances in which held, applying this rule, that a law-agent was not entitled to a preferential ranking in the winding-up of a company.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

On 9th November 1906 a resolution was passed for the winding-up of the Lochee Sawmills Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900; and Thomas Handyside Baxter Rorie, C.A., Dundee, was appointed liquidator. On 6th December a supervision order was pronounced by the Court, and the liquidation was remitted to Lord Johnston. Stevenson & Johnston, solicitors, Dundee, claimed a preferable ranking for the sum of £216, 13s. 9d., being the amount of an account for professional services to the Company. The ground upon which they claimed a preferable ranking was that they had a lien over certain title-deeds and other documents which had been ordered by the Court to be produced without prejudice to their lien in terms of section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862.* The liquidator allowed them an ordinary ranking for £114, 16s. 8d.

In a note presented to the Lord Ordinary in the liquidation the liquidator craved approval of this among other deliverances.

John Laurence Stevenson and Peter Reid Johnston, the individual partners of the firm of Stevenson & Johnston, trustees for behoof of said firm, and the partners thereof, lodged answers to this note, in which they objected to the liquidator's deliverance, inter alia, (2) in so far as it only allowed the respondents an ordinary ranking, and they repeated their claim for a preferable ranking.

The circumstances out of which this question arose were as follows :—Messrs Stevenson & Johnston were, for some time prior to the liquidation, the law-agents of the Company, and at the date of the liquidation they were in possession of the title-deeds of certain heritable property belonging to the Company. Prior to 11th January 1905 the Company in consideration of a loan of £750 made to them, granted in favour of Mr Stevenson and Mr Johnston, as trustees for their firm, a bond and disposition in security over this heritable property, containing an assignation to the writs in statutory form. At the same time another bond and disposition in security over the same property, with the same assignation of writs, was granted by the Company in favour of Mr Alfred Stevenson, a gentleman not connected with the firm of Stevenson & Johnston, in consideration of a loan by him of £800. Certain persons were taken bound along with the Company as co-obligants for repayment of these bonds, and repayment thereof was also guaranteed to the lenders by the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited. Messrs Stevenson & Johnston acted as agents for the lenders in both bonds. Although the writs were assigned there was no change in their custody.

“The Court may after it has made an order for winding-up the company summon before it any officer of the company or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company . . . and the Court may require any such officer or person to produce any books, papers, deeds, writings, or other documents in his custody or power relating to the company . . . nevertheless in cases where any person claims any lien on papers, deeds, writings, or documents produced by him, such production shall be without prejudice to such lien, and the Court shall have jurisdiction in the winding-up to determine all questions relating to such lien.”

Stevenson.

On 11th January 1905 the Company disposed the same heritable property to Mr Stevenson, Mr Johnston, and another, as trustees for behoof of the holders of debentures issued by the Company to the amount of £1500. This disposition contained an assignation of the writs in the ordinary form, but the title-deeds still remained in the possession of Messrs Stevenson & Johnston. They acted as agents of the trustees.

Prior to the liquidation a fire took place by which part of the heritable subjects was destroyed. The liquidator received from the Fire Insurance Company with which the subjects were insured the sum of £465, which was ultimately applied to reduce the amount due, as after mentioned, under the bonds and dispositions in security for £750 and £800.

After the supervision order in the liquidation had been pronounced, the title-deeds above mentioned being still in the custody of Messrs Stevenson & Johnston, the Lord Ordinary, on 18th January 1907, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Requires and ordains the said John Laurence Stevenson and Peter Reid Johnston and Alfred Stevenson, or such of them as may have the custody of the title-deeds of the heritable subjects belonging to the Company, forthwith to produce the same in terms of section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, without prejudice to any lien which the said John Laurence Stevenson and Peter Reid Johnston, or their firm of Stevenson & Johnston, may have over the said title-deeds as provided by said section." The title-deeds were produced accordingly, and on 22d January were borrowed up by the liquidator.

On 28th January the debenture-holders unanimously passed a resolution in the following terms:—"This meeting confirms the declaration of the debenture-holders made at their meeting . . . held . . . on 3d December 1906, that they were satisfied to leave their interests in the liquidation in the hands of the liquidator, and concur in the liquidator bringing to sale the heritable property and others of the Company over which their debentures are secured, . . . and in his taking all such steps as may be necessary or expedient for the purpose of effecting such sale."

On 6th February 1907 intimations, requisitions, and protests were given (1) for Mr Alfred Stevenson, and (2) for Messrs Stevenson & Johnston, as trustees for their firm, requiring payment of the bonds in their favour for £800 and £750 respectively.

On 19th February 1907 the heritable property above mentioned was exposed for sale by public roup at the upset price of £1250, but no offerer appeared.

The General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, in terms of their guarantee, paid up the sums due under the bonds for £800 and £750, and Mr Alfred Stevenson and Messrs Stevenson & Johnston, in consideration of the payment to them respectively of these sums, assigned their respective bonds and dispositions in security to the Corporation by assignations dated 14th March 1907.

On 3d May 1907 the heritable subjects were again exposed for sale by the liquidator, with consent and concurrence of the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, at the reduced upset price of £950, but there was no offerer, and the sale was adjourned. The property was re-exposed for sale by public roup at the further reduced upset price of £800 on 14th June 1907, when it was purchased for £902. This sum (less the expenses of realisation), and also the sum received from the Fire Insurance Company for the subjects destroyed by the fire above mentioned, were paid to the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, as in right of the bonds for £750 and £800. The sums so paid to the Corporation together amounted to £1228, 1s. 10d., leaving a balance of £321, 18s. 2d. still due under these bonds. This balance was paid to the Corporation by the co-obligants above mentioned, who made a claim in the liquidation for the amount so paid by them.

On 20th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds that, in the circumstances in which the heritable property of the Company was realised, there was no lien available to the firm of Stevenson & Johnston, as law-agents of the Company, over the titles to the Company's heritage, and to that extent and effect approves of the liquidator's adjudication on said claim," &c.*

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the facts)—Now, the liquidator could do nothing in the way of selling the heritage except under burden of the bonds, unless by arrangement with the bondholders—that is, he could only sell the Company's reversion. Had there been any reversion to realise, and had the liquidator realised it, there can be no doubt that, as against him, Messrs Stevenson & Johnston's lien would have been good, and that in respect of the condition under which the titles were handed over, he must have given Messrs Stevenson & Johnston a preference in lieu of their lien, not only over the proceeds of the reversion, but over the general assets in liquidation—Skinner v. Henderson, 1865, 3 Macph. 867. But there was no reversion to realise, and the liquidator could do nothing without the consent of the bondholders. The original bondholders having no longer any interest, but having transferred their interest to the Assurance Corporation, the liquidator, with consent and concurrence of the Corporation as assignees, and also of the debenture-holders of the Company, whom I caused to be consulted independently of their trustees, Messrs Stevenson & Johnston, who had a hostile interest, has now realised the heritage and applied the net proceeds in payment pro tanto of the sums due to the Assurance Corporation as assignees of the original bondholders. There proved on realisation to be a considerable deficiency even to pay the Assurance Corporation. . . . And, of course, there was nothing from the proceeds of the heritage for the debenture-holders and a fortiori for the general creditors.

"Now, in effecting the sale the liquidator was acting, as it appears to me, by reasonable arrangement, primarily as agent for the secured creditors, though in his capacity as liquidator, and Messrs Stevenson & Johnston's lien must be considered as in a question with the secured creditors, and not as in a question with the Company, who were the debtors. From the moment the bonds were granted Messrs Stevenson & Johnston were holding the titles both as agents for the Company, the debtors, and as agents for the bondholders, their creditors, in respect that they were agents for both borrower and lender. They might plead their lien to effect against their clients the borrowers, but they could not plead their lien to effect against their clients the creditors—Drummond v. Muirhead & Guthrie Smith, 2 F. 585. The fact of their double agency, which is not affected by the further fact of their personal interest as one of the lenders, makes an exception from

Messrs Stevenson & Johnston reclaimed. The case was heard Feb. 8, 1908. before the Second Division on 21st January 1908.

Argued for the respondents and reclaimers;—The liquidator got the titles for the benefit of the Company and its creditors generally. He used them for a sale at an upset price which would have yielded a reversion. The subsequent consent of the bondholders was irrelevant. No doubt if the bondholders or the debenture-holders had demanded the titles they could have got them free of the lien, as the lien could not be pleaded against them,¹ but neither the bondholders nor the debenture-holders demanded the titles. The liquidator did not represent the debenture-holders, and was not entitled to state pleas which they might have pleaded if they had chosen to do so. A law-agent's lien gave him no right in any particular property. It operated solely by creating inconvenience and so compelling payment.² The rule was that, if a law-agent delivered documents subject to his lien to anyone, for whatever purpose such person might use them, and whether they were found to be of any value to him or not, the law-agent was entitled to payment of his account from such person if solvent, or to a preferential ranking where such person was a trustee in bankruptcy. Even if the papers were not used at all, and were handed back to the law-agent, his right to such payment or preferential ranking still remained.³ The law-agent's claim did not affect only the estate to which the documents related. It was good against the whole estate of a bankrupt.⁴

Rorie (Liquidator of Lochee Sawmills Co.,
Limited) v.
Stevenson.

Argued for the petitioner and respondent;—The property was sold with consent, and as things resulted, solely for behoof of the bondholders. It did not realise enough to pay the bonds. Subject to the bonds the right to the property was in the debenture-holders, for whom also the liquidator was acting. There was never the slightest possibility of a reversion for the Company or its general creditors. The law-agents could not have pleaded their lien against either the bondholders or the debenture-holders. It could not be pleaded without prejudice to their rights. It was therefore of no value, and consequently the delivery of the title-deeds did not give them any right to a preferable ranking. In any view, it could only give the ordinary rule. If this exception holds, it is impossible that they should be heard to set up their lien against their own assignees and the assignees of their client. In the circumstances of the actual realisation, therefore, Messrs Stevenson & Johnston had, in my opinion, no effectual lien to reserve, and I am unable to listen to the contention that the mere fact of reserving a law-agent's lien under the 115th section of the Companies Act, 1862, ipso facto gives the law-agent a preference over the general assets of the Company, irrespective of such circumstances as I have narrated. I shall therefore sustain the liquidator's deliverance on claim No. 36, so far as the principle of his determination is concerned. But before I can deal with his deliverance in detail there must be an audit of the various business accounts involved. . . ."

a right to a preferable payment out of the proceeds of the subjects to which the title-deeds related. It had never been decided that the law-agent's claim could be made good against the whole estate.¹ In the present case, after satisfying the claims of the bondholders against whom the lien could not be pleaded, there was nothing left of the proceeds of this particular property, so that there was no fund out of which the agents could get preferable payment. The liquidator was in a judicial position. The question was not what he was entitled to plead, but whether his decision as judge in the first instance was correct. He represented all interested, and his duty was to see that everyone got what he was entitled to, and that no one got more.

At advising, on 8th February 1908,—

The opinion of the Court (LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD STORMONT-DARLING, LORD LOW, and LORD ARDWALL) was read by LORD ARDWALL.—On 16th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary in this liquidation required the reclaimers, Stevenson & Johnston, who are a firm of solicitors in Dundee, to produce the title-deeds of the heritable subjects which belonged to the Company, in terms of the 115th section of the Companies Act, 1862, "without prejudice to any lien which the claimants or their said firm might have over the said title-deeds, as provided by the said section," and the question raised by this reclaiming note is whether in respect of the said lien so reserved the reclaimers are entitled to a preferable ranking in the liquidation. The Lord Ordinary has held that they are not, and I agree with him in that opinion.

The mere reservation of a law-agent's lien under the section above quoted does not give him a preference over the general assets of the Company unless it can be shewn that had the titles not been ordered to be delivered up by the Lord Ordinary, he would have had an effectual lien over them for his account.

Now, as pointed out by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, which clearly and carefully recapitulates the whole circumstances of the case, Messrs Stevenson & Johnston held these titles not only as agents for the Company, but also as agents for certain bondholders who had granted loans over the security of the subjects to which the titles refer. There were two bonds for £750 and £800 respectively, and these were guaranteed by the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation, Limited, and when it became perfectly clear that there was to be a deficiency in the heritable security, that Corporation paid up the sums contained in the bonds, and took assignments from the bondholders some time after the date of the liquidation. In addition to these bonds the Company had issued certain debentures, and in security of these the said subjects had been conveyed to trustees, of course under burden of the bonds. It appears that Messrs Stevenson & Johnston also acted as trustees for these bondholders, so here again they were holding the titles for postponed heritable creditors. Now, as pointed out by the Lord Ordinary, it is settled by the case of Drummond v. Muirhead &

Guthrie Smith,¹ that Stevenson & Johnston, though they might plead their lien with effect against their clients the borrowers, could not plead their lien with effect against their clients the lenders. Accordingly, either the bondholders or debenture-holders could have insisted on delivery of the titles at the date of the liquidation for the purpose of realising their security, and, indeed, the bondholders had taken steps towards such realisation by serving a schedule of intimation, requisition, and protest upon the liquidator on the 6th of February 1907. It was evident therefore that it was in the interest of all parties, both in the way of saving expense and otherwise, that the liquidator should be entrusted by the heritable creditors and bondholders with the realisation of these properties. With regard to the debenture-holders, they put all their rights and interests in the hands of the liquidator at a meeting held on 28th January 1907, and the subjects were exposed by the liquidator with the consent and concurrence of the said Corporation as heritable creditors, as appears from the minutes of exposure No. 109 of process. But in so exposing them he was acting not for the general body of creditors in the liquidation, but for these secured creditors, it being absolutely clear that there would be no reversion after satisfying their claims, so that the fact that the liquidator did make use of the titles in selling the properties does not in any way strengthen the reclaimers' case, and the suggestion that the properties were originally exposed at a price which would have left a reversion really does not matter, and, as I understand, is contradicted by the information which has been supplied to us since the discussion, and which shews that, in addition to bonds, the subjects were burdened with the debt due to the debenture-holders, amounting in all to apparently £1500.

Applying the principle of the case already quoted, it would appear that after the secured creditors were satisfied, there was nothing against which the reclaimers' lien over the titles could be made effectual, as, after the heritable creditors were satisfied, neither the liquidator, nor the shareholders, nor the ordinary creditors of the Company had any interest whatever in the titles, nor could they have made any use of them. The right of lien as existing in Messrs Stevenson & Johnston would have therefore become of no effective value whatever, for a law-agent's lien confers no active right, but merely entitles him to retain the papers until either his account shall be paid or a preferable ranking given him in case of bankruptcy or liquidation.²

And supposing there had never been an order pronounced ordaining the law-agents to deliver up the titles, they must have delivered them up to the bondholders and debenture-holders to enable them to effectuate a sale of the properties, and after that as the titles were of no value whatever either to the liquidator or those interested in the remaining assets of the Company as creditors or shareholders, the liquidator would have left them alone, and would never have come under an obligation to give Stevenson & Johnston a preferable ranking in return for the delivery of them. The lien would accordingly have been valueless, and it cannot now be treated as ever having been anything else. I am therefore of opinion that the reclaim-

Stamp—Revenue—Conveyance on Sale—Property purchased under compulsory powers—Necessity of producing stamped conveyance—"Produce to the Commissioners"—"Completion of the purchase"—Railway—Compulsory taking of lands—Finance Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 16), sec. 12.—The Finance Act, 1895, enacts, sec. 12, that where "in virtue of any Act . . . any person is authorised to purchase property, such person shall, within three months after . . . the completion of the purchase . . . produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue . . . an instrument of the conveyance of the property, duly stamped."

Held that this provision was not limited to the case of a statutory confirmation of a provisional agreement to purchase, but applied to a purchase of property by a railway company in pursuance of compulsory powers contained in a special Act of the company.

Held (1) that a conveyance which had been produced at the collector's office in order to be provisionally marked with the duty payable, and had thereafter been stamped with that duty, had not been "produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue duly stamped" in the sense of the Act; (2) that the date of the "completion of the purchase" was the date of the final payment of the price.

Exchequer Cause.
1st DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

ON 6th December 1906 the Lord Advocate, for and on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, brought an action against the Caledonian Railway Company, in which he concluded for declarator that "under and in respect of section 12 of the Finance Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 16),* the defenders, when authorised by virtue of any Act to purchase property, are bound to produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, within three months after completion of the purchase, an instrument of conveyance of the property, duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on

* The Finance Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 16), sec. 12, enacts:—"Where, after the passing of this Act, by virtue of any Act, whether passed before or after this Act, either

(a) any property is vested by way of sale in any person; or

(b) any person is authorised to purchase property;

such person shall, within three months after the passing of the Act, or the date of vesting, whichever is later, or after the completion of the purchase, as the case may be, produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a copy of the Act printed by the Queen's printer of Acts of Parliament, or some instrument relating to the vesting in the first case, and an instrument of conveyance of the property in the other case, duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property; and in default of such production, the duty, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the passing of the Act, date of vesting, or completion of the purchase, as the case may be, shall be a debt to Her Majesty from such person."

and ordained, by decree foresaid, to produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the instrument of conveyance or disposition granted Lord Advo-in favour of the defenders by Sir John Cheyne, Procurator of the Church of Scotland, and others, as trustees of the Gaelic Church of St Columba in Glasgow, and dated 24th, 25th, 27th, and 29th May and 3d June 1901, whereby the said trustees conveyed and disposed to the defenders the subjects in Hope Street, Glasgow, which are therein particularly described, and which were purchased from the said trustees by the defenders under the powers of the Caledonian Railway (General Powers) Act, 1899, 62 and 63 Vict. cap. ccxv., the said instrument of conveyance or disposition being duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of said subjects ; or in the event of the defenders failing to produce the said instrument of conveyance or disposition as aforesaid, they ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree foresaid, to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £223, 10s. sterling, or such other sum as may be found to be the amount of the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of said subjects, and also interest on the said sum of £223, 10s. sterling, or such other sum as may be found to be the amount of ad valorem duty payable as aforesaid, at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, from 3d June 1901 until payment.”

The pursuer averred that under their special Act, the Caledonian Railway (General Powers) Act, 1899 (62 and 63 Vict. cap. ccxv.), the defenders were authorised to take and use, for purposes connected with their undertakings, inter alia, certain lands in the city of Glasgow situate on the east of Hope Street and Oswald Street ; in pursuance of the powers conferred upon them by the said Act, and the Acts incorporated with it, the defenders purchased certain subjects in Hope Street aforesaid which were vested in and held by certain persons as trustees of the Gaelic Church of St Columba in Glasgow ; and that the instrument of conveyance or disposition granted by the said trustees in favour of the defenders, conveying and disposing to them the subjects in Hope Street so acquired under statutory powers was dated 24th, 25th, 27th, and 29th May and 3d June 1901, and was the deed production of which was called for in the summons. The pursuer further averred :—“The stamps which the deed in question bears were impressed in Glasgow on 7th June 1901, when it was presented at the Collector's office there to be stamped, but the deed was not then nor afterwards produced duly stamped to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in compliance with the provisions after mentioned of section 12 of the Act 58 Vict. c. 16. Had the deed been presented in order that it might be produced as a duly stamped instrument to the Commissioners in terms of that section, the Collector in Glasgow would have forwarded the deed to the Controller at Edinburgh, or have instructed the agent to do so himself.”

In answer the defenders set forth that, in pursuance of their special Act of 1899 they served a notice to treat, dated 25th November 1899, on the trustees of the Gaelic church, that arbitration for fixing the amount of compensation followed thereon, and that by award dated 22d March 1901 the arbiter fixed the amount at £44,690. “Following on that a conveyance was executed, the last date of which was 3d June 1901, and on 7th June 1901 it was produced by the defenders at the office of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at Glasgow, and was then duly impressed with a stamp-duty of

Feb. 19, 1908. £223, 10s., being the amount of the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the foresaid land or property, and on 8th June 1901 was recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the County of the Barony and Regality of Glasgow. The defenders, by said production, satisfied the whole requirements of the after-mentioned section 12 of the Finance Act, 1895."

The pursuer further averred that the Commissioners had asked for information from the defenders as to deeds of conveyance of property acquired by them in recent years under powers conferred by statute, but that the defenders had declined to furnish such information.

In answer the defenders denied that they were bound to give such information, and further denied that the Finance Act applied to property scheduled in their special Acts for the purpose of conferring on the defenders power to take such property compulsorily.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders being bound to observe the provisions of the Finance Act, 1895, touching conveyances of property purchased under statutory powers, decree of declarator and for production of the instrument of conveyance called for ought to be pronounced. (2) In default of production, decree ought to be given for the amount of the ad valorem duty payable in respect of the said instrument of conveyance, with interest, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The defenders are entitled to absolver, in respect that, upon a sound construction of the Finance Act, 1895, the pursuer is not entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (3) The defenders not being bound, in terms of the Finance Act, 1895, to make production of said conveyance, should be assoilzied. (5) Separatim, the defenders having made production of the said conveyance in terms of section 12 of the Finance Act, 1895, and having made payment of the sum of £223, 10s., being the amount of the ad valorem duty payable on the conveyance in question, should be assoilzied.

On 10th July 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the instrument of conveyance or disposition referred to in the summons has already been produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the sense of the Finance Act, 1895 (section 12), and therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—This case is brought to test the duty of railway and other public companies and bodies under the 12th section of the Finance Act 1895 (58 and 59 Vict. cap. 16), or, perhaps more properly stated, to determine what the Inland Revenue may insist on as the due compliance by such companies, &c., with that enactment.

"To lead up to a consideration of the Act of 1895, it is desirable to examine the state of matters which preceded it. The object of the 12th section of that Act being ostensibly to secure the Revenue in the duties, expressing it generally, upon the transfer of property authorised to be purchased by railway companies, &c., by way of a general enactment of universal application, it is understood that the same object had previously been in use to be attained by special clauses, inserted at the instance of some public department, probably the Board of Trade, in all private Acts, where the necessity for such arose.

"At my request the defenders, who are the Caledonian Railway Company, have lodged in process specimens of such clauses." [His Lordship quoted certain of the clauses.]

"Now, it is here to be noted in passing that though two of these Acts at

The pursuer reclaimed, and the case was heard before the First Division on 14th January 1908. At the hearing it was stated to the Court on behalf of the pursuer that he would be satisfied with decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons, and did not press for any further decree.

Lord Advocate v.

Argued for the reclaimers;—(1) The words of the section clearly covered the present case. The defenders here were “authorised to purchase property” “in virtue of” an Act, namely, the special Act containing the compulsory powers; and this was a purchase following on that authority. When the words of a statute were so clear and precise it was impossible to construe them in any other than their ordinary sense on the ground of an alleged historical reason for their introduction into the statute. The pursuer, therefore, was entitled to decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons. (2) This conveyance had never been “produced to the Commissioners of least provide for the compulsory acquisition of lands in general terms, their enactments regarding the production of a duly stamped conveyance or copy of the Act apply only to the cases of statutory vesting, or statutory confirmation and sanction of provisional agreements for purchase. And it is patent that some such provision was necessary for the protection of the Revenue, because otherwise in the case of a statutory vesting no conveyance or transfer was necessary, and therefore nothing came into existence naturally requiring to be stamped; and in the case of lands acquired by provisional agreement scheduled to an Act, and expressly confirmed and sanctioned by it, there was always the risk that the Company would, at any rate for a period of years, if not altogether, rest content with possession on such an agreement with statutory confirmation and sanction, and take no feudal conveyance requiring to be stamped. It does not, therefore, appear to have been considered necessary, prior to 1895, to require production, under the same condition or penalty, of conveyances of lands taken in the ordinary way by compulsory purchase, where a feudal title by conveyance would follow, as in similar voluntary transactions.

“Subsequent to the passing of the Finance Act, 1895, these particular clauses in protection of the Revenue were dropped out of the defenders’ private Acts, and, I presume, out of all other similar Acts,—as, for instance, in the defenders’ Act of 1902, No. 12 of process, where (sec. 16) compulsory powers in ordinary form are given; (sec. 17) certain prior agreements for the purchase of lands are confirmed and sanctioned; and (sec. 34) certain subordinate independent undertakings are statutorily vested in the Company, and no provision in protection of the Revenue follows. Examples might be multiplied, but this example is a complete and comprehensive one.

“What is meant by (a) a statutory vesting by way of sale, and how the want of a formal conveyance on sale in such a case is to be supplied, is quite clear, and needs no comment.

“But a question of some difficulty is raised on the interpretation of the alternative expression (b), ‘authorised to purchase property.’ The Department maintains that it covers every case of purchase by a railway or other company, &c., by virtue of statutory powers, whether by agreement receiving statutory confirmation and sanction, or by exercise of compulsory powers statutorily conferred. The defenders, on the other hand, maintain that it applies only to the case of statutory confirmation and sanction of an agreement to purchase.

Feb. 19, 1908. Inland Revenue, duly stamped." All that had been done was to produce it unstamped to the Collector in Glasgow. The fact that the stamp-duty was then fixed and paid was not material. The object of the provision was to enable the Commissioners to see that the deed had been properly and timeously stamped. The Commissioners had never had this deed before them, and so had never had an opportunity of considering these questions.¹ (3) The "completion of the purchase" must be the final payment of the price. It could not be the notice to treat, for the carrying through of the transaction and the fixing of the price (on which the stamp-duty would depend) might necessarily be delayed more than three months after that. Nor could it be the execution of the conveyance, for that would open the door to infinite evasions of the object of the Act by merely delaying the execution. What it must really depend on was the completion of the "fact" of purchase, viz., the payment of the price.²

private Acts; that the necessity was the same, and is the measure of the general, as it had been of the particular, provisions. I did not receive any explanation from the Department of a more extended necessity or purpose, leading to a more extended interpretation. The terms of this part of the provision are no more happily chosen than are those of another part to be immediately noticed, and I feel the full force of Mr Clyde's argument. If I found it necessary for the disposal of the case to determine this question, I should feel much hesitation, notwithstanding that the general expressions 'authorised to purchase,' 'in virtue of any Act,' are capable of covering more than merely confirmations and sanctions of provisional agreements, and might perfectly well cover acquisition by the exercise of statutory compulsory powers. My hesitation is not diminished by the impression that the extended construction is not necessary for the protection of the Revenue. There was a time in which instances occurred, and I remember more than one in my own practice, where the railway companies in Scotland were, in the earlier days of railway enterprise, dilatory in taking, or the landowners in granting, conveyances of land compulsorily acquired, and both rested on possession following on the exercise of compulsory powers and a settlement of the price. But I think that these days are past, and that railway companies and proprietors now treat compulsory purchases just like ordinary transactions, and that conveyances are taken and recorded in ordinary course.

"Nor is my hesitation diminished by the difficulty of interpreting the expression 'completion of the purchase.' This expression is vague, and the Crown have not assisted to elucidate it. They have evidently felt the difficulty, for they have not attempted distinctly to interpret it, but have in their summons somewhat vaguely assumed that at latest it must be the date of execution of a disposition of the lands acquired. Now, according to the generally accepted doctrine, the Act which confers compulsory powers is the equivalent of an offer of the property, and the Company's notice to treat is the acceptance, and on offer and acceptance, even when the consideration has to be fixed by arbitration, a purchase is completed, past resiling on either side. But as arbitration, failing agreement to fix the consideration, must follow in compulsory purchase, and often takes months, even years, to carry to an award, before which an execution of a conveyance on sale is not possible, it is evident that the statute cannot mean to fix the date of the notice to treat as the date within three months of which an instrument of convey-

Argued for the respondents ;—(1) The words of the statute did not apply to purchases following on compulsory powers, but only to purchases where statutory authority was interponed to privately arranged agreements to purchase. In private Acts interponing such authority it had been customary to insert a clause in this form, and there could be no doubt that the object and intention of the statute here was to embody these clauses in one general enactment. That the wide interpretation contended for by the pursuer could not be the right one was clear from the fact that there was no obligation on any purchaser to execute a conveyance ; he was entitled, if he chose, to rest content with possession on a personal title. (2) In any event, the conveyance here was duly produced. All that was necessary was that it should be produced and the duty paid, as had been done here. If the statute had meant that there was to be a second formal production it would have said so explicitly. Further, there was no ance of the property, duly stamped, must be produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. It is not, however, easy to say what other date is intended. It must either be the arbiter's award, as I think the Crown are inclined to argue, or the execution of the conveyance. Now, once the notice to treat is given, either party can, under the Lands Clauses Act, compel arbitration proceedings resulting in the fixing of a price. And the landowner, after the award, may compel the Company to take a title—see In re Carey, Elwes' Contract, L. R., [1906] 2 Ch. 143. But the Inland Revenue cannot interfere to hasten the parties. It is difficult, therefore, to see, if this is the meaning and intention of the phrase, how in such cases the assumed object of the statute is attained, if that object is the more speedy collection of the revenue.

“ But assume the extended interpretation contended for by the Department, and that the completion of the purchase is, in the sense of the statute, the execution, and I think it must be added the delivery, of the conveyance, it falls now to be considered what it is that the Department demands. It is this, that conveyances on compulsory sale shall, in the matter of stamping, go through forms and ceremonies not required in the case of any other conveyances on sale.

“ To test the question, the Department have fixed on a certain conveyance to the Caledonian Railway Company by the trustees of the Church of Scotland, of St Columba's Gaelic Church, Glasgow, which followed on a compulsory taking and arbitration proceedings. The duty has been paid, and the document has been stamped in ordinary course. But the Department says to the defenders, you must produce the conveyance again, in order that it may be examined, and entered on a register we have instituted, and be marked with a certificate we have adopted accordingly ; and as a compulsion on the Company to bring the document back to the Department, they sue for the duty already paid, with 5 per cent interest, from the date three months after its execution, which took place six years ago.

“ I thought the demand unreasonable on my own knowledge of the practice of the Department. But as I could not trust to that, I thought it proper to remit to the Depute Keeper of the Signet to report. His report has confirmed me in thinking that, whatever view may be taken of the matters I have already referred to, the Department are not justified in their demand.

“ If all conveyances were in use to be written on paper already stamped, then, on their interpretation of the statute, the Department would be entitled and bound to demand production of such documents, and I do not think that the defenders would oppose the demand. But the practice is otherwise. For manifest good reasons, the practice has long prevailed, for which the internal arrangements of the Department provide, of writing conveyances and all more important documents on plain paper, and then hand-penalty clause for non-production, all the statute said was that the duty, with interest, should be a debt to Her Majesty. It was absurd to say that it could be a debt when it was already paid, or that interest could run where there was not a debt. That shewed that what was intended was production for the payment of duty, not a second formal production. (3) The "completion of the purchase" must be the delivery of the deed of conveyance. There were many stages in such a contract of purchase as this, and it was impossible to say that the transaction was completed until the final stage had been reached, namely, the due delivery of the deed of conveyance. There was no warrant in the statute for fixing on one of the intermediate stages and claiming that as the completion of the transaction.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case two questions were argued to us. The first was the purely general question of whether the twelfth section of the

ing them in to be stamped with the proper stamp, and so giving opportunity to the party sending the document to be stamped and the Department to come to a prima facie agreement as to the stamp to be impressed. I refer to Mr Paul's report, the details of which I need not repeat. For my purpose the gist of it is this: A deed which it is desired to have stamped is handed to the 'deeds marker.' The ingiver pencils on the left-hand top corner the amount of duty which he proposes to pay. The deeds marker examines the deed sufficiently to satisfy himself whether he can pass it for the amount so proposed. If he can do so, he initials it and passes it on to be stamped. If he cannot, and cannot agree with the ingiver on an altered duty, he passes the deed on to the Solicitor's office for consideration—not for formal adjudication, unless that is desired and an extra fee paid—but that the superior officer of the department may consider the matter of the stamp. Whether the deed goes direct to the 'stamper' or through the 'check clerk' is immaterial for the present purpose. What is material is this: In Scotland the Controller of Stamps and Taxes represents the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the 'deeds marker' is an official in the Controller's department. The Commissioners cannot act personally in the matter, nor can the Controller. If the conveyance is produced to the 'deeds marker' or (if he is not satisfied, and submits the deed to the Solicitor for his opinion) to the Solicitor, and if the deed remains in the hands of the Inland Revenue authorities until it is stamped prima facie to their satisfaction, it appears to me that the obligation to produce it duly stamped to the Inland Revenue is reasonably complied with, for the emphasis is not on the word 'duly,' but on the word 'produce.'

"Where one finds an enactment with a practical object drawn with some indefiniteness, and not altogether contemplating the customary practice alongside of which it has to be applied, I think that a reasonable application consistent with the object should be sought.

"Now, there is nothing in the matter of duty to differentiate conveyances to railway companies from any other conveyances. And the object of the enactment is not, I am persuaded, to enforce a compulsory adjudication of the stamp duty, as if the essence of the enactment was contained in the word 'duly.' For one reason, that however often the document is produced to the Commissioners, unless the stamp is formally 'adjudicated' and the adjudication fee paid, the mouth of the Inland Revenue is not closed. But, nevertheless, the document has been as 'duly stamped' as any other document which has passed through the mill of the Stamp Office, and the ingiver has done his duty on that behalf. The object of the enactment is to secure that the revenue from stamps is promptly collected; and if they choose, the Inland Revenue officials can secure all that, in my opinion, the Act intends

Finance Act imposes a duty upon persons, in the position of the Railway Company here, to produce, within a period of three months after the completion of the purchase, an instrument of conveyance of property, where that property is acquired in respect of the exercise of compulsory powers; and then there was the second question, whether a particular conveyance by which the Caledonian Railway Company acquired St Columba's Gaelic Church in Glasgow had been duly produced to the Inland Revenue authorities.

Feb. 19, 1908.
Lord Advocate v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
Ld. President.

The Lord Ordinary has discussed the first general proposition, but he has not actually come to a decision upon it. In his view, as the pursuer, the Department, was wrong upon the second question, he thought that that disposed of the conclusions of the summons; but he has, I think, indicated when the document is in their hands for stamping; and before it is given out again duly stamped, if it has not been timeously stamped, they can exact interest on the duty. If they cannot trust to their 'deeds marker' to see to this, they have only to instruct him to pass on all such documents per aversionem to the Solicitor, or to some special official, as I presume they would be passed on if the Department were warranted in insisting on the system they seek to initiate.

"I have all sympathy for a public department which is in any way thwarted by members of the public in the execution of a statutory duty. But I cannot myself see, and, though I have asked for it, I have not received from the Department, any satisfactory reason for their insistence in the present demand. It appears to me that, in the present case, by bringing, according to practice, their conveyances to the Department for stamping, and, as I humbly think, for 'due stamping' in the sense of the statute, the defenders are putting the Department in a position to perform all their functions under the statute in a reasonable way, and that the Department is not justified in saying to them, you must take your deeds away out of this door, and you must bring them back again by that door, in order that we may keep certain registers, and write certain certificates, which have no statutory warrant, and, so far as I can see, no statutory or other effect.

"I am confirmed in this view when I consider the particular circumstances of the case and the conclusions of the summons.

"Notice to treat was served on 25th November 1899. The owners intimated their claim on 8th December 1899. The oversman pronounced his award on 22d March 1901. A conveyance was executed by the owners on 3d June 1901. The conveyance was handed in, the duty paid, and the stamp impressed in ordinary course on 7th June 1901. The conveyance was recorded on 8th June 1901, while the action was not raised till 6th December 1906. The duty was thus paid four days after the execution of the deed, and the action not raised till four and a half years after the duty was paid.

"Now, the logic of their position obliged the Department to say there has been default, the duty and interest is due in consequence, and for that we sue. But they cannot face up to this, for they know that the duty has been paid and accepted nearly six years ago, and that they cannot recover it twice over, and have no statutory warrant for suing for interest owing to delay in producing only. So they frame a conclusion, which, however reasonable from their point of view, is not in accordance with the situation which the enactment contemplated.

"I think I must therefore find that the instrument of conveyance or disposition referred to in the summons has already been produced to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in the sense of the Finance Act, 1895, section 12, and therefore assolve the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, with expenses."

Feb. 19, 1908. in his opinion a certain amount of sympathy with the view of the defenders, namely, that the provisions in the statute were not really meant to apply to cases of property taken in the ordinary manner under compulsory powers, but were meant to embody in one general statute a class of provisions which, in the past, it had been customary to put into special statutes, where, for instance, some railway company, or other great corporation, took over by special statute the whole undertaking of some other company, and where, accordingly, the conveyance was really contained in the statutory enactment itself—a condition of circumstances which makes it unnecessary to execute a formal conveyance, which would, in the ordinary way, bear a stamp.

Lord Advocate v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
Ld. President-

It may be, and I daresay it is, true that the historical reason, so to speak, of this section of the Finance Act was to effectuate that general object, but your Lordships, I am afraid, cannot construe statutes, when their terms are plain, by consideration of the historical reason for which they were passed. No doubt the history of a statute may often throw light upon a disputed provision, but if the language is plain then there is nothing more to be done than to obey that language; and here it seems to me that the language is so exceedingly plain that it leaves no room for discussion. For reasons best known to itself the Legislature has gone beyond what was done before; but that it has included in perfectly plain terms not only the cases where a transference is made by virtue of a statutory provision, but also cases where transference follows upon the exercise of compulsory powers, is, I think, absolutely clear as soon as you read the words of the statute itself. The Lord Ordinary has set them forth very clearly in his note, and leaving out the parts that do not apply, you have it enacted that when any person is authorised to purchase property in virtue of an Act—that is the ordinary case of a railway company which has compulsory powers—such person shall within three months after the completion of the purchase produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an instrument of conveyance of the property, duly stamped. That seems to me to end the whole matter so far as the first question is concerned.

I now come to the second question. If the Inland Revenue, in this case, had insisted upon the penalty, I think the case would have been one of considerable difficulty, and I confess I think I should have probably arrived at the same practical conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, although not perhaps precisely on the same grounds. But the Inland Revenue have, I think, very properly, conceded that they have no intention here of asking for the penalty in this case, because what happened in the case of this title to St Columba's Church was that the title was taken to the office in Glasgow with the view of having what is really a sort of preliminary marking put upon it as to what the stamp ought to be. We have had a long inquiry in the case, which I do not think I need detail, but it comes to this, that for the convenience of everybody—and I have no doubt it is most convenient and a perfectly proper plan—the Inland Revenue are in the habit of allowing persons to bring their deeds which are going to be stamped, and to have a sort of provisional opinion given as to what the stamp should be. It is only a provisional opinion, because everybody knows that it does not carry finality. If a person wants to be perfectly certain of the amount, and to be perfectly certain that that amount will never be questioned thereafter by the Inland Revenue, there is a well-known and statutory way of doing it, Feb. 19, 1908.

namely, by asking for an adjudication stamp, and, of course, if he gets an adjudication stamp, then the mouth of the Inland Revenue is shut for ever upon the question of the amount of the stamp. But side by side with that which is the method when it is wanted to make the thing absolutely certain, there is the very convenient method which I have described. Now, when the question had never been raised, it would perhaps have been rather hard if a penalty had been incurred, when the deed had been brought in this way and when it had been stamped, and, for aught seen, perfectly properly stamped—but as the penalty is not insisted in, that question is not raised.

Lord Advoca-cate v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.
I.d. President.

But when we come to the question of what is to be done in the future, it seems to me that the Inland Revenue are entitled to make their own arrangements about what is a proper production in answer to the words of the statute. I do not mean to say that if they made utterly unreasonable arrangements they could not be interfered with; but, within reason, they are, I think, entitled to make their own arrangements; and I can quite understand, from their point of view, that it is not such a production as they wish, namely, this bringing of the deed before it is stamped at all in order to get a certain provisional view from the officials in the office as to what the stamp should be.

If you merely take the question literally, it is quite clear that the production of an unstamped instrument will scarcely fit the words of the statute, which puts a duty "to produce an instrument of conveyance duly stamped." And really I think all hardship is out of the matter, because there was a circular, which was brought before our notice in the case, which was sent out by the Inland Revenue and sent to the railway companies, drawing attention to the provisions of section 12 of the Finance Act, and putting it to them perfectly clearly that it would be necessary in the future for them to produce their conveyances, in the case of lands acquired compulsorily, within three months.

Accordingly, it seems to me that the proper disposal of the case is not to do as the Lord Ordinary has done, which is to assoilzie the defenders, but to pronounce a declaratory finding in the terms of the first conclusion, which, I confess, does nothing, except simply to shew that the case has been decided, because it is a mere echo of the statute, and then, in the circumstances, to find it unnecessary to dispose of the other conclusions of the case.

There is one other question which it is right we should make clear, and that is, what is the completion of the purchase? Now, the Lord Ordinary has given very cogent reasons why the completion of the purchase in cases of this sort cannot be taken to be the date of the notice. Upon the whole matter I come to the conclusion that the simple date to take as the completion of the purchase is the final payment of the price to the seller. That date seems to me to get rid of all real difficulties. It will never be too soon, because the railway company will take care that it does not pay the price finally until it gets a disposition from the seller. That it would do for its protection. On the other hand, it will never come too late, because we can be pretty sure that the seller will not be content to wait for an indefinite time for his money. Accordingly, I think that is the date

Feb. 19, 1908. that is meant by completion of the purchase. There was an authority quoted, Lewis v. South-Western Railway Company,¹ in which Lord Justice Turner seems to have come to the same conclusion upon a different matter, but he construed the same phrase in the same way. I do not really put that as an authority, but, at the same time, I think it does no harm to the conclusion at which I have independently arrived.

Lord Advocate v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in all that has been said by your Lordship in the chair. Upon the second point, it seems to me that the date of the transaction must either be the date of the contract of sale or the date of completing the execution of the contract. Now, it could not be intended that the date of the contract of sale should be taken, because it would not always be possible to have the transaction carried through and a stampable deed executed within three months of the contract. I see no intermediate point of time, and it is plain that the Company, in the case supposed, would not pay the price until they were put into possession of the subjects. In the general case they have possession of the subjects under their notice before the price is paid; so that, if the date of payment of the price were taken, that, necessarily, would be the date of the complete fulfilment of the reciprocal obligations under the contract.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur.

No. 80. CHARLES MERRILEES, Pursuer.—Watt, K.C.—Lippe—Lyall Grant.
SAMUEL CARMICHAEL AND OTHERS (Mrs Leckie's Trustees), Defenders.
Feb. 19, 1908. —Crabb Watt, K.C.—R. S. Brown—W. J. Robertson.

Merrilees v.
Leckie's
Trustees.

Expenses—Trustees—Taxation.—Circumstances in which a body of testamentary trustees—who had unsuccessfully defended an action for reduction of the trust-deed, and had, along with the trust-estate, been found liable in expenses—were allowed expenses out of the trust-estate, to be taxed as between agent and client; but not the expenses of an unsuccessful motion for a new trial.

1ST DIVISION. ON 3d June 1907, Charles Merrilees, dentist, Dublin, brought an action for the reduction of an alleged trust-disposition and settlement of his sister, the late Mrs A. G. Merrilees or Leckie, in which he called as defenders (1) Samuel Carmichael, grocer and wine merchant, John Robertson, solicitor, and George Bearhope Ritchie, doctor of medicine, the trustees nominated in the settlement; and (2) the beneficiaries mentioned in the settlement, including Mrs Magdaline M'Laren McCann or Beaton and her husband, Duncan Beaton.

No defences were lodged for any of the beneficiaries, but the action was defended by John Robertson and George Bearhope Ritchie, Feb. 19, 1908. as the trustees acting under the settlement, the third trustee, Mr Carmichael, having declined to act. The circumstances under which the acting trustees came to be nominated as trustees were as follows:—Prior to 27th February 1907, the date of the settlement, both of them were strangers to the testatrix. On that date the defender, Duncan Beaton, whose wife was a niece of the testatrix, called on Mr Robertson, and asked him to give his services in making a will for his wife's aunt. Mr Robertson, on learning that the aunt was a lady of over sixty years of age, who was at the time confined to bed with a cold, requested that her doctor should be present to satisfy him as to her capacity. He was then informed that her late doctor had died, and she had not employed anyone in his stead. He therefore asked Dr Ritchie, whom he knew, and who lived near his office, to accompany him, and they all repaired to the testatrix's house. Dr Ritchie having examined the testatrix and being satisfied of her capacity, Mr Robertson proceeded to draft the will from her instructions. The testatrix having suggested Mr Carmichael as a trustee, was at a loss who to conjoin with him, and it was eventually agreed that Mr Robertson and Dr Ritchie should be nominated. That was accordingly done, and the will was thereupon extended, and signed by the testatrix in their presence.

Trustees.

The following issues were approved for the trial of the cause:—“(1) Whether the pretended trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th February 1907, of which No. 9 of process is an extract, is not the deed of Mrs Annie Gordon Merrilees or Leckie, who resided at 4 James Street, Portobello? (2) Whether, on or about 27th February 1907, the said Mrs Annie Gordon Merrilees or Leckie was weak and facile in mind and easily imposed upon; and whether the defenders, Duncan Beaton and Mrs Magdaline M'Laren M'Cann or Beaton, or one or other or both of them, taking advantage of her said weakness and facility, did, by fraud and circumvention, obtain from her the trust-disposition and settlement, dated 27th February 1907, of which No. 9 of process is an extract, to the lesion of the said Mrs Annie Gordon Merrilees or Leckie?”

The cause was tried before Lord M'Laren and a jury on 7th January 1908, and the following days. The jury returned a unanimous verdict for the defenders on the first issue, but by a majority of nine to three found for the pursuer on the second issue. After the verdict was returned, Lord M'Laren intimated that the verdict involved no reflection on Mr Robertson, “who seemed to have acted quite fairly in a very difficult case.” The defenders moved for a rule, but on 8th February 1908 the Court refused the motion, intimating that while the circumstances proved did not amount to fraudulent impetration, there was evidence of facility, of which advantage had been taken by the Beatons.

On 19th February 1908, on a motion to apply the verdict, the pursuer moved for expenses both against the trust-estate and the trustees. The defenders, the trustees, moved for their expenses, as between agent and client, against the trust-estate. The pursuer opposed that motion.

The trustees, in support of their motion, founded on certain allegations which they said had been made against their bona fides and professional conduct. The averments of the pursuer, so far as bearing on that point, were in substance as follows:—That Mr Robertson was

Feb. 10, 1908. Merrilees v. Leckie's Trustees. Duncan Beaton's solicitor, and that Beaton had taken him to Mrs Leckie's house for the purpose of having the settlement executed in favour of Beaton and his family. That previously a Mr S., a solicitor in Aberdeen, had acted as Mrs Leckie's solicitor, and that shortly after the making of the will a mandate was presented to him bearing Mrs Leckie's signature demanding that delivery of all her papers in his hands should be made to Mr Robertson. That as he doubted Mrs Leckie's capacity to grant a mandate he had declined at first to hand them over, but on Mr Robertson instructing an action to be raised against him at once, failing immediate delivery, he had given them up. That he had informed the pursuer, who was Mrs Leckie's brother, of this fact, and that the pursuer had come to Edinburgh to see his sister, but found that she had left her house, and that the house was shut up. That the pursuer had thereupon asked Mr Robertson to disclose where Mrs Leckie was, but that he had refused to do so. There was also this averment:—"The said pretended trust-disposition and settlement is not the deed of the said Mrs Leckie. . . . In point of fact she did not give instructions for the preparation of the said deed, but was induced by the Beatons to sign it, being unable to resist the pressure which they exercised to get her to sign the deed, especially when a lawyer and a doctor, who were both strangers to her, were brought with the deed."

Argued for the pursuer;—The trustees were not entitled to have their expenses paid out of the trust-estate. Trustees who had unsuccessfully defended an action of this sort were entitled to expenses out of the trust-estate only when they had been compelled to defend the action on account of imputations against their own conduct.¹ Here there were no imputations against the conduct of the trustees; the only imputations were against the conduct of the Beatons. The trustees had no interest to defend this action; the only parties with an interest to defend were the Beatons, and if the trustees chose to defend in the interest of the Beatons, and desired to keep themselves indemnitis, they should have obtained a guarantee for their expenses from the Beatons. In any event, they were only entitled to expenses as between party and party. These expenses fell to be treated in the ordinary way, as expenses of a litigation, for if the defenders obtained an order for them against the estate, they would really be paid, at least in part, by the other party to the litigation.

Argued for the defenders;—The authorities cited for the pursuer shewed that there was no fixed rule as to the allowance of expenses to trustees in such actions, but that it was always a question of circumstances. Here the circumstances shewed that this was a fair case to try, and that the trustees had acted reasonably in defending it. Therefore the principle applied in Watson v. Watson's Trustees,² where the circumstances were very similar to those in the present case, was applicable here, and the defenders should get their expenses. Further, there were averments here amounting at least to a charge of unprofessional conduct against the trustees which had been insisted in all through the trial, and even in the speech to the jury, and on out of the estate. If they were to receive their expenses they must be taxed as between agent and client. They were really expenses ^{Merrilees v.}

incurred in the administration of the estate in their hands, and that ^{Leckie's} was the only scale applicable to such expenses. Inquiry shewed that ^{Trustees.}
the expenses allowed in Munro v. Strain,¹ and Ross v. Ross's Trustees,² had been taxed as between agent and client.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two motions here. The first, which is made on behalf of the pursuer, is to find him entitled to expenses not only against the trustees but also against the trust-estate. In the other, that on behalf of the defenders, who are the trustees and the unsuccessful parties in the action, we are asked to allow them their expenses out of the trust-estate. There is also a subsidiary question as to whether, if the trustees are allowed expenses, these expenses are to be taxed as between party and party or as between agent and client.

As to the first, there is no question that the pursuer is entitled to his expenses against the trustees, and, apart from any difficulty as to mere matter of form, it would seem that a finding for expenses against the trustees would carry liability against the trust-estate. In the present instance, however, I see no reason why the pursuer should not be allowed his expenses against both the trustees and the trust-estate.

As regards the defenders' expenses, it has been pointed out on several occasions that there is no absolute rule. While I am far from wishing to countenance the idea that when a will is challenged trustees are entitled to defend at the expense of the trust-estate no matter what the circumstances may be, there is one consideration which will weigh with the Court, and it is this, "What is said about the trustees?" Now, in the present case I do not think it necessary to pursue the inquiry minutely further than to say that both Lord M'Laren, who tried the case, and my brother Lord Kinnear and myself, who gave the case very careful and special consideration, think that the trustees should be allowed expenses.

As to the scale on which these expenses ought to be taxed, it seems to me that once the trustees have been allowed their expenses these expenses really become expenses of administration and not expenses of litigation. Accordingly, I do not see how we can apply to such expenses a scale which is appropriate to the domain of "litigation" and is not appropriate to the domain of "administration." No doubt the administration of an estate may have been so conducted as to disentitle trustees to any expenses, but in the present instance I see no reason why the trustees should not be allowed expenses as between agent and client.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT found the pursuer entitled to expenses both against the compearing defenders (Mrs Leckie's trustees) and also against the trust-estate, and found the defenders entitled to

Wilson v.
Pottinger.

J. H. C. WILSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—*C. D. Murray—
W. T. Watson.*

JOHN POTTINGER, Defender (Reclaimier).—D.-F. Campbell—Constable.

Property—Gable—Boundary—Dean of Guild—Building Condition—Acquiescence—Encroachment—Remedy.—In erecting a four-storey house, Pottinger obtained the permission of the neighbouring proprietor, Wilson, to build upon the gable wall of an adjoining two-storey house belonging to Wilson. The wall in question was only $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick, and in order to satisfy the requirement of the Dean of Guild that the thickness of the added portion should be 14 inches, the added portion was built in such a manner that, while it was flush with the original on the side next Pottinger's property, it projected $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches beyond the wall on Wilson's side. After the building operations were completed, Wilson raised an action concluding (1) for declarator that Pottinger had illegally encroached on his property, and (2) for removal of the encroachment.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Guthrie) dismissed the action, per the Lord President on the ground that Wilson had by signing plans consented to the encroachment, and per Lord M'Laren and Lord Kinnear on the ground that, when Wilson gave permission to build on his gable wall, the agreement was subject to the implied condition that the building was to be in such form as the Dean of Guild should direct, that it had been erected in accordance with his directions, and that accordingly there had been no unlawful encroachment.

Opinion per curiam that in any event compensation, and not removal, would have been the appropriate remedy.

1st Division.
Lord Guthrie.

JOHN POTTINGER was proprietor of an old house in Main Street, Newhaven, bounded on the east by a two-storeyed house belonging to J. H. C. Wilson, the gable wall of which for a distance of about 20 feet from the street was $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick, and for the remainder of its length 14 inches thick. Pottinger desiring to erect a four-storey house on his ground, applied to Wilson for permission to build the two upper storeys on the top of his (Wilson's) gable. After an interview between the parties, plans shewing the proposed operations were submitted by Pottinger to the burgh surveyor. As originally prepared, the plans shewed that the eastern gable of the upper storeys of the new tenement was to follow the outline of the original wall, viz., that it was to be $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick for 20 feet from the street, and 14 inches thick behind. On the instructions of the burgh surveyor, and in order to conform with the rules of the Dean of Guild Court in Leith, the plans were altered so as to shew the gable 14 inches thick throughout its whole length. This was done by making it flush with the original wall on the side next Pottinger's ground, and by making it overhang Wilson's property to the extent of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches on the other side for the 20 feet where the original wall was too narrow.

On 26th June 1906 Pottinger handed Wilson a letter in the following terms:—

Feb. 7, 1908.
Wilson v.
Pottinger.

"Mr Wilson.

Edinburgh, 26th June 1906.

"Dear Sir,—With regard to the gable between your house and my ground that I am to build upon, I am prepared to pay you whatever you're entitled to. The amount can be agreed on between you and myself, or any other party that we may appoint, on you approving of my plans.—Yours faithfully,

JOHN POTTINGER."

"I will make good any damage done to your property by my operations.

J. POTTINGER."

Thereafter the plans, altered as suggested by the burgh surveyor, were approved by the Dean of Guild, and the building operations commenced.

After the operations were completed, Wilson raised an action against Pottinger which concluded for declarator "(Secundo) that the defender has unwarrantably and illegally encroached upon the said property of the pursuer, by building beyond the west gable of the pursuer's said tenement, and above the ground heritably possessed by the pursuer to the extent of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches or thereby"; and for decree ordaining the defender "to remove the said building erected by him, so far as it encroaches upon the property of the pursuer beyond the west gable of the pursuer's said tenement."

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 6) "Shortly after [the letter of 26th June 1906] the defender proceeded with his building, and when he reached the top of the pursuer's upper storey he not only placed his wall upon the whole width and thickness of the pursuer's western gable, but began to overlap the gable on its eastern side to the extent of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches or thereby. To enable him to do this he inserted transverse iron beams which projected to said extent to the east of the said western gable. Across said beams the defender laid another beam, upon which he erected the said addition to the thickness of said gable. The said overlapping of the pursuer's gable is made for a distance of 25 feet or thereby. The pursuer objected to the proposed encroachment upon his property, and called upon the defender to desist, but he refused to do so, and proceeded with the erection of his building, overlapping the pursuer's property to the above extent. The said proceeding was without right or warrant on the part of the defender, and is in gross breach of the pursuer's rights of property. The plans submitted to the pursuer did not shew the said encroachment upon the pursuer's property, and the projection of the defender's eastern wall beyond the western gable of the pursuer's tenement is not in accordance with the plans approved by the pursuer. The defender did not say or explain to the pursuer that he intended to extend his said wall to the extent averred, or to any extent beyond the said gable, and the pursuer never consented thereto. The present action has therefore been rendered necessary."

The defender answered that the alteration required by the Dean of Guild "was duly shewn on the defender's plans, and was fully explained to and understood by the pursuer at the interviews between him and the defender before he signed the plans."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The defender having wrongfully and illegally encroached on the pursuer's property as condescended on, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the second and third conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

Feb. 7, 1908.

Wilson v.
Pottinger.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer having agreed to allow the encroachment complained of, on payment of compensation as the same should be determined, failing arrangement, by arbitration, is barred from raising the present action.

On 1st April 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie), after a proof, decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons, and thereafter, on 4th June 1907 (parties having failed to agree on any amount of compensation), ordained the defender to remove the encroachment complained of.*

* "OPINION.—The pursuer and defender are owners of adjoining buildings in Main Street, Newhaven. The pursuer built his house and shop of two storeys, with bakehouse and oven behind, in 1903, and the defender erected his four-storey premises in 1906. Both sites had been previously occupied by old buildings, jointly occupied on the lower floor, but divided by a wooden partition 9 inches thick. The pursuer's house lies to the east of the defender's.

"When the defender built in 1906, he used the pursuer's west gable as his east gable to its full height, namely, two storeys. At an interview on 26th June 1906, and by letter of that date, quoted in condescendence 5, it was arranged that the defender should obtain the further height required by him on the east by building on the top of the pursuer's west gable, compensation to be made as therein specified. Disregarding a stair, which, not being bonded into the wall, is not part of it, the breadth of the pursuer's west gable, for a distance of at least 20 feet back from the street, is $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches. The defender proposed to heighten that part of the gable by building on it to the same breadth, but the Dean of Guild Court in Leith insisted, through the burgh surveyor, that the additional height should be 14 inches broad. Instead of the defender making the necessary projection of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches (being the difference between $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches and 14 inches) on his own side of the gable, he, unfortunately, resolved to build so that, while the additional height was flush on his own side with the gable, as built by the pursuer, it projected on the pursuer's side $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches—to that extent overlapping the pursuer's property. There were practical reasons in favour of this course, and the pursuer would have had no interest to refuse his consent had the matter been explained to him and his consent asked on a proper offer of compensation. But, as I hold on the evidence, the defender, without obtaining the pursuer's consent, proceeded to build his 14-inch extension, so as to project $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches beyond the original gable and over the pursuer's property. The pursuer objected, but the defender completed his operations in October 1906.

"The pursuer now asks removal of the building erected by the defender on the top of the pursuer's west gable to the extent, namely, $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches, to which that building extends beyond the thickness of the pursuer's original gable, and over the pursuer's property. He, however, intimated at the proof, through his counsel, that he does not propose to enforce the decree, but desires only to obtain compensation.

"The dispute is a lamentable one. The defender began the trouble by resolving to thicken the heightened part of the gable on the pursuer's side instead of on his own, and by proceeding to begin the encroachment without obtaining the pursuer's consent; and he put himself still further in the wrong by refusing to desist when remonstrated with by the pursuer. On the other hand, when the dispute arose, while the defender's agents accurately described it in correspondence as 'a trifling affair,' the pursuer and his agents, with great lack of perspective, failed to recognise how little interest the pursuer had to object to the defender's operations. Instead of endangering the stability of the pursuer's building, these operations probably made the pursuer's building more secure than if the increased breadth of the

The case was heard on 6th and 7th February 1908.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The pursuer had consented to the wall being built upon his gable, and had signed plans shewing the alteration as actually carried out. In these circumstances, he was barred from maintaining that there had been any encroachment. (2) Even if the pursuer had not in terms consented to the encroachment, he had given permission to the defender to build on his gable wall, and this meant permission to build in the only way possible, viz., under the conditions to be imposed by the Dean of Guild. (3) In any view, removal was not the proper remedy. The letter of 26th June, and the negotiations of parties, shewed that any prejudice suffered by the pursuer was to be compensated by a money payment. The defender had acted in good faith and on a reasonable view of the agreement.

Feb. 7, 1908.

Wilson v.
Pottinger.

Argued for the pursuer;—The agreement between the parties was gable had been on the defender's own side, and, although they involved occupation, for a breadth of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches and a length of 20 feet, of air space belonging to the pursuer, this air space would require to have been occupied whenever the pursuer's building was heightened, in which event the defender's encroachment would have been available as a mutual gable for the pursuer's heightened building. The pursuer also erred in assuming that the defender was not willing to pay for the full damage to the pursuer caused by the defender's whole operations, including the admitted encroachment of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches. As it now turns out, the decree of removing, which I am asked to pronounce, is only to be used as a preliminary to obtaining compensation, which the defender has all along been willing to pay. In short, the whole dispute between the parties could have been settled by arbitration in four hours instead of four days, and at an expense of as many pence as the case will cost the parties pounds. If arbitration failed before the case came into Court, the parties should have agreed to a judicial reference, or at all events to a judicial remit for a report.

"But I must decide the questions brought before me on their legal merits, protesting at the same time that if it were competent I should dismiss the summons, without costs to either party, on the principle de minimis non curat prætor.

"The condescendence and defences raise three questions:—First, was there in fact an encroachment of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches? Second, if so, was this authorised by the pursuer? and Third, if not authorised, is the pursuer entitled to a decree of removing?

"As explained at the proof, although the defences do not make it clear, the defender admits that the pursuer's $9\frac{1}{2}$ -inch gable, so far as heightened by him and thickened to 14 inches, projects, to the extent of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches, over the pursuer's property. But he disputed the pursuer's right to decree, in terms of his second declaratory conclusion, because he maintains that the encroachment was not unwarrantable or illegal.

"The defender claims the pursuer's authority for his operations, first, from what passed in conversation between them on 26th June 1906, second, on the terms of the letter of that date quoted in condescendence 5, and third, on the contents of the plans, No. 39 of process, approved by the pursuer's docquet. As to the conversation alleged by the defender, his account is directly contradicted by the pursuer. As to the letter, an arrangement for heightening a gable may, so far as consistent with safety, authorise building beyond the area of the gable, but only on the builder's own side. As to the plans, it is not proved that the alterations shewing the thickened gable were on the plans when shewn to the pursuer. But, even if they were, these alterations are not so drawn as to give reasonable notice of intended over-that the building should be built "on" the gable wall, and in breach of this agreement the defender had built beyond it. The pursuer had never seen, and had never consented to, the plans as altered.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case arose out of the heightening of a small tenement in Newhaven. In order to heighten that tenement the person who is the defender in this case had of course to submit plans to the Dean of Guild Court. He proposed to make use of the gable which was between his property and that of his next-door neighbour on the east; but he seems to have been aware that, to say the least of it, there was great doubt, indeed I would be more correct to put it more strongly, and to say he knew, that the gable in question was not a mutual gable, and accordingly he approached his next-door proprietor for permission to build upon the gable. He was going to carry his own house to a height considerably greater than that of his next-door neighbour's, which only extended to two storeys; and the parties approached each other, and their negotiations were expressed in the following letter, which was addressed by the defender in this case to the pursuer on 26th June 1906:—"Dear Sir,—With regard to the gable between your house and my ground that I am to build upon, I am prepared to pay you whatever you're entitled to. The amount can be agreed on between you and myself, or any other party that we may appoint, on you approving of my plans.—Yours faithfully." It is not disputed by the pursuer that to that letter, whatever it means, he agreed. There is a controversy between the parties as to whether any plans had been shewn before that letter was written or not. I do not know that it matters. It is quite clear that at the time that letter was written the plans were before the Dean of Guild Court in their original condition; and to explain what that was, I must give your Lordships a short description of them and of the gable wall in question. The gable wall in question was a 14-inch wall for a number of feet measuring from the back of the tenement towards the front, but towards the front of the tenement the wall narrowed down from 14 inches thick to 9 inches. Now, it is undoubtedly the case that the defender's original idea was to utilise this gable wall as a mutual wall to the ground storey, and also as a support to the tall gable on to which he was going to build a tenement. He undoubtedly meant originally merely to carry the gable up, that is to say, that where it was 14 inches it would be 14 inches, and where it lapping to a man like the pursuer, and the front elevation is inconsistent both with the '1, 2, and 3 flat plan,' and with the roof plan.

"The question of the appropriate remedy remains. Although reluctant to give decree of removal, I do not think the pursuer has done anything to bar himself from the remedy claimed. As I read the oral evidence and the correspondence, it is not proved that he ever consented to the defender's operations, or that he failed timeously to object to them, or that he led the defender to think that he would be content with compensation and would waive his legal right to removal. Thus I do not find the element of bar or acquiescence which, in one form or another, was involved in the series of cases commented on by Lord Watson in Magistrates of Kirkcaldy v. Grahame, 1882, 9 R. (H. L.) 91. To refuse the pursuer the remedy of removal would be, in Lord Watson's words, 'to give the wrongdoer compulsory powers to acquire part of his neighbour's property, which, in spite of remonstrance, he had illegally appropriated.'" was 9 inches it would be 9. After he had got this consent the case proceeded before the Dean of Guild Court, who, acting upon what seems to be a general rule, insisted that, as the tenement in question was to be a four-storeyed tenement, the 9-inch portion of the wall would not do, and that a 14-inch wall would be necessary all along. The defender inserted brackets at each end of the 9-inch wall, on which he placed an iron beam running parallel with the top of the wall, and then he carried the gable up for the additional thickness which was necessary, making it a 14-inch wall right up to the top. Now, in doing so, this iron beam makes an overhang of $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches, which is over the pursuer's property; and the action is raised to have it declared that these $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches belonged to him, and to have the defender ordained to that extent to take away the wall of his building.

The Lord Ordinary has taken a view of the import of the letter which has prevented him from arriving at the conclusion which he has plainly indicated he wished to do. He says—"As to the letter, an arrangement for heightening a gable may, so far as consistent with safety, authorise building beyond the area of the gable, but only on the builder's own side." I do not think that is the proper view to take of the letter. Its construction is plain and simple. Looking to the whole surrounding circumstances, it seems to me perfectly clear that the meaning of the consent to the building on the gable was to a building on the gable of which the Dean of Guild Court should finally provide the authorised plans. Then there is no doubt the plans were altered, and I think it was clearly proved that the signature of the pursuer, which was adhibited to those plans, was adhibited after the alterations had been made. I agree that it may very well be that the pursuer, being a man unskilled in plans, did not, if I may use the cant expression, wake up to the fact that the alterations had been made, and that these $4\frac{1}{2}$ overhanging inches were upon his property; but I do not think he can take any benefit from that. If he chooses to put his signature to a plan authorised by the Dean of Guild Court, I think he takes his chance as to what this plan precisely shewed. In other words, I do not, as the Lord Ordinary has done, first of all conclude that the agreement was for a gable wall of 9 inches, and then that there was a new arrangement for a gable wall of 14 inches. I look upon the agreement as for such gable as the Dean of Guild authorises, and then I find that what the Dean of Guild authorised was fairly brought to the pursuer's notice by the production of the plans. It is quite true that these plans are not strictly accurate, especially they are inaccurate in two particulars. In the first place, being evidently desirous of economising space, they make one plan do for the first, second, and third floors, and the one plan does not shew the condition of each floor and its flooring level; and, in the second place, it is equally clear that the elevation is not accurately altered as it ought to have been, so as to make a corresponding alteration in the thickening of the wall. But although this minute criticism can be substantiated, at the same time I have no hesitation in saying that any man who understood a plan could see that it was meant to carry up a 14-inch wall which should overhang this space. I do not know that the pursuer understood that. He had no technical training, and plans are things that require a little training and some understanding; but if he chooses to sign a plan, he takes the risk of misunderstanding it.

Wilson v.

Ld. President.

It seems to me that that ends the case. But I wish to say that, even if I were not of that opinion, the pursuer could not succeed. When you come to such a small question as the overlapping of a boundary wall by $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches, I think the jurisdiction of the Court is as has been illustrated in the leading case of Sanderson v. Geddes.¹ I do not find that Lord Watson throws the slightest doubt on *Sanderson v. Geddes*¹ in his judgment in Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy.² On the contrary, what Lord Watson did not like was Jack v. Begg,³ and the issue in *Jack v. Begg*³ was very different from that in *Sanderson v. Geddes*¹; and *Sanderson v. Geddes*¹ was entirely different from the case of Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy.² But the Lord Ordinary, in quoting Lord Watson's dictum, confuses Sanderson v. Geddes,¹ in which there was no transference of property at all, with Begg v. Jack,³ where there was, and ordains the defender to take down what has been put up. I think this is one of those cases (if I could project my mind a century or so after this, or if there is an earthquake, and the buildings are demolished) in which the boundary will remain as before. This operation does not alter the boundary, and it is out of the question for the pursuer to insist that the building should be taken down. The only possible remedy was by making application for interdict when the building was being erected, and it is no answer to that to say that the pursuer's agent was ill. Accordingly, even if I had not come to the conclusion at which I have arrived, I should have thought the remedy was not an appropriate one. I propose that we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and dismiss the action. I think probably that is a preferable course to assoilzieing the defender. I do not wish this action to be held as fixing anything as to the rights of parties in the gable. I therefore propose that we dismiss the action, and find the defender entitled to expenses.

LORD M'LAREN.—As I agree with your Lordship, I have little to add. The agreement was one which entitled the defender to build upon the pursuer's gable, that is, to derive support for his upper storeys from the pursuer's gable; and it is evident that the parties were not in a position to determine at the time of the agreement what would be the precise value of the support that was to be given or the damage that might be done, because that was left to be determined by arbitration. These are expressed conditions. There was another thing which both parties, I must assume, knew, that all building plans are subject to the control of the Dean of Guild Court, and therefore the contract must have been affected by the implied condition that the building was to be in such form as the Dean of Guild Court should order. These conditions, expressed or implied, seem to me to cover the whole ground, and to leave nothing to be pointed out, explained, or proved, supposing a proof were competent. Then, on the other branch of the case, I think there is sufficient authority in the region of decision to shew that we have to a certain extent at least adopted the principle of the Roman law, that a person who builds in good faith on another man's property is not necessarily to be compelled to take down his building. If the value of the building greatly exceeds that of the ground he occupies, the case can be explicated by paying compensation, whatever may be the agreement. I should be Feb. 7, 1908. sorry if any doubt were thrown upon the doctrine that where there is an inconsiderable encroachment upon neighbour's land by buildings which are substantially and for all practical purposes upon the builder's own land, the law of the land will not compel him to take them down. If the law were altered in this particular case, it would be one in which the application would be, as I think, in the highest degree inequitable. To take down the gable would practically amount to the demolition of the whole house, by withdrawing from the other parts of the building the security which the gable affords, and altering the distribution of the weights and pressures of the house. It might make the house a complete wreck, and all this for 4½ inches. I most heartily indorse all that your Lordship has said upon that part of the case. I agree that the action should be dismissed.

Wilson v.
Pottinger.
Lord M'Laren.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree upon this ground, that when the owner of house property within a burgh agrees to allow his neighbour to build upon the gable wall, there is a plain indication that the building is to be erected according to the conditions that may be imposed by the Dean of Guild Court. The thing cannot be done otherwise, as both parties must be supposed to have known, and therefore the pursuer, if he allows it to be done at all, allows it to be done in that way. I think the case does not rest there, because he was asked to allow the gable to be built upon according to the plans which were passing through the Dean of Guild Court, and he therefore knew they would be subject to supervision, and might be altered to satisfy the conditions which the Court might impose. On that ground I think he has failed entirely to shew that there has been any unlawful encroachment on his property. If there had been, I agree further, for the reason your Lordship has given, that the remedy would have been altogether inappropriate, and his claim would have been for compensation for any prejudice he might suffer. I wish to add that I think it must be admitted that some proof was necessary, because the letter which the defender wrote does not bind the pursuer unless he assented to it, and it was necessary to shew that there was an agreement upon which the one party consented that the other should act.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and dismissed the action.

Held that this section confers upon town-councils only a right to veto or regulate the formation of a new street on the property of the petitioner and of other persons consenting.

Petition by proprietors of feuing ground to a town-council for warrant to form and lay out a new street, which was objected to by the proprietor of part of the solum of the proposed street, dismissed as incompetent.

Police—Street—Private Street—Railway—Road forming “part of any railway”—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55), sec. 4 (31).—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sec. 4 (31), defines “street” as any road, &c., “not being or forming part of any . . . railway.”

An unformed road in a burgh, 40 feet in width, was bounded on one side by a line of railway from which it was separated by a wall. The solum of the road ex adverso of the railway to the extent of 30 feet of its width was the property of the railway company, who had acquired it by voluntary disposition under a power to purchase land for extraordinary purposes. Over the road there existed a public right of way for traffic of every description.

Held that the road was not “part of a railway,” but was a private street within the meaning of the Burgh Police Acts.

Police—New Street—Burgh—Dean of Guild—Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), sec. 11.—The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, sec. 11, enacts, that every person intending to form a new street in a burgh shall petition the town-council for warrant to do so, and that the Dean of Guild shall not grant warrant for the erection of any buildings abutting on a new street until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted.

The owner of building ground within a burgh, abutting on an unformed private road over which there existed a public right of way for traffic of every description, presented a petition to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect buildings on his ground. The Dean of Guild refused the petition on the ground that he had no power to entertain it until the town-council had granted warrant for the formation of the road in question into a new street.

Opinion that the erection of the buildings would not cause the road to become a “new street,” and (following Mair v. Police Commissioners of Dumbarton, Dec. 14, 1897, 25 R. 298), that the Dean of Guild was wrong in refusing the petition.

1ST DIVISION.
Town-Council of Ayr.

ON 3d April 1905, Robert Hutchison, builder, Ayr, and certain others, being proprietors of feuing ground in the burgh of Ayr, presented a petition under section 11 of the *Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, to the Town-council of Ayr, for warrant to form and lay out

* The Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 33), sec. 11, enacts:—“Every person who intends to form or lay out any new street, or to widen, extend, or otherwise alter any street, shall present a petition for warrant to do so to the town-council, and along with the same he shall lodge a plan of the street as proposed to be laid out or altered, with longitudinal and cross sections, shewing the proposed centre, building, and kerb lines, and also the inner lines of the footway where these differ from the building lines, shewing also the levels and means of drainage, specifying the proposed material and mode of construction, and having marked upon it the names of all persons owning the street or any ground abutting thereon affected by the proposal and appearing in the valuation-roll. A copy of said petition shall be served by the petitioner upon all such owners and also upon the burgh surveyor, and the town-council shall within fourteen days from the presentation of the petition afford the petitioner and a new street on the line of an existing road known as Oswald Road or Oswald Avenue, Ayr, on which the feus held by them abutted. Feb. 19, 1908.

Objections were lodged to this petition by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. v. Hutchison.

On 10th July 1905 the Town-Council of Ayr, sitting in Works Committee, pronounced a deliverance granting to the petitioners warrant and authority to form and lay out the new street specified in the petition in conformity with the plans, &c., produced. Against this deliverance the objectors, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, appealed to the Court of Session.

The circumstances in which the petition was brought and the contentions of the objectors were thus narrated by Lord Pearson in an opinion delivered by him on 7th November 1906:—"This is an appeal by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company against a deliverance of the Town-Council of Ayr sitting as the Works Committee, in a petition by certain proprietors of feuing ground for authority to form and lay out a new street on the line of an existing road known as Oswald Road.

"These proprietors are desirous of building houses on their feus, and one of them applied to the Dean of Guild for warrant to erect buildings. But it is provided by the 11th section of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1903, that the Dean of Guild shall not grant warrant for the erection of buildings abutting on any new street until warrant for the formation of such new street has been granted. Accordingly the Dean of Guild refused to grant warrant to build until the proprietors petitioned the Town-Council under the same section to have Oswald Road at that part of it formed and laid out as a new street.

"Oswald Road runs in a southerly direction from the lands of Prestwick through what was formerly the burgh of Newton-on-Ayr (now merged in the burgh of Ayr), and thence to a place called Oswald Yard at Ayr Harbour.

"The petitioning feuars are frontagers to Oswald Road on the east side for a length in all of about one-third of a mile. The frontagers on the west side of the road are the appellants (the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company) and Messrs Wylie & Company. Messrs Wylie & Company are owners and occupiers of chemical works and all other parties interested an opportunity of being heard, and shall dispose of the application as soon as possible thereafter. If it shall appear to the town-council that the proposed street, or any portion thereof, or any of the details shewn on the said plan, does not fulfil the conditions required by the Burgh Police Acts, or is otherwise contrary to law or to private rights, the town-council may either refuse the said petition, or grant the same subject to such alterations and modifications on the plans or other lawful conditions as may be necessary in the circumstances. The Dean of Guild Court shall not grant warrant for the erection of any buildings abutting on any new street, until warrant for the formation of such street has been granted. The plans approved of by the town-council shall, except in so far as they may afterwards be altered in terms of this section by the authority of the town-council, be adhered to by the applicant and by every person erecting any building abutting on the street. In the event of no part of any new street, for which a warrant has been obtained, being formed or laid out within twelve months from the date of the warrant, the warrant shall lapse, and it shall be necessary before the street is formed or laid out to obtain a fresh warrant."

stores extending along the west side of the road for about 400 feet. Their ground is practically all occupied by buildings, and they do not oppose the petition. The Railway Company, besides having a title to the road itself, as I will presently explain, are frontagers for a length of about 800 feet to the south of Wylie's works, and for a length of about 350 feet to the north of those works. For this length of 350 feet their property next the road is a field unbuilt on. For the length of 800 feet just mentioned, their railway line approaches the west side of the road. It is stated in a note to the deliverance appealed against that the line is a foot or two above the level of the road, and that there is a railway retaining and boundary wall running outside the railway and abutting hard on the proposed street.

"By section 61 of the Act of 1903, as adopted by the burgh of Ayr, it is not lawful to lay out or form any new street unless it has a width of 40 feet of carriage way and footpath, and 60 feet between the building lines. We are informed by the Town-Council that the Dean of Guild being directed by the statute to refuse to pass plans of buildings abutting on an intended new street until warrant for the street has been obtained, this in practice prevents buildings being put down so as to form a street until the line and level of the street has been fixed.

"Now, Oswald Road, as it exists, is an unformed road, 40 feet in width, and is used by carts and foot-passengers. The whole solum of the road, and, indeed, all the neighbouring ground, originally belonged to the old burgh of Newton. The road was at first only 30 feet wide; but at some date which does not clearly appear it was widened to 40 feet by the addition of a 10 foot strip along the east side. The original 30 foot road was acquired by the Railway Company in 1889 by disposition in ordinary form from Mr Oswald of Auchencruive, by whose ancestor it had been acquired in feu from the Magistrates of Newton in 1765, to be used as a wagon road from his coal pits to the harbour of Ayr. Both titles contain a reservation of minerals, and are granted subject also to this special provision and declaration—'that the freemen and other inhabitants of the said burgh of Newton, or others having their permission, shall not be stopped, barred, or impeded from crossing or passing over the said piece of ground hereby fewed out of the breadth foresaid from the march of the grounds belonging to the said burghs of Prestick and Newtown to the north dyke aforesaid, with their horses and carriages, leading dung to their lands, lime, sand, stones, or other materials for building, or for any other lawful purposes; and free liberty to the cattle pasturing upon the Newtown common to pass and repass over the same in all places. And also providing and declaring that there shall be at all times a free passage to the inhabitants of said burgh of Newtown of thirty feet wide betwixt the said north dyke and the said acre and fourteen falls of ground or thereby fewed out.'

"It further appears from the title that the road was acquired by them in virtue of the power to purchase land for extraordinary purposes conferred by section 38 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, and section 12 of the Company's special Act of 1865.

"By the decision under appeal, the Town-Council of Ayr, sitting as the Works Committee with powers, authorised the petitioning feuars on the east side of the road to form and lay out the road as a new street ex adverso of their feuing ground under section 11 of the Burgh Police Act, 1903, the Dean of Guild Court having, as I have said, held this to be a necessary preliminary to granting the feuars a lining for their building operations. Feb. 12, 1908.

"The petition was opposed by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and they now appeal against the deliverance of the Town-Council. It does not appear that there were any objections stated in detail to what is proposed. The appellants' objections go to exclude altogether the laying out of a new street at the place proposed, and in particular the assuming as part of the new street of any portion of their thirty foot road. Their position is that that is private property; that it is part of their railway; that they have already set apart and used other portions of Oswald Road for railway purposes, and that they will from time to time so dedicate and use the part of the road now in question, though they have not yet done so; and that if the feuars desire to have a new street laid out they must themselves supply the ground."

On 7th November 1906 the First Division allowed parties a proof of their averments, the opinion of the Court (consisting of LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNEAR, and LORD PEARSON) being delivered by LORD PEARSON.—(After the narrative above quoted)—The appellants point to the provision in section 11 to the effect that if the proposed street does not fulfil the statutory conditions, "or is otherwise contrary to law or to private rights," the Town-Council may refuse the petition or alter the proposed plans. In the first place, they maintain that the proposal is contrary to law, on the ground that section 11 applies only where a proprietor seeks to have the whole thing done on his own property. Now, while the section plainly does apply to a case where a proprietor petitions for authority to make operations in suo, it is not confined to that case; and I have no doubt that where feuing ground is bounded by a road (as we are told is the case with the titles of all the feus belonging to the petitioners), this lets in the possibility of including that road in the new street to be laid out, unless there is some specific reason for excluding it. Such reason the appellants find in the definition of the term "street" in the Burgh Police Act, 1892, section 4, subsection 31, which enacts that "street" shall include any road, &c., within the burgh used either by carts or foot-passengers, and "not being or forming part of any harbour, railway or canal, station, depot, wharf, towing-path, or bank." This road, or the portion of it in question, is (the appellants say) part of a railway, acquired by private agreement for extraordinary railway purposes; and to lay it out as a new street or part of a new street is contrary to law, seeing that it falls within the exception, and is thereby excluded from the definition of "street" in section 4. But obviously a piece of ground is not "part of a railway" merely because it belongs to a railway company; and, on a sound construction of the section, this ground does not appear to me to fall within any of the categories set forth in the words of exception. Nor do I think that the question can be solved in favour of the appellants by their statement that, as their traffic requirements demand, this road will be dedicated to and used for railway purposes, if it is clearly shewn that this is not within their power. Now this, which I think is the crucial part of the case, involves matter of fact on which the parties differ widely in their averments. They are substantially agreed as to the legal attributes of the road so far as these depend on

Glasgow and Western Railway Co.

Feb. 19, 1908. the titles ; but as to all beyond that they are entirely at variance. There are two possible results flowing from the petitioners' averments, if these are established. Either the portion of the road now in question is subject to a public right of way ; or, short of that, it is subject to a servitude of way so wide and indefinite as to make it practically impossible to restrain the public from using the road. If the former alternative were set up, it might have an important bearing on the position of the Railway Company on all the matters raised on the record ; and even if the lesser alternative were established, it might affect the position of the Company upon their plea that they are still entitled to dedicate this part of the road to railway purposes. I indicate no opinion as to whether or how far the position of the appellants will really be affected in these various events. I only say that it may be materially affected ; and I think this is clearly a case in which we should not decide upon the appeal until the parties have an opportunity of laying the facts before us by proof or admissions."

Lord Pearson.

Thereafter proof was led before Lord Pearson and reported by him to the First Division. The material facts established by the proof, as summarised by the Lord President in his opinion, infra, were as follows :—Oswald Road belongs, as far as the western portion of 30 feet is concerned, to the Railway Company. It is not occupied by lines, and is in fact shut off from the railway sidings or yard at that place. Over Oswald Road there exists a public right of way for traffic of every description.

Counsel were heard in argument on the proof on 13th and 17th December 1907.

Argued for the appellants ;—This petition should have been refused, because (1) section 11 was not applicable in respect that it only provided for permission being given for the formation of a new street on the petitioner's own property, and not for the authorisation of the formation of a new street on the property of someone else. (2) Section 11 was not applicable for the further reason that the road in question was not a "street" within the meaning of the Burgh Police Acts, but was expressly excluded therefrom as forming "part of a railway."¹ This road was "part of a railway," for it had been acquired by a railway company, and a railway company could only acquire land for railway purposes. The fact that it had not yet been utilised for railway purposes was immaterial, for although land compulsorily acquired for ordinary purposes might lapse if not utilised within ten years, that did not apply to land acquired, as this was, by voluntary agreement for extraordinary purposes and not included in the book of reference.² In point of fact all the land acquired by this agreement had been gradually utilised for railway purposes except this remaining strip, and that might also be utilised in the future. That fact was not affected by the existence of the alleged right of way. The doctrine of dedication to public uses did not apply, for this land had never been handed over for public purposes, and therefore any public rights in it must be held to have been acquired by prescription, which did not oust the owners from its enjoyment.³ The rights of the public were not inconsistent with its use for railway purposes.¹ The owners of the solum of a road over which there was a public right of way were entitled to use it as they pleased so long as they did not interfere with the public right. This was a private road which had never been subject to public administration as a street, and therefore the owners of the solum had a higher right than the public. (3) Even if section 11 was applicable the petition should have been refused on the ground that it transgressed the proviso in the section that the formation of the street must not be "contrary to law or to private rights." It was contrary to law, for the land had been acquired for railway purposes, and this was a proposal to divert it from these purposes. And it was clearly an invasion of private rights, for it would prevent the appellants from using the land, as was their right, for the purposes of their railway. (4) In any event, the petition was unnecessary, for these buildings could be erected without converting this private road into a new street; and the Dean of Guild was wrong in making that a ground for refusing to grant the original petition for lining.²

Argued for the respondents;—This was the formation of a new street within the meaning of section 11,³ and the Dean of Guild was right in refusing the petition for lining until the warrant of the Town-Council was obtained. The Town-Council were justified, in the exercise of their discretion, in granting that warrant, for the road in question was not "part of a railway," nor would the formation of the street be contrary to law or to any private rights of the Railway Company. The test of whether this road formed part of a railway depended on occupancy and not on ownership,⁴ and there was no suggestion of occupancy here. Although the Railway Company had a right of ownership in part of the road they had not an unlimited right of occupancy, for the road was subject to a right of way in favour of the public, and when a public right of way existed the ground could not be used for a railway.⁵ Assuming that, if the land had been acquired by compulsory powers for the purposes of the railway, the public right of way would have disappeared, yet this land was not acquired by compulsory powers; it was acquired by voluntary disposition. The only rights acquired were those granted by the disposition, and in the disposition the public right of way was expressly excluded. Esto that in *The Magistrates of Edinburgh v. North British Railway Company*⁶ it was held that a right of way could not be acquired over land held for railway purposes, there was no question of the acquiring of such a right here; it already existed when the land was disposed to the railway, and was expressly excluded from the disposition. In fact the road was dedicated to public purposes, and all the railway got was the land subject to that dedication. Further, whatever the rights in this

LORD PRESIDENT.—The circumstances under which the present appeal is brought have been detailed in the opinion delivered by Lord Pearson when a proof was allowed. We have now the proof before us, and have to dispose of the petition. In my opinion the result of the proof and admissions of parties is to establish the following propositions: Oswald Road belongs, as far as the western portion of 30 feet is concerned, to the Railway Company. It is not occupied by lines, and is in fact shut off from the railway sidings or yard at that place. Over Oswald Road there exists a public right of way for traffic of every description. The result of this in law is I think, first, that the 30 feet of roadway is not “part of a railway” in the sense of the exception to the 31st subsection of section 4 of the Burgh Police Act, 1892, and that accordingly, second, by the combined operation of that subsection, and of section 103, subsections 5 and 6, of the Burgh Police Act of 1903, the road in question is a private street within the burgh of Ayr.

This makes it necessary to decide the case purely and simply on the applicability of the 11th section of the Act of 1903, under which the petition was presented. After repeated consideration I have come to the conclusion that that section does not give any powers whatever, and that it is therefore improperly invoked by one person against another. It is to be observed that although not actually so expressed there can be no doubt that it and the succeeding section were meant to replace sections 146 et seq. of the Act of 1892. This is made clear by the repealing schedule to section 104, which repeals sections 146-150 inclusive, and also section 153. This seems to me to let in as authority the case of Mair v. Police Commissioners of Dumbarton,⁴ decided by the Second Division. The opinion of Lord Young on the point is quite clear. Speaking of the applicant who had been told he ought to have applied to lay out a new street under section 146, Lord Young says, “he was not in a position to do so.” And Lord Moncreiff says,—“I am inclined to think section 146 is confined to the case of a proprietor who intends to construct a street on his own land.”

Apart from authority I think the whole phraseology of the clause leads to this conclusion. There is no indication in it of doing what no doubt the Legislature might do, but which it is never presumed it will do,—giving to one person a right to proceed to do something on the property of another in invitum. The whole structure of the clause points to veto and regulation, not to authorisation. It need not be strictly confined to the petitioner's own property, for there is certainly the case where there is the consent of other parties, and there might be the case of including an existing road where there was no one with rights in the solum of the road who came forward and objected. There is a sentence in the opinion of Lord Pearson which might be construed as going beyond this; but it is only the more limited construction that on the maturer consideration of the case was held as the judgment of the Court.

The result of this is that I think the present petition is in the circumstances incompetent, and ought to be dismissed. It follows, I think, that the Dean of Guild was wrong at an earlier stage in refusing de plano to grant warrants of lining. In fact I think that part of his judgment is not in accordance with Mair's case,¹ which probably was not brought before his notice. We were much pressed by counsel for the respondents with the English case of Robinson v. Local Board of Barton,² decided by the Court of Appeal and partially affirmed in the House of Lords. I do not think that a matter which depends purely upon statutory enactment in a complicated set of provisions can ever be much helped by decisions on quite a different statute with other provisions. The statute must be taken as a whole to see its scheme. Further, there is a great difference between applying provisions to a street when a street becomes so in fact, and applying them to a place which is only a street by virtue of definition. An instance of the difficulties which arise is well shewn by the variation made by the judgment of the House of Lords on that in the Court of Appeal. It must also be remembered that the result of our decision is not to relegate Oswald Road to a state of perpetual quagmire. As it is by virtue of definition a private street, that lets in the whole fasciculus of sections beginning at section 133, and partly amended by the 1903 Act, under which the municipal authorities have very considerable powers.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree with the Lord President's opinion.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

Valuation Acts—Subjects—“Lands and Heritages”—Slag Heap—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), sec. 42.
 —A large slag heap, owned by trustees and deposited on ground belonging to them, was let to a railway company under a lease by which the company had, on payment of a royalty or fixed rent, right to remove and use the slag for the purposes of their railway.

Held that the slag heap was a heritable subject, and that the trustees and the railway company had rightly been entered in the Valuation-roll as respectively the proprietor and the tenants thereof.

 Lord Low.
 Lord Dundas.

AT a meeting of the Valuation Committee for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, held on 10th September 1907, the Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees and the Caledonian Railway Company appealed against the following entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1908, viz. :—

Case 254.

Description and Situation of Subject.	Proprietor.	Tenant.	Occupier.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Slag lordship Chapelhall.	Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trust, per John B. Allan, Treasurer, Airdrie.	Caledonian Railway Company, per J. Drynan, 302 Buchanan Street, Glasgow.	Same.	£648 1 0

The appellants craved that the entry should be deleted from the roll.

The Valuation Committee having dismissed the appeal, the appellants obtained a case.

The case set forth as follows :—

“The subject in respect of which the appeal is raised is known as the Chapelhall slag heap, and consists of a large deposit of slag owned by and lying on a piece of ground belonging to the appellants the Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees.

“The predecessors of the Water Trust had in connection with the acquisition of the water rights to acquire the ground and the slag heap for a valuable consideration.

“The appellants the Caledonian Railway Company have entered into an agreement with the other appellants the Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees, a copy of which is appended hereto,*

* The agreement bore as follows :—

“This lease, entered into between the Airdrie and Coatbridge Water Company, incorporated under Act of Parliament, hereinafter referred to as the first party,—of the First Part; and the Caledonian Railway Company, incorporated under Act of Parliament, hereinafter referred to as the second party,—of the Second Part;

“Witnesseth as follows, viz. :—The first party hereby let to the second for the right to use the slag for purposes in connection with their railway, and they do so use it mainly in the construction and repair of the permanent way as ballast for the rails, breaking it up by machinery erected at the slag heap so as to make it useful for this purpose. The Railway Company pay a royalty of 2d. per ton for the slag so used, the proprietors of the slag heap, the Airdrie, Coatbridge, and District Water Trustees, having elected to take that option in the agreement rather than the alternative of a fixed rent of £130. "It is only the slag that is let to the Railway Company, and should iron be found in the heap the Railway Company have no right to it under the agreement.

"The sum entered in the Valuation-roll is the amount of the royalties for the past year, and there is no dispute as to the amount of the entry should it be decided that the subject falls to enter the Valuation-roll.

"Slag is the residuum left from the manufacture of ore into iron and steel, and in the present case the appellants stated, and the Assessor was not in a position to deny, that the ore originally treated at the works which produced the slag heap did not necessarily come from the locality, but may have been in whole or in part foreign ore imported into this country from Spain and elsewhere.

"Both appellants concurred in appealing on the grounds (1) that slag, from its nature and composition, is not a mineral, and being therefore not a heritable subject, no entry should be made in the Valuation-roll in respect of the sum received from its sale; and (2) that even if it were a heritable subject, there is no let of the subject, the arrangement being merely a bargain as to sale of a commodity.

"In addition the appellants the Caledonian Railway Company contended that the entry, so far as relating to them, should be expunged, on the ground that the subject is already included in the Valuation-roll made up by the Assessor of Railways," &c.

The Valuation Committee held "(1) that slag was a mineral, or, alternatively, that the slag heap was a quarry in the sense of the Valuation Acts; (2) that the Railway Company are in the sense of the Valuation Acts tenants or occupants of the slag heap; and (3) that the fact that the valuation of the slag is dealt with by the Railway Assessor in computing the value of the undertaking, does not operate against its inclusion in the local Valuation-roll. They accordingly dismissed the appeal."

Argued for the appellants;—(1) A slag heap did not fall within the term "minerals" in section 42 of the Valuation Act, 1854.* The party, and the second party take in lease from them, All and Whole the slag heaps deposited upon that part of the first party's lands at Chapelhall, within the parish of Bothwell and county of Lanark, delineated and coloured red on the plan or tracing annexed and signed as relative hereto, with free ingress and egress to and from the said slag heaps, and liberty to remove and carry away the same in the ways and roads least hurtful to the first party's remaining lands, and likewise with liberty to erect a crusher or crushers, with the necessary engine or engines, on a suitable site on the first party's ground to be approved by the first party, but excepting and reserving all iron in the said slag heaps, and that for the period and on the terms and conditions following, viz.," &c.

* The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91), enacts:—Sec. 42. "The expression 'lands and heritages' shall extend to word "minerals," as used in the Act, meant something that was taken from the ground in its natural state. Slag was a manufactured, and not a mineral. Slag was in the same position as the iron which had been extracted from the ore which produced the slag, and it could not be suggested that the iron simply by being stored in a heap for the market became a heritable subject to be entered in the Valuation-roll. The slag might have been sold and used as it was produced, in which case it would have been impossible to value it as a separate subject. If each particular piece of slag was a moveable subject, as it certainly was, it was difficult to see why, or at what time, a number of pieces of slag became heritable by being accumulated together. Clay, stone, and slag had been held not to be minerals within the meaning of certain statutes.¹ (2) The agreement here was really not a lease; it was a sale of slag at the rate of 2d. per ton. (3) At all events the entry should be expunged in so far as the Railway Company was concerned, for the slag was used as ballast for the Company's permanent way, and was valued as part of the Company's undertaking. The effect of the Assessor's contention would be that the slag would be valued three times, first, in the form of iron ore when taken from the earth, second, as a slag heap, and third, as ballast for the Company's permanent way.

Argued for the Assessor;—(1) Slag was undoubtedly a mineral, but the question here was not, Was a slag heap a "mineral" in the sense of section 42 of the Act? The question was, Did a slag heap fall within the expression "lands and heritages"? Blaes had been held to be assessable.² That case was exactly in point. A heap of blaes or of slag became a subject to be entered in the roll, as soon as the heap was of sufficient size to be of marketable value. It made no difference that the slag had been artificially deposited, or that the iron ore from which it was made had come from abroad.³ Kelp likewise, washed up on to the shore, was a proper subject for entry in the roll,⁴ which shewed that subjects sua natura moveable might be "lands and heritages" within the meaning of the Act. (2) The agreement here was, what it bore to be, a lease. (3) If the slag heap was properly entered quoad the Water Trustees, it was also properly entered quoad the Railway Company. It was simply a case of landlord and tenant.

LORD LOW.—I do not regard the slag heap in question as being either "minerals" or a quarry within the meaning of the Valuation Act; but it seems to me that it is undoubtedly a heritable subject which is let for a yearly rent. It is therefore liable to assessment. In the case slag is described as "the residuum left from the manufacture of ore into iron and steel," and we all know very well how in practice such a residuum is treated. A suitable piece of ground is obtained and the slag is deposited on that piece of ground. In course of time a large hill is formed, and, when that hill comes to be profitable, I fail to see why it should not be assessed. It is undoubtedly heritable, and is a subject capable of being let and yielding a rent.

Lord Low.

I am accordingly of opinion that the decision of the Valuation Committee must be upheld.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion ; and I should not have added anything to what your Lordship has said but that the question is an interesting one, and we have had a good argument upon it. It is not, in my judgment, necessary to decide whether this slag heap is, or is not, "minerals" in the sense of section 42 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854. If it were necessary to do so, I should be disposed to answer that question in the negative, because the word "minerals" occurring, as it does, between the words "mines" and "quarries," seems to relate to something in the nature of mineral which is being wrought out from its native place in the ground. I am further of opinion that the slag heap is not a "quarry" in the sense of the Act. Then, there is a question whether the document which forms the contract between the parties (appellants) is clearly and absolutely a lease, or may be regarded as an agreement of sale. I must say that, although the form of the document is not necessarily conclusive, the contract is very like a lease. It bears to be a lease ; it is stamped as such ; and it contains provisions not only for payment of lordships, but of a stipulated fixed rent.

But however that may be, I agree in thinking that the real point in the case, and a safe and sufficient basis for our decision, is that this slag heap is heritage—a heritable subject—a corporeal hereditament—capable of yielding, and in fact yielding, an annual return ; and is therefore a fit subject of assessment. We are not, I think, called upon to decide the precise point of time at which the slag heap became such a heritable subject ; but it seems clear enough that it did so at least as soon as, if not before, the time when the agreement or lease was entered into. We heard very little argument in support of the third point raised by the Railway Company, to the effect that the slag being in fact used by them in the construction of their permanent way, the value of which is otherwise assessed, the Company were in danger of double assessment. This argument is, in my judgment, clearly untenable, and I say no more about it. Upon the whole matter, I agree with your Lordship that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Melrose Gas
Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for Roxburgh-
shire.

Valuation Acts—Principle of Valuation—Revenue Principle—Whether income to be taken on an average of years.—In valuing a gas company's undertaking the Assessor adopted the "revenue" principle, and took as the revenue the average income for the preceding five years, in one of which the income was exceptionally large.

Held that the Assessor had rightly estimated the income by taking an average of years; that five years was a fair period to average; and that the circumstance that the income for one of the five years was exceptionally large was not a ground for treating the case exceptionally.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Low.
Lord Dundas.

Case 253.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of Roxburghshire held on 10th September 1907 the Melrose Gas Company, Limited, appealed against the entry in the Valuation-roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1908 of the subjects comprised in their undertaking at the yearly rent or value of £456, and craved that the subjects should be entered at £248.

The Assessor reached the valuation entered in the roll upon the "revenue principle," and he took as the income, not the income for the past year, but the average income for the past five years.

The Gas Company admitted that the revenue principle was the proper principle to apply, but they maintained that the income ought to be taken at the income actually earned during the past year.

The Valuation Committee were of opinion that the Assessor was right.

The Gas Company obtained a case, which set forth that the revenue of the Company was £371 in 1903; £871 in 1904; £399 in 1905; £442 in 1906, and £248 in 1907. The values entered in the rolls for the first four years were not reached on the revenue principle.

Argued for the appellants;—The parties were agreed that the revenue principle was the proper method of valuation; the question was—In applying that method, was the revenue to be taken on the basis of an average of years, or at the actual income for the past year? In some cases, taking an average might be proper enough, e.g., in deducting on account of depreciation of machinery,¹ but the income was to be taken at the actual income for the year.² No doubt the result might be that the annual value would fluctuate from year to year, but in the Falkirk case³ Lord Fraser, when he laid down the revenue principle as the proper method of valuing such an undertaking as the present, expressly anticipated that that method would lead to such fluctuation, and he held that that was in exact conformity with the Act. If an average was to be taken it ought not to be an average of five years. There was no special virtue in an average of five years; the Income-Tax authorities took an average of three years, and five years in this particular case worked injustice, for the five years included £871, the exceptionally high income for 1904, after which there was a sudden drop to about half that amount, and the fall was likely to be permanent, in consequence of the competition of an electric lighting company. A possible purchaser of the appellants' undertaking would never offer a price on the basis of taking the income for 1904 into account.

The Assessor argued;—Taking the income upon an average of years was sound in principle and in result, because in that way excessive and unnatural fluctuations were avoided. Five years was a fair period to take.

Feb. 20, 1908.
Melrose Gas
Co., Limited,
v. Assessor for
shire.

LORD LOW.—I have no doubt the Assessor is perfectly right in arriving at his valuation by taking the results of trading on an average of years, because, as Lord Fraser pointed out in the Falkirk case,¹ the hypothetical tenant would, in considering what rent he could afford to give, inquire what had been the revenue upon an average of years.

I am further of opinion that an average of five years is a fair period, and indeed is generally recognised in practice to be a fair period to take. The only difficulty is that in the five years taken is included the year 1904, when the Company seems to have had an abnormally large income, and it is said that a change of circumstances has occurred since that time which has materially diminished the demand for gas. There may, however, for anything which appears to the contrary, again be a change of circumstances which may increase the income of the Company. And although I have a good deal of sympathy with their objection to the year 1904 being included in the average, I do not think that we would be justified in taking the average of a smaller number of years, or in estimating the income of the year 1904 at a less amount than that which was actually earned.

For these reasons I am of opinion that we should hold that the determination of the Committee was right.

LORD DUNDAS.—I am of the same opinion.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Feb. 21, 1908. 1907 it was entered in the Valuation-roll at the yearly rent or value of £7250. In 1907 the Assessor entered the buildings at £8780, a sum reached by taking the floorage area of each floor and applying thereto a varying rate per square foot, the rates being based upon an analysis of rents actually paid for neighbouring shops in Princes Street. Jenner & Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh. Jenner & Co. appealed and maintained that the re-valuation was not justified by any change of circumstances. The Magistrates reduced the valuation to £8000. Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh. Held that the Magistrates were wrong, and that the valuation should be reduced to £7250.

Valuation Acts—Value—Subjects unlet—Insurance Office—No similar office in same street—Valuation by comparison with shops.—A large recently built office in Princes Street, Edinburgh, belonging to and occupied by an insurance company was entered by the Assessor at £5500, a sum reached by taking the floorage area, and applying thereto varying rates per square foot, the rates being derived from an analysis of rents actually paid for shops in Princes Street. There was no similar insurance office in Princes Street. The Company appealed and maintained that the valuation ought to be on the basis of the valuation of other insurance offices in Edinburgh, e.g., in George Street or St Andrew Square.

The Magistrates reduced the valuation to £5000.

On appeal the Judges declined to interfere with the determination of the Magistrates, as it was not shewn to be unreasonable.

Lands Valuation Appeal Court.
Lord Low.
Lord Dundas.

At a meeting of the Magistrates of Edinburgh on 12th September 1907, Charles Jenner & Company, silk mercers, &c., 47 Princes Street, and the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, 64 Princes Street, appealed against the entries in the Valuation-roll of their premises respectively, for the year ending Whitsunday 1908.

and 256.

I. Charles Jenner & Company.

The entry in the Valuation-roll was in the following terms:—

Description and Situation of Subjects.		Proprietor.	Occupier.	Feu-duty.	Yearly Rent or Value.
Description.	Situation.
House, Shop, &c.	47, 48, and 49 Princes Street.	Charles Jenner & Co., Silk Mercers,	Proprietors.	£12 16	£8780

The appellants craved that the yearly rent or value should be reduced to £6000.

The Magistrates fixed the yearly rent or value at £8000.

The appellants obtained a case for appeal. The Assessor accepted the Magistrates' valuation.

The case set forth as follows:—

"The following facts were admitted or were held by the Magistrates to be proved, or within the knowledge of the Magistrates:—

"1. The appellants are owners and occupiers of a large block of buildings fronting Princes Street on the south, St David Street on the east, and Rose Street on the north. The buildings have a frontage to Princes Street of about 80 feet, to St David Street of 230 feet, and to Rose Street of 99 feet. The main portion of the building, viz., that fronting Princes Street and extending northwards along St David Street for about three-fourths of the distance to Rose Street, was erected in or about the year 1895. The premises forming the back portion were completed in 1905. The area covered by the buildings extends to 2324 square yards; the total floorage area of the buildings is 106,490 square feet; and the cubic contents 2,000,000 cubic feet.

" 2. The main portion of the building consists of nine floors, including a basement and a mezzanine floor. The back portion consists of eight floors, including a basement floor. The appellants occupy the whole buildings in connection with their business of drapers, silk mercers, &c. The main floors are used as shops and saloons and the upper floors as workrooms and a boarding residence for the firm's employees.

" 3. The cost of erecting the buildings exclusive of the cost of embellishments was £70,000.

" 4. The main portion of the building was completed in 1896, and the total assessment at that time was £6450, being £6000 for the newly-erected portion and £450 for the old buildings on the site now occupied by the back portion. The valuation remained at that figure till 1904, when it was reduced to £6000 in respect that the old buildings were being removed and the present back portion was being erected. After this reconstruction was completed in 1905 the valuation was fixed by the Assessor and acquiesced in by the appellants at £7250—£1250 being added for the then new buildings. The Assessor raised the valuation for the year ending Whitsunday 1908, because on a comparison with premises in Princes Street actually let he was of opinion that the valuation of £7250 was quite inadequate.

" 5. There are in Princes Street ninety shops and offices actually let and thirty-two shops and offices occupied by proprietors. The valuation of many of the latter has not been considered in recent years, and the rents of premises let in Princes Street have undergone considerable increase within the last few years. The Assessor is in course of scrutinising the assessable value of all the subjects occupied by proprietors with a view to bringing the whole premises in Princes Street to one level of valuation, but he has not yet overtaken the reversal of the whole of such premises.

" The Assessor arrived at his valuation of £8780 by taking the floorage area of each floor of the appellant's premises and applying thereto varying rates per square foot. These rates were based upon an analysis of the rents actually paid for the premises in Princes Street referred to in the Assessor's evidence.* . . . The Assessor further took as a check upon the sum thus arrived at the figure yielded by taking percentages upon the site value and the cost of the buildings, and he found that this figure exceeded the sum of £8780."

The determination of the Magistrates was in the following terms:—

" 1. That the appropriate method of arriving at the valuation of the appellants' premises for the purposes of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts is by comparison with such other premises in Princes Street as most nearly resemble them in situation, character, and accommodation, provided such other premises are actually let, and that an important factor in instituting a comparison with such other premises is by means of ascertaining the rate per square foot of floorage space for each floor or part of a floor of such similar premises and

"2. That while, as an alternative to the method of ascertaining the value by comparison with other premises, it is sometimes expedient, where the owner has erected buildings for his own occupation, and there are no similar let properties in the neighbourhood available for comparison, to inquire what interest or return an owner might reasonably expect upon his outlay if the building had been erected for letting to a tenant, and regard this as an equivalent of rent, it is not necessary or appropriate to adopt this alternative in the present case.

"The Magistrates, taking the whole circumstances into account, and acting in accordance with the opinions above set forth, resolved to fix the rental in the Valuation-roll at £8000."

The appellants contended;—"Their premises not being let, but being in their own occupation, the fair method of arriving at their annual value was by a comparison with the rental or assessed annual value of other similar premises in the immediate vicinity. The appellants' premises consisted of a front portion abutting on Princes Street, 784 square yards in area, a middle portion, 1018 square yards in area, and a back portion, 522 square yards in area, the front and middle portions having been erected in 1895, and the back portion in 1904. As regards the new back portion, this had been valued in 1905, immediately after its erection, at £1250, and had remained at this figure in 1906, but although no change of circumstances had taken place, the Assessor proposed to supersede this recent valuation and value the back portion at £1514, 16s., an increase of £264, 16s. As regards the middle portion it was conceded that this portion fell to be entered at half the rate fixed for the front portion. The main controversy was as to the valuation of the front portion, and comparison with similar neighbouring premises shewed that the Assessor had valued this portion at an excessive figure. The neighbouring premises which were most nearly comparable with the front portion of the appellants' premises were those of Messrs Cranston & Elliot, Limited, assessed at £3000; Messrs John Wight & Company, presently let at £1400; Messrs Henry, Darling, & Company, let at £875; and Messrs Cowan & Strachan, let at £850. All of these premises were situated in Princes Street, and were occupied in each case by a single firm from roof to basement, as was the case with the appellants' premises. If the front portion of the appellants' premises were valued at the same rate proportionally to area as the premises mentioned, the middle portion at half that rate, and the back portion at £1250, the valuation would not exceed £6000. If this result were tested by taking the rate per square foot of the floorage area, and per cubic foot of the cubical contents of the premises compared, and applying the same to the appellants' premises, a figure practically identical would be reached. . . . While the appellants' premises had the advantage of a frontage to South St David Street, this was counterbalanced by the fact that the proportion of floorage area to frontage to Princes street was very much larger in the case of the appellants' premises than in the case of any of the premises compared. A large amount of back floorage, proportionally to street frontage rendered premises much less marketable. Moreover, in the particular case of Messrs Cranston & Elliot, Limited, the frontage to Princes Street exceeded the appellants' frontage by 13 feet.

"The appellants further contended that the Assessor had erred in the method of comparison adopted by him. He had merely taken the average floorage rates of a number of other premises in Princes Street, and applied these rates to the corresponding floors in the appellants' premises. Apart from the objection that floorage rates by themselves afforded no satisfactory guidance, the average rates which the Assessor had taken were in no case derived from premises occupied by a single firm from roof to basement. On the contrary, his floorage rates for the street or shop floor were taken, with a single exception, from premises where the occupier occupied only that floor. As the street floor was by far the most valuable, and if let separately commanded a much higher rent proportionally than if let along with, and as part of a whole tenement, the rates selected by the Assessor for comparison afforded no criterion for the valuation of the street floor of the appellants' premises, which were occupied as a unum quid from roof to basement.

"While the method of taking a percentage on cost was not regarded by the Court as a sound system of valuation, the appellants' premises had been greatly over-valued by the Assessor on this basis also. The site had been independently valued within two years at £100,000, and the cost of the buildings, apart from embellishments, it was agreed, might be taken at £70,000 or thereby. At the rate of 3 per cent on the site value and 4 per cent on the structural cost, which were fair rates in the case of so large and unmarketable a concern, the figure of £5800 was reached.

"The appellants' premises, after their completion in 1905, had been valued at £7250, which the appellants considered excessive, but against which they did not at the time appeal, and the proposed increase of £1530 on this very recent valuation was not justified by any change of circumstances whatever. If the valuation of Princes Street premises generally was to be revised, it was appropriate that the valuations of old standing should first be dealt with, and, in any event, it imposed an unfair burden on the appellants in competition with their trade rivals to single out their premises for increased valuation this year, in place of proceeding by way of a comprehensive and simultaneous scheme of re-valuation of all business premises in Princes Street."

The Assessor answered;—

"As many of the valuations in Princes Street had not been revised for many years, it was proper for him to undertake the revisal of these as early as possible.

"The best criterion for assessing the value of the appellants' property in Princes Street is a comparison with the subjects actually let in the vicinity.

"In Princes Street ninety of the premises are actually let, while thirty-two are in the occupation of proprietors. The Assessor, therefore, analysed each separate let subject and arrived at figures or rates applicable to each flat of the different tenements, which rates having been taken from many varied subjects gave a fair indication of the values applicable to each flat of all the tenements in the street. He was then, he considered, in a position to proceed by comparison to adjust the value of the appellants' subjects.

Feb. 21, 1908. "The Assessor, though unable to overtake the complete re-valuation of the whole street in this year, was able to revise a considerable number of the valuations of subjects lying between the east end of Princes Street and Hanover Street. In all, the Assessor has revised nine such valuations. After conference with the Assessor, Messrs Thomas Methven & Sons, 15 Princes Street, Andrew Elliot, 17 Princes Street, Sun Fire Office, 40 Princes Street, John Dickson, 63a Princes Street, Edinburgh Café Company, 70 Princes Street, and H. C. Baildon & Sons, 73 Princes Street, acquiesced in valuations practically on the basis proposed by the Assessor in this case. Further, the valuation of Messrs Forsyth's new premises at the corner of Princes Street and St Andrew Street, based on the rates applied in making the valuation of the appellants' premises, was accepted by them. Messrs Romanes & Paterson, who appealed to the Magistrates, have acquiesced in their decision, which applies the Magistrates' decision in this case proportionately to their smaller premises, and are not to proceed further.

"The Assessor contends that he has adopted the only method for valuing a large block of buildings such as that of the appellants, viz., by comparison and applying floorage rates taken from premises actually let.* He has arrived at his valuation by taking rates from subjects actually let and in the immediate vicinity of the appellants' premises, whereas the appellants found upon instances of valuations—as distinguished from lets—and of subjects which lie at a considerable distance from the premises in question.

"The appellants' premises have been the subject of two previous separate valuations—one after the front portion was completed in 1895 and the other after the back portion was completed in 1905. When the last-mentioned valuation was made the sum arrived at was

* The Assessor deponed, inter alia, as follows:—"I based my valuation on certain rates I have given, and applied them to the floorage area. These rates I justify by comparison with actual lets in Princes Street. The figure of 10s. which I give for the street floor in my valuation of Jenner's I justify by a comparison with the nine cases I gave. The case of Mackay & Chisholm brings out 9s. 10½d.; Goodson's, 10s. 2d.; Dow, 12s. 8d.; Duncan, 10s. 9d.; Lennie, 10s.; Stanley, 10s. 6d.; Crouch, 10s. 9d.; Milne, 10s. 8d.; Rentons, 11s. These are all for street floors. These are all in Princes Street, but they are not all back 50 feet. In each of the nine cases the premises are let. Roughly speaking, the rates I have taken apply to the floorage given in each of the nine cases of rent. With reference to the other rates I apply to Jenners, if required I can by reference to one or other of these nine cases shew that in each case my rate is warranted, with the exception of the basement, which in my estimate of Jenner's is too low. Coming to the nine cases which are actually let, I have applied my rates in each one of the cases. In the case of Mackay & Chisholm I have applied my rates and got £905, 14s. 6d., and the rent is £905. Applying my system to the case of Goodson's I get in my rates £1001, and the let price is £1000. In the case of Dow my rates give £501, whereas it is let at £500. In the case of Duncan my rates give £551, and it is let at £550. In the case of Lennie the figure comes out exactly. In the case of Stanley my rates applied give £1232, and the rent is £1235. In the case of Crouch my rates are £374, actual let £375. In the case of Milne my rates give £302, and they let at £300. That leaves only the case of Renton. In the case of Renton my rates work out at £2237, whereas the let is £2210. My view is that the system I have taken as evidence is fair when applied to the premises let, as it shews exactly the same as the rent."

simply added to that of the former. . . . The appellants' premises cannot in any case be considered as having any back portion, as the so-called 'new portion' and 'back portion' have very valuable frontage to St David Street. He does not admit that the building should be charged at half rates, nor does he admit that the 'back portion' should be taken at a fixed value of £1250. This sum is apparently taken because of its being the valuation placed upon the last-erected portion of the premises, and when this sum was fixed it was simply added to the former valuation of the older erection. The Assessor contends that the premises must be valued as a whole, and further, that the appellants cannot assume the value, of the back premises taken in connection with and as a part of an entire building to be £1250, unless they were able to shew that that sum represented the true value, and this they made no attempt to prove.

"As an additional test of the valuation arrived at as above pointed out, the Assessor applied the test of cost, and this worked out, as shewn in his evidence, at £9500, and this sum was spoken to by his witnesses, and was arrived at by them as explained in their evidence. In making this additional test the Assessor assumed the value of the area to be £150,000, and the building £70,000, exclusive of any consideration for embellishments. The appellants virtually admit the latter sum to be correct, and the Assessor submits that his valuation of the site is justified by the values spoken to in the proof as having been actually paid for sites in the vicinity, and other evidence.

"Taking the figures assumed by him, the Assessor took 4 per cent, on the value of the site,	£6000
and 5 per cent on the buildings, exclusive as above mentioned,	3500

"Making	£9500
---------	--------------

"He was thus satisfied that his method of valuation by comparison and application of rates of floorage, . . . was reasonable, and he accepted the lower figure in the table in fixing the valuation.

"The Assessor further contends that the usual percentage rate applied in Scotland is 4 per cent on land and 5 per cent on buildings. The percentages of 3 per cent and 4 per cent spoken to as having been applied in two cases in England are not applicable to the present case.

"The Assessor further contends that he cannot be expected to revise the whole of such an extensive street as Princes Street in one year, and he does not admit that he is bound by any particular mode of procedure such as the appellants point out, in dealing with subjects coming into his valuation, or that he ought to withhold any number of valuations from the roll from year to year until he has completed a street. The logical issue of such a principle would require him to hold over the valuation until a district, or even the whole of the city, was revised and put on the same footing. He contends that so soon as he is satisfied that the valuation of any single subject in the city requires to be altered he is bound to enter such new valuation in the roll. He further contends that any arguments drawn from comparison with unrevised premises in Princes Street being obsolete valuations fall to be disregarded."

The entry in the Valuation-roll was in the following terms:—

North British

Co. v. Assessor
for Edinburgh.

Description and Situation of Subjects.		Proprietor.	Occupier.	Fen-duty.	Yearly rent or value.
Description.	Situation.
Office.	64 Princes Street.	North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, per James Chatham, manager.	Proprietors.	£6 6 2	£5500

The appellants craved that the yearly rent or value should be reduced to £2000.

The Magistrates fixed the yearly rent or value at £5000.

The appellants obtained a case for appeal.

The case set forth as follows:—

“ The following facts were admitted or held by the Magistrates to be proved, or within the knowledge of the Magistrates:—

“ 1. The appellants are owners and occupiers of the premises forming No. 64 Princes Street, the building of which has been completed since the Valuation-roll for the year 1906-7 was made up. The building is rectangular in shape, having a frontage of 102 feet to Princes Street, and extending northwards 114 feet to Rose Street Lane. The area covered by the buildings is 1632 superficial yards in extent, and the gross floorage area of the building is 49,175 square feet. The building consists of three sections, viz., (1) a front block facing Princes Street, containing a basement floor, a street floor, and three flats and an attic flat above; (2) a centre block containing a ground floor and basement under; and (3) a back block adjoining Rose Street Lane containing a basement floor and three storeys above. The front wall of the section facing Princes Street is separated from the street by a recess or area, and the ground floor of that section is raised 4 feet 6 inches above the level of the street.

“ 2. The whole building is occupied by the appellants for the purposes of their business of a fire and life insurance company. The street and upper flats of the front section contain a board-room and accommodation for the officials and clerks of the Company, the middle section is used as a public office, and the back block as offices, lunch-rooms, cloak-rooms, and lavatories. The basement floors consist of storage accommodation, safes, &c.

“ 3. The value of the site upon which the buildings are erected is £82,000, and the cost of the buildings, excluding the cost of embellishments, is £48,000.

“ 4. Prior to the erection of the present buildings the site was covered by old buildings, consisting of four storeys owned by the appellants, and occupied partly as shops let to tenants and partly as offices used by the appellants for the purposes of their business. The shops occupied about one-half of the frontage to Princes Street on the ground floor. The whole buildings were then assessed at £3025, of which £1400 represented the rent paid for the shops.

“ 5. There are in Princes Street ninety shops and offices actually let and thirty-two shops and offices in the occupation of proprietors. Feb. 21, 1908.

 The valuations of many of the latter have not been considered in recent years, and the rents of premises let in Princes Street have undergone considerable increase within the last few years. The Assessor is in course of scrutinising the assessable value of the subjects occupied by proprietors with a view to bringing the whole of the premises in Princes Street to one level of valuation, but he has not yet overtaken the revisal of the whole premises, and in particular has reconsidered none of the premises in the section of Princes Street west of Hanover Street.

Jenner & Co.
 v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

North British and Mercantile Insurance
 Co. v. Assessor
 for Edinburgh.

"The Assessor arrived at his valuation of £5500 in the following manner. He took the floorage area of each floor of the appellants' premises and applied thereto varying rates per square foot. The rates were based upon an analysis of the rents actually paid for the premises in Princes Street referred to in the Assessor's evidence, after allowing for the differences in construction, character, and purpose. This method gave a valuation of £5273. . . . He then calculated the value on the basis of taking percentages upon the value of the site and the cost of the buildings, and this gave a valuation of £5680. The figure inserted in the Valuation-roll was arrived at by taking the average of these two sums."

The determination of the Magistrates was in the following terms:—

"1. That the appropriate method by which to arrive at a valuation of the premises in question, for the purposes of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, was by comparing them with other premises in Princes Street, and that an important factor in instituting a comparison of other premises in Princes Street with the present premises is by means of ascertaining the rate per square foot of floorage space for each floor, or part of a floor, of such other premises as are actually let, and applying such rates to the corresponding floorage areas of the appellants' premises, subject to such variations as may be necessary to give effect to the specialties of the present case, particularly the use made of the premises, the fact that the frontage to Princes Street is recessed, and that the ground floor is raised above the level of the street, and the number of flats occupied by the appellants.

"2. That in respect there are no very similar premises available for comparison with the building in question, the Magistrates are entitled to inquire what interest or return should reasonably be expected upon the value of the site and the outlay on the buildings if the buildings had been erected for letting to a tenant, and regard the result not as the rental to be inserted in the Valuation-roll, but merely as a check upon the result obtained by the comparison of floorage rates above specified. If the method now indicated were adopted, it would give a larger sum than the valuation appealed against.

"The Magistrates, taking the whole circumstances into account, and acting in accordance with the opinions above set forth, resolved to fix the rental in the Valuation-roll at £5000."

The appellants contended:—

"The yearly value put upon their premises is excessive, and is arrived at upon an erroneous principle and by an improper method of valuation.

"The Assessor proposed to value the said premises at £5500 yearly. This figure he reached by applying to the floorage area of the appel-

Feb. 21, 1908. lants' premises a rate per foot obtained from the rental, not of offices, but of shops in Princes Street—that is to say, by considering what rental the appellants' buildings would yield if converted into shops; and by arbitrarily dividing the difference between the figure so arrived at—£5273—and a sum equal to four per cent on the estimated cost of the site and five per cent on the estimated cost of the buildings—£5680. There is no principle on which this method of valuation can be justified. In the first place, it has been frequently decided that the cost of the subjects forms no good guide for determining the yearly rent which they would bring, and further, the rate selected by the Assessor of four and five per cent on site and buildings respectively is purely arbitrary, and is excessive. In the second place, it is an erroneous method of valuation to take into account what the premises would yield if turned to some other use from that to which they are presently applied. Both of these tests of yearly value were expressly disapproved in the case of the North British Railway Hotel.¹ It was impossible therefore to reach any proper conclusion by arbitrarily splitting the difference between the results arrived at through these two erroneous methods of valuation. Further, it is notorious that premises in Princes Street, let as offices, would not yield the rental which they would obtain if let as shops, and instances may readily be found in the Valuation-roll shewing that banks and offices in Princes Street are assessed at less than similar premises occupied as shops. The appellants do not expect or obtain any advantage as shops do from passing traffic; their premises are designed only for offices, and by reason of the fact that the building is recessed from the street, and that the first floor is built several feet above the street level, they could not conveniently be used for shops. . . .

“But even if it were legitimate to take the rental of shops in Princes Street as the basis of comparison, the examples founded upon by the Assessor afford no guide for the valuation of the appellants' premises. In most cases they consist of shops occupying only a ground floor, which are universally highly rented as compared with shops containing several floors, and yield rents which could not be obtained in the same proportion for premises like those of the appellants, which, from floor to roof, are in one occupancy. In some cases, again, they are shops of little depth from the street and afford no ground of comparison, because the less the depth in proportion to the frontage the higher is the rent. Further, while in the case of shops extending to a greater depth than 50 feet from the street, the Assessor diminishes the rate by one-half on the further back portions of the buildings, he makes no such diminution in the case of the appellants' premises. Finally, all the rates put upon the different portions of the premises selected by the Assessor are purely arbitrary, and are founded upon no ground of fact.

“The appellants contend that the most reliable basis for the valuation of their subjects is to be found in the valuation of similar buildings used as one tenement for the same purposes. Such examples are to be found in the cases of the Standard Insurance Office and the Scottish Equitable Insurance Office. If the rate of valuation per foot of the floor area of the first of these offices were taken, the appellants' premises would be valued at £2088, and if the rate of the second were applied the result would be £2007. The offices referred to are Feb. 21, 1908. respectively in George Street and St Andrew Square; but insurance offices obtain no advantage from being in Princes Street, and there is no ground for assuming that insurance companies would pay a higher rent for offices in the one street than in the others. In the case of the Life Association Insurance Offices, which are in Princes Street, the rent at which they are let on the first floor is 1s. 4d. per foot, and of the shops on the ground floor 4s. 5d. per foot. Similarly, the offices on the first floor of the Palace Hotel buildings fetch a rent of 1s. 5d. per foot. If these rates were applied to the appellants' premises the total rental would be under £2200.

"No buildings in any way similar to those of the appellants are entirely occupied as offices in Princes Street. The nearest examples of similar blocks of building occupying similar sites are the New Club, the Conservative Club, and the University Club. Taking the present valuation of these Clubs, the yearly value per foot of floor area works out at 10·02d. per foot in the case of the New Club, 10·23d. per foot in the case of the Conservative Club, and 8·45d. per foot in the case of the University Club. If these rates were applied to the appellants' premises they would give valuations of £1932, £1972, and £1731 respectively.

"The appellants accordingly contend that in accordance with these figures, and the evidence adduced by them, their premises should not be entered in the Valuation-roll at more than £2000."

The Assessor answered:—

"The Assessor in the absence of any buildings quite analogous in Princes Street submits that he acted correctly in applying the principle of floorage space, checked by cost. This he submits was a correct basis, and in so far as it bore hardly on the appellants, was amply corrected by the deduction made from his valuation by the Magistrates."

Then followed contentions and statements similar to those contained in the first four paragraphs of the Assessor's answers in Charles Jenner & Company's case, supra, pp. 605-6.

"The application of the rates before mentioned to the appellants' premises brings out, as shewn in the Assessor's evidence, a total of £5273, 11s. 9d. The Assessor proceeded to check the result on the 'cost' principle. He accepted the figures supplied to him by the manager of the appellants' Company, viz.:—

Say £82,000 at 4 per cent,	£3,280	0	0
and buildings £52,000—less allowance for embellishments £4000—£48,000 at 5 per cent,	2,400	0	0

and in fixing the valuation of £5500 he split the difference between the result obtained by measurement and that obtained by cost, making practically £5500.

"The Assessor refers to his evidence, in which he distinctly stated that his valuation was based on the 'floorage' principle, and that he used the 'cost' principle as a check. He did not value the appellants' premises at what they might bring if turned to some other use than that for which they were specially designed and intended, and

Feb. 21, 1908. he did not base his valuation on the 'cost' principle, although he considers he was justified in using that principle as a check on the figures otherwise arrived at by him.

Jenner & Co.
v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

North British and Mercantile Insurance
Co. v. Assessor
for Edinburgh.

"Under the former valuation, prior to the erection of the new building, the assessments stood at £3025. The additional value of the new building brings the valuation up to at least £5000.

"The Assessor believes that a sum of about £52,000 was spent in demolishing the old buildings and erecting the new ones. He submits that this being so the subjects fall to be entered as at least £5000.

"The Assessor does not admit that premises in Princes Street let as those premises were do not yield the same return as shops. Such subjects as are let for offices yield as high rents as similar subjects when otherwise occupied.

"The analogy of insurance buildings elsewhere than in Princes Street has, the Assessor submits, no bearing, and the valuation of clubs in Princes Street—whose values are as yet unrevised by him—are, he submits, of no value at all."

LORD LOW.—These cases have been extremely well argued, and as I have formed an opinion on both of them, in which I understand your Lordship agrees, I think it is best that we should dispose of them at once.

Taking, in the first place, the case of Jenner & Company, I agree with the statement of the Magistrates that the appropriate method of valuation "is by comparison with such other premises in Princes Street as most nearly resemble them in situation, character, and accommodation."

Now, it happens that there are a number of premises in Princes Street which are as similar in character, situation, &c., as one is likely to find. I refer to those of Wight & Company, Cowan & Strachan, Henry, Darling, & Company, Renton & Company, and Cranston & Elliot. A comparison with these has made on my mind a strong impression that the amount at which the appellants' premises have stood in the Valuation-roll for some time, viz., £7250, is a fair yearly value for them in their present condition.

It is said that the main part of the building has stood at the same figure (namely, £6000) in the roll for twelve years. Now, that is true, but then in 1905 the valuation was reviewed by the Assessor and fixed at the above-mentioned sum of £7250.

Now, I confess I can find no evidence of change of circumstances to warrant the increase which the Assessor proposes to put on the premises for the present year. But, on the other hand, no circumstances have been stated to warrant their being entered at a lower figure than formerly. I propose, therefore, that we hold that the determination of the Magistrates is wrong, and that the premises should be entered in the roll as formerly at £7250.

Coming to the case of the North British and Mercantile Office, the first observation which I desire to make is that it appears to me that the figure of £2000 suggested by the Insurance Company is altogether inadequate. It is difficult to find a basis for assessing the value of this subject, as there are no other premises in Princes Street, used as offices, at all comparable with it. I entirely agree with the Assessor that you cannot value premises in Princes Street at a value put on similar subjects in George Street or Feb. 21, 1908. St Andrew Square. This much may be said—that insurance offices Jenner & Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh. should be valued at a somewhat lower rate than shops, because the same rent would not be got for an office as for a shop.

The valuation made by the Assessor was £5500, and the Valuation Committee have reduced that figure to £5000. I confess that I should have been very well pleased if the Committee had fixed a smaller amount, because my impression is that £5000 is a full valuation. Still, this is one of those cases in which it is impossible to do more than make an approximate estimate of the value, and I think that it is impossible to say that the estimate made by the Committee is not reasonable. I am therefore of opinion that we would not be justified in interfering with their determination. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co. v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

LORD DUNDAS.—I agree in regard to both the cases for the reasons which your Lordship has stated, and I have nothing to add.

In the case of Charles Jenner & Company the Judges were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was wrong, and that the valuation should be reduced to £7250.

In the case of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company the Judges were of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates was right.

ASSESSOR FOR ARBROATH, Respondent.—D.-F. Campbell—Chapell. Mar. 4, 1908.

Valuation Acts—Values—Subjects unlet—Spinning Mills—Estimated capital value—Criterion of value—Recent sales of similar property in vicinity.—In fixing the capital value of spinning mills, in the occupation of their owners, as the basis for reaching the yearly rent or value of the mills, it is legitimate to take into consideration the prices obtained at a number of recent sales of these and similar mills in the same town. Webster & Sons v. Assessor for Arbroath.

Valuation Acts—Appeal—Appeal against recent valuation by the Judges—New evidence.—In 1902 the Lands Valuation Appeal Judges fixed the yearly value of the Alma spinning mill, Arbroath (occupied by the owners) at £1293, and in succeeding years the Assessor continued to enter the mill at that sum. In 1907 the owners appealed against the entry, and adduced evidence that since 1900 nearly all the similar mills in Arbroath had been sold, and at prices which shewed that the Assessor's valuation of these mills was over 50 per cent too high. The Valuation Committee (with the exception of £130, which they allowed for depreciation) confirmed the Assessor's valuation on the ground that there was no change of circumstances since the value was fixed in 1902.

Held by the Judges, on appeal, that the evidence (which was not before the Court in 1902) as to the recent sales of other mills justified a reconsideration of the value of the mill in question, and reduced the valuation to £923.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the burgh of Arbroath, Lands Valuation Appeal Court. held on 11th September 1907 (1) Francis Webster & Sons, Alma Works, Arbroath; (2) The Netherward Spinning and Weaving Company, Netherward Works, Arbroath; and (3) Anderson & Chalmers, Brothock Mill, Arbroath, appealed respectively against Lord Low. The appellants Francis Webster & Sons, The Netherward Spinning and Weaving Company, and Anderson & Chalmers, asked respectively that the valuations should be reduced in cumulo to (1) Alma Works, £783, 5s.; (2) Netherward Works, £260; (3) Brothock Mill, £337, 10s. Mar. 4, 1908.

Webster & Sons v. Assessor for Arbroath.

A proof was led. The evidence shewed that all the spinning mills in Arbroath except two had been the subject of sale within the last twenty years. The appellants produced an abstract of particulars, the material portions of which are quoted below.* It was admitted that 18/32ds was the proper proportion of the capital value applicable to heritage.

As set forth in the case for appeal after mentioned, the appellants Francis Webster & Sons and the Netherward Spinning and Weaving Company contended "(1) that the method of valuation adopted by the Assessor was not in accordance with the true meaning of the Valuation Acts. (2) That the true annual value of the subjects cannot be ascertained by taking a percentage on the structural cost, or by placing an arbitrary rate on the floorage, or number of spindles and looms in the concern. (3) That the true method of valuing the subjects in question was by ascertaining their annual value as compared with other buildings admittedly similar, whose value had been fixed by sales or leases in the open market. (4) That the assumed capital values on which the valuation of the Assessor is based are inconsistent with every case of a long series of sales and leases in the open market of similar subjects extending over the last twenty years, and including a number of recent transactions. (5) That the method of valuation by the Assessor was contrary to the principle of valuation fixed by the Court with reference to the subjects of Andrew Lowson, Limited—Andrew Lowson, Limited, v. Assessor for Arbroath.¹ (6) That the valuation of the Assessor was excessive and contrary to the evidence led."

The Assessor replied:—"That the particular circumstances attending the sale of the mill properties, which had recently changed hands, were such as to render the prices an unreliable basis for valuing the subjects of these appeals,—inter alia, both the Brothock Mill and the Burnside Works had been standing idle for some time before they were sold. The latter had been depleted of machinery, and the former was largely fitted with a class of machinery for which there was little demand at the time. That the Assessor's method of valuation was in accordance with usage in the centres of the flax trade and with the Valuation Acts. The principle laid down in Andrew Lowson, Limited, v. Assessor for Arbroath,¹ did not apply, the case being ruled by Webster & Sons v. Assessor for Arbroath,² which was an appeal dealing with the same subjects as the present ones. In that case the valuation of the Committee was sustained on appeal, and the principle of valuation adopted by the Assessor was upheld. That no material change affecting the value of the subjects had occurred since 1902."

Besides putting forward contentions similar to contentions (1), (2), (4), (5), and (6) of the other appellants, the appellants Anderson & Chalmers contended:—" (3) That the subjects having been sold in open market (after being duly advertised for private and public sale) for £8000, and this price being consistent with the other transactions which have taken place in the open market, the price must be held to be the full capital value of the subjects, and should be taken as the basis for arriving at the annual value. (4) That it having been agreed that 18/32ds of the total capital value of the subjects shall be taken as the proportion applicable to heritage, £4500 (being 18/32ds of £8000) is the capital value in the present case, and this at 7½ per cent, being admittedly the highest percentage charged, shews the annual value to be £337, 10s."

The Assessor replied:—

"That in the case of the Brothock Mill the purchase price, while it ought to be considered quantum valeat, was not, taken by itself, a reliable basis on which to value the works of the appellants Messrs Anderson & Chalmers, but that there should be taken into consideration the recent history of the subjects and all the other available data. That the circumstances under which the sale took place were such that the sale price did not reflect the true value of the subjects for the purposes of the Valuation Acts. That the market for mill property in Arbroath is a very small one, being confined to the manufacturers carrying on business within the burgh, and having the requisite technical knowledge and capital. That a period of dull trade had diminished the demand for mill property, and that, on the other hand, two or three mills had come into the market at the same time. That the effect of this was the absence of that competition among purchasers which would be found attending an exposure to public auction under normal conditions. That while trade had begun to improve when the purchase took place, this improvement had not had time to affect the purchase price, and that the position of the sellers, a body of private trustees, disabled them from taking advantage of the improvement, and gave the purchasers an undue advantage over them. That the purchase price was lowered owing to the subjects standing idle. . . . If due weight were given to all the circumstances his valuation would be found to be a fair one."

Webster &
Sons v.
Assessor for Arbroath.

The determination of the Valuation Committee was in the following terms, viz. :—

"Arbroath, 28th September 1907.—These appeals by the appellants, Francis Webster & Sons and the Netherward Spinning and Weaving Company, appear to the Valuation Committee to be on all-fours, and they have therefore been considered and dealt with together.

"The Alma Works and the Netherward Works have for many years been in possession of the present proprietors, who appealed against the Burgh Assessor's valuation of the respective premises in 1901, and their appeals being refused by the Valuation Committee, the appellants craved a case for the opinion of His Majesty's Judges, and on 11th February 1902 the Judges were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right, and that the appeals should be refused.¹ A good deal of evidence was adduced before the Committee in reference to the declining state of the flax industry in Arbroath, and the Committee are satisfied that the Arbroath flax and linen trade as a whole has, for several years, not been prosperous. In the case of these particular works, however, there has been no evidence placed before the Committee to shew that there has been any change of circumstances to warrant the Valuation Committee in departing from the existing valuation, as confirmed by the Judges in 1902, with the exception that, in one respect, there is some depreciation of the subjects which may be properly kept in view." The Committee then reduced the valuation of the Alma Works to the extent of £130, and of the Netherward Works to the extent of £100, in respect of depreciation of engines and boilers.

"In the case of this appeal by Messrs Anderson & Chalmers the valuation of the Brothock Mill, &c., was £808, being the amount at which it had stood for many years when belonging to the late Mr David Corsar. . . . The mill had been unoccupied from February 1904 to the date of Mr Corsar's death in December 1904, and from that date till February 1907, when it was purchased by Messrs Anderson & Chalmers, the appellants. . . . It appears from the evidence placed before the Committee that Mr Corsar's trustees, after his death, used every endeavour to realise the property, but the state of trade was such that no one was found to make any offer for it. An improvement in the Arbroath trade began to appear about September 1906, and this improvement having continued, Messrs Anderson &

Sons v.
Assessor for Arbroath.

Chalmers, the appellants, made, in January 1907, an offer to purchase the property at the price of £8000. Mr Corsar's trustees resolved to accept that offer. From their knowledge of the local trade the Valuation Committee believe that if Mr Corsar's trustees had been less anxious to sell, they could have got a considerably better price by waiting a few months longer; but as they did not feel in a position to work the mill themselves, and as to hold it implied a very considerable loss in interest, exclusive of the actual outlay in keeping a mill with valuable machinery in good order, it is not surprising that when they got an actual offer they resolved to accept it.

"The appellants Messrs Anderson & Chalmers have asked that the valuation of £808 be reduced to £337, 10s. The Assessor has been unable to accept this, and the Committee are of opinion that the Assessor is to a large extent correct; but looking to all the circumstances of the case, and to the evidence which was submitted in regard to the trade of Arbroath, the Committee do not think that the valuation of £808 can be properly continued. . . . The Brothock Mill had been standing for upwards of two years; the workpeople had been all dispersed, and could not easily be brought together again, or their places filled by others. The Committee are satisfied that in normal circumstances such a mill as the Brothock Mill, after being closed for some time, the connection broken up, and the workpeople dispersed and probably removed elsewhere, could not be worked during the first year except at a loss, and as it was not suggested that the mill was being worked at a loss, the Committee take that as further evidence of the very great improvement which has taken place in the spinning trade in Arbroath. On the other hand there is the fact that these works were formerly let at £850, and that the appellants Messrs Anderson & Chalmers did not contradict the suggestion made by the Assessor, that, although they had acquired the property for £8000, they had now insured the buildings and machinery against loss by fire for £20,000 or upwards. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, the Committee . . . fix the valuation of the whole Brothock Mill properties at £600."

The appellants obtained a case for appeal.

The Assessor acquiesced in the determination of the Committee.

The contentions in the case sufficiently shew the nature of the arguments before the Judges.¹

At advising,—

LORD LOW.—There is no doubt that the evidence upon which the appellants mainly found is very striking. It appears that all the spinning mills in Arbroath, except apparently two, have been the subject of sales, and that in no case has the price actually obtained been within 50 per cent of the capital value estimated by the Assessor. It is true that two of the sales took place many years ago, one being in 1888 and the other in 1892. All the other sales, however, have taken place since 1900, and therefore, in my judgment, furnish important evidence of the market value of spinning-mills in Arbroath at the present time.

It was said that in the autumn of 1906 there was an improvement in the trade, and that seems to have been the case, but whether it has continued or not is doubtful. It was also said that while trade was very good during Mar. 4, 1908. the continuance of the South African war, there was great depression when Webster & the war came to an end. That may be so, but it is significant that sales Sons v. made during the war in 1900 shew substantially the same result as sales Assessor for Arbroath. made after the war, namely, that the price actually obtained was at least 50 Lord Low. per cent below the Assessor's estimate.

It is, however, to be remembered that we do not know the precise circumstances of all the sales, but several of them were more or less forced sales of mills which had ceased working. I therefore do not think that it would be safe to take the actual prices as fixing the capital value for the purpose of ascertaining the yearly rent—I mean that the capital value must be taken at something more than the prices; but, on the other hand, the result of the sales seems to me to shew that the capital value estimated by the Assessor is much too high.

That is the view which has been taken by the Valuation Committee in regard to the Brothock Mill, and accordingly they have reduced the Assessor's valuation of £808 to £600. If the Committee had fixed the value at a still lower figure I should have agreed with them, but (especially in view of the fact that they have local knowledge which we have not) I am not prepared to say that the amount at which they have valued the mill is not reasonable, and therefore I do not think that we would be justified in interfering with their determination.

In regard to the Alma Works and the Netherward Works, the Committee have reduced the Assessor's valuation in respect of depreciation of engines and boilers, but otherwise they have allowed the valuations to stand. The chief ground upon which the Committee have proceeded is that these works were the subject of an appeal in 1902, when this Court sustained the determination of the then Committee fixing the yearly value of the works at the amount at which they have ever since appeared in the Valuation-roll. The Committee in the present case say that no evidence has been placed before them to shew that there had been any change of circumstances to warrant them in departing from the existing valuation as confirmed by the Judges in 1902, except as regards the engines and boilers.

Perhaps no substantial change of circumstances has been proved, but I think that we have evidence before us which was not before the learned Judges in 1902, especially in regard to the sales which have taken place. Accordingly, I think that it is quite competent for us to reconsider the valuation of 1902.

I am not sure how many cases of sales of mills were brought to the notice of the Court in 1902; but, however that may be, Lord Kyllachy, after saying that if a "multitude" of sales had been before the Court a general depreciation of mill property might have been made out, proceeded to describe the actual evidence thus:—"But that is a different thing from having before us—which is all we have here—one or two isolated cases of leases or sales—some of them as far back as in 1888, others of them in 1892, and, I think, two more recently."

I do not think that a similar description could be given of the evidence adduced in this case, which includes sales which have taken place since 1902, and which, as I have already indicated, appears to me to be entitled

Webster &
Sons v.
Assessor for Arbroath.

Lord Low.

to great weight; and I repeat that the fact that additional and apparently more precise evidence has been led justifies us in reconsidering the value of the mills in question.

Of course the allowance which the Committee have made in respect of depreciated plant and machinery must receive effect, but in addition to that I am satisfied that the appellants are entitled to a substantial reduction of the valuation. I therefore propose that the value of the Netherward Works should be reduced to £500, and of the Alma Works to £923, 5s., that is to £577, 10s. for the 1st item, and £97, 10s. and £45 for the 12th and 13th items respectively, which is a reduction very nearly proportionate to that allowed by the Committee in the case of the Brothock Mill.

LORD DUNDAS.—I concur.

THE following was the opinion:—"We are of opinion (1) that the determination of the Valuation Committee as regards the Brothock Mill is right; (2) that their determination as regards the Netherward Works and Alma Works is wrong; (3) that the valuation of the Netherward Works should be reduced to £500; and (4) that the valuation of the Alma Works should be reduced to £923, 5s., the valuation of the 1st item thereof being reduced to £577, 10s., that of the 12th item to £97, 10s., and that of the 13th item to £45."

Valuation Acts—Value—Subject unlet—Harbour—Method of valuation.
—In 1863 it was held by the Court of Session that the Clyde Navigation Trustees were not assessable as proprietors of the waterways of the port and harbour of Glasgow, the incorporeal right of harbour not being vested in them, and that they were assessable only as proprietors of the wharfs, quays, and other structures in the harbour. In 1866 the Valuation Appeal Judges in fixing the yearly value of the undertaking of the Clyde Trustees gave effect to the judgment of the Court of Session by deducting from the dues payable to the trustees a proportion as being applicable to the waterways of the port and harbour. The undertaking continued to be valued on that basis for more than forty years.

In 1908 the Assessor for Lanarkshire proposed to value the portion of the undertaking within the county either (a) on the basis of taking into account the whole or a much larger proportion of the dues paid to the trustees, or (b) on the "contractor's" principle, i.e., by taking a percentage on the structural cost of the quays, &c.

Held (a) that there was no such change of circumstances as to warrant a change in the method of dealing with the dues, and (b) that the contractor's method was inapplicable.

Assessor for Lanarkshire v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

The Clyde Trustees craved that the valuations of the several subjects be restricted to £33,522, £6113, £2092, £736, and £1039 respectively, or £43,502 in cumulo.

The Valuation Committee sustained the appeal and restricted the total valuation to £43,502.

The Assessor obtained a case for appeal, which set forth as follows:—

“The Trustees of the Clyde Navigation are a body of statutory Trustees, incorporated under the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858, as amended by subsequent Acts, and having the power and duty of carrying into effect the provisions of these Acts.” *

* The following sections of the Acts were set forth in the case:—

The Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. cap. cxlix.), enacts:—

Sec. 75. “The limits of the River Clyde shall include the whole channel or waterway of the said river forming the harbour, and as far down the said river as to a straight line drawn from the eastern end of Newark Castle on the south shore of the said river to the mouth of Cardross Burn on the north shore of the said river, and the whole works within the said limits for the improvement of the navigation of the river constructed or authorised to be constructed by or under the charge of the Clyde Trustees or the Trustees appointed by this Act, and the whole lands acquired for the purposes of such works, or occupied by the Trustees in connection with the navigation of the said river.”

Sec. 96, after empowering the Trustees to sell surplus lands, proceeds as follows:—“Provided that nothing herein contained shall authorise the Trustees to sell or dispose of any land which now is or heretofore was within or part of the alveus or channel of the river or of the shores thereof below high-water mark, without the consent, in writing, of the Commissioner or Commissioners for the time being in charge of Her Majesty's Land Revenues in Scotland; and in the event of any such consent being given the said Commissioner or Commissioners shall, from time to time, be a party or parties to the deed or conveyance or disposition for the purpose of granting to the purchaser the estate and interest of Her Majesty in the land sold or disposed of, and the purchase or consideration money arising from any such sale or disposition shall, upon or previously to the execution of any such deed, be from time to time paid into the Royal Bank of Scotland to the account of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.”

Sec. 97. “Subject to the provisions of this Act it shall be lawful to the Trustees to levy on and in respect of all vessels entering or using the river or harbour the rates specified in the schedule (G) to this Act annexed, and all such rates shall be paid by the owner, agent, master, consignee or other person in charge of such vessels.”

"In a series of actions extending from 1857 till 1866 the question as to the liability of the Clyde Trustees to pay poor-rates in respect of the lands and heritages belonging to and occupied by them under their Acts of Parliament was under the consideration of the Court. These actions were as follows":—

Adamson v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, 1860.¹

Clyde Navigation Trustees (valuation case), 1866.⁴

"Under these cases the Clyde Trustees are liable to be assessed in respect of the quays, wharves, buildings, and other heritable subjects belonging to and occupied by them; they are not liable to be assessed as proprietors or occupants of the River Clyde in respect of dues payable for the navigation or use of the said river, and they are not owners or occupiers of the River Clyde, or of any other lands and Trustees to levy on and in respect of all goods shipped or unshipped in the river or harbour the rates specified in the first and second columns of part 1 of the schedule (H) to this Act annexed, and on all animals and carriages shipped or unshipped in the river or harbour the rates specified in part 2 of the said schedule (H), and all such rates shall be paid by the owner of such goods, animals, and carriages."

Sec. 99. "For the more equitable payment of the rates hereinbefore granted leviable below the Stockwell Bridge, formerly called the Old Glasgow Bridge, that part of the river shall be divided into three stages, videlicet:—The first stage, comprehending that part of the river lying above the Old Ferry of Renfrew, being about 660 yards to the east of the present Ferry; the second stage, extending from the said Old Ferry of Renfrew to the mouth of Dalmuir Burn; and the third stage, extending from the mouth of the said Dalmuir Burn to the Castle of Newark; and all vessels and goods, animals, and carriages whatsoever, passing in or upon the river or any part thereof within the limits aforesaid shall pay the said rates in manner and in the proportions following, and at such stations on the river as the trustees shall appoint,—That is to say, in passing upon or going down the river on any part of the first stage as aforesaid, two-third parts of the aforesaid rates; on any part of the second stage as aforesaid, one-sixth part of the aforesaid rates; and on any part of the third stage as aforesaid, one-sixth part of the aforesaid rates, and shall pay the same proportion of the rates aforesaid on passing upon or coming up the river; provided that the Trustees shall be entitled to levy the whole amount of the said rates on all vessels, goods, animals, and carriages passing or being conveyed along, or into the three stages or any parts thereof."

Sec. 46. "And all tolls, rates, and charges levied by the Trustees under the authority of this Act, and all other money in the nature of revenue received by the Trustees, shall be applied in or towards carrying into execution the purposes of the recited Acts and this Act, and the undertakings thereby authorised, to which revenue is properly applicable, and to no other purpose whatsoever."

The Clyde Navigation Act, 1904 (4 Edw. VII. cap. ccxlii.), enacts:—

Sec. 43. "Section 74 of the Act of 1858, section 32 of the Act of 1883, and section 12 of the Act of 1884, are hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof the following provisions shall have effect; the harbour of Glasgow shall for all purposes (including the rating purposes of the Trustees) mean and include heritages, except specific wharfage ground, quays, wharves, sheds, cranes, ferry and house property. Mar. 4, 1908.

"The decision of the Court of Session was appealed to the House of Lords by the Clyde Trustees so far as it determined their liability to be assessed, but the pursuer, Adamson, representing the city of Glasgow Parochial Board, did not appeal against the other findings of the Court, and the interlocutors, so far as appealed, were affirmed. Assessor for Lanarkshire v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.

"In the valuation case Clyde Navigation Trustees, 1866,¹ the Valuation Judges, on an appeal from the local Commissioners, applied the decision of the Court of Session. They adopted what they considered in reference to the whole circumstances of the case an equitable principle of adjustment, viz.—To deduct from the proportion of the dues applicable to the first (or upper) stage² (being that containing the wharves, &c.) one-third thereof, as being fairly assignable to that portion of the subjects which is not assessable. They thus wholly excluded the two-sixths of the dues applicable under the Act of 1858 to the use of the waterway of the two lower stages, extending from Renfrew Old Ferry to Port-Glasgow, and assigned two-thirds of the remaining two-thirds, being the dues for the first (or upper) stage, to the use of the quays and wharves, which were lands and heritages owned and occupied by the Trustees. This decision has been given effect to and acted upon by the various Assessors and Local Authorities since 1866.

"The valuation put forward by the Clyde Trustees is the proportion of the total valuation on that basis, as ascertained for convenience and with the acquiescence of other Assessors by the Assessor for the city of Glasgow, to be applicable on an apportionment according to the length of quayage to the quays and wharves within the county of Lanark and beyond the city of Glasgow. . . .

"The apportionment of the valuation according to length of quayage as followed since 1866 is also approximately in accordance with the revenue derived from the parts of the harbour in separate jurisdictions."

The Clyde Trustees contended that there had "been no alteration in the circumstances since the Court of Session found that the Clyde Trustees were not owners or occupiers of the waterway of the River Clyde within their jurisdiction, and that the dues payable for the use of that waterway by ships and goods passing upon it could not be taken into account in valuing the quays, wharves, &c. It is therefore submitted by the Clyde Trustees that the proper method to value the Trustees' quays and wharves is to take the revenue of the Trust remaining after excluding the proportion of the dues applicable to the two lower stages, and at least one-third of the dues applicable the River Clyde between Albert Bridge (formerly Hutchesontown Bridge) and a line drawn across the River Clyde in line with the western termination of the Shieldhall Wharf, as authorised by and delineated on the plans deposited relative to the Act of 1884, and also the whole docks, quays, wharves, piers, yards, buildings, erections, and other works and conveniences belonging to the Trustees, constructed or which may hereafter be constructed or used in connection therewith, within the said limits for the purposes of their undertaking; and the bye-laws, rules, and regulations of the Trustees are hereby extended, and shall apply to the harbour as in this section defined." to the upper stage, and to make the appropriate deductions from the revenue as so ascertained in accordance with the Lands Valuation Acts as interpreted by the Valuation Judges in a series of decisions."

The Assessor maintained that the decision of the Court of Session in Adamson v. Clyde Navigation Trustees, 1863,¹ in so far as it dealt with the question of the treatment of the dues, was not affirmed by the House of Lords, and was overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in Leith Dock Commissioners v. Miles.² "If the decision stands, the true reading of the judgment of the Court of Session in *Adamson v. The Clyde Trustees*³ is that resort should be had to the contractor's principle, since it is impossible for the Assessor to shew what parts of the dues, rates, &c., are payable in return for the use of and accommodation afforded by the quays; that it appeared also from the interlocutor deciding the valuation case of 1866 that the Judges called for particulars of the expenditure on the quays presumably with the view of applying the contractor's principle of valuation, but probably from insufficiency of information finally had recourse to taking a proportion of the dues as the basis of valuation.

"The Assessor contended that although this might have been an equitable solution of the problem in 1866 it is not necessarily so at the present time, when very large extensions of the quayage have been made, and the water area in docks, which did not exist in 1866, has to be dealt with. He stated that under that method the amount deducted as applicable to the lower 13 miles of river had grown from £33,011 to £134,838, and the amount for the waterway in the upper stage from £22,007 to £89,892, a total of £224,730, the increase of nearly £170,000 being out of all proportion to the expenditure on the waterway in the interval. He also objected to the deduction in respect of the second and third stages of the river of one-third of the dues levied, and of a further proportionate deduction for the waterway in the first stage.

"The Assessor stated that he had made a survey and valuation of the subjects situated in the county, and estimated the cost of the Prince's Dock and accessories, including the solum, at . £1,125,230 on which sums his valuations were based at five per cent. The Assessor considered that it was incumbent on him to shew that the subjects produced a revenue sufficient to pay these rents, and stated that he had prepared from the accounts of the Trustees, for the year ending 30th June 1906, a statement, which, after disallowing certain expenditure which would fall on the Trustees as proprietors of the heritable subjects, brought out a balance of £367,090, and from the account of capital expenditure to the same date a statement shewing that five per cent on the capital expenditure of the Trustees in respect of the heritable properties producing this revenue did not nearly exhaust that balance."

The Assessor further maintained that if the decision in *Adamson v. Clyde Trustees*¹ "is not to be taken as authoritative, and therefore the subjects are to be dealt with as unum quid, the Clyde Navigation Trustees' undertaking is one which extends into more than one parish, Mar. 4, 1908. and it would therefore be competent for them to apply, under section 23 of the Valuation Act, 1854, for a valuation of the undertaking by the Assessor of Railways and Canals; that they had not exercised their power of making this application, and that in these circumstances it is proper for the local Assessor to apply the rules laid down in the Valuation Act for valuing such subjects. He further stated that the statement prepared by him, already referred to, brings out a balance available for the valuation of the whole undertaking, excluding the graving docks, timber yards, and let subjects, which are separately entered in the Valuation-rolls of the several parishes, of £367,090; that he had also inquired into the cost of the several subjects in the parish of Govan (outwith the burgh of Glasgow), and estimated the cost, including the solum, at the sums previously stated, on which amounts the valuations are calculated at five per cent, in accordance with sections 21 and 22 of the Valuation Act, 1854, and that from the printed statement of capital expenditure by the Trustees he had also prepared a statement of the value of the various works over which the valuation falls to be spread, bringing out a value of £3,931,751, five per cent on which is £196,587, leaving a balance of £170,503 from the rental, £367,090, arrived at in his previous statement."

Trustees.

The determination of the Committee was in the following terms:—

"1. That while from their personal knowledge of the subjects they considered that their cost was moderately estimated at the sums stated by the Assessor, there was no authority for adoption of the 'contractor's' principle by the Assessor in valuing these subjects.

"2. That while they were of opinion, looking to the altered circumstances since 1866, that there was no equitable reason why from the total dues paid by ships using the harbour of Glasgow the proportion of the dues, which would have been paid had they not entered into the upper stage of the river, should be wholly excluded in computing the revenue of the undertaking, the Assessor was not, standing the decisions upon which the Clyde Trustees "rely, entitled to adopt the rules laid down in sections 21 and 22 of the Valuation Act, 1854, but was bound to follow the method adopted by the Judges in the *Mavisbank*¹ valuation case, 1866.

"3. That the valuation and allocation prepared by the Assessor for the burgh of Glasgow were in general conformity with the method adopted in that case.

"The Committee accordingly sustained the appeals and restricted the valuations as craved. It was agreed, at the request of both parties, that the cumulo valuation of £43,502 should be divided as follows, and the Committee found accordingly, viz. :—

Princes Dock, quays, sheds, &c.,	£31,336
Quays, &c., Plantation,	7,521
Mavisbank quay, &c.,	2,591
Quays at graving dock,	1,015
Shieldhall Wharves,	1,039

At the hearing before the Judges the undernoted additional authorities were cited.¹

At advising,—

LORD LOW.—The main question in this case appears to me to be whether the judgment in *Adamson v. Clyde Navigation Trustees*² was overruled by the House of Lords in Leith Dock Commissioners v. Miles,³ in so far as it was held in the former case that the Trustees were not assessable as proprietors of the port and harbour of Glasgow as something separate and distinct from the wharfs, quays, and other structures of which physically the harbour consisted.

I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative. The report of the Leith Docks case³ in the House of Lords does suggest that the noble and learned Lords were under the impression that the Second Division had held in Adamson's case² that a harbour was not an assessable subject. That, however, was a misapprehension. What was decided was that upon a sound construction of the Clyde statutes there was not (I quote from the opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis) “any jus incorporale vested in the defenders” (the Clyde Navigation Trustees) “by which they can be said to be, in the common law sense, the proprietors of the right of harbour. . . . I think that the subjects in respect of which the defenders are liable to be assessed as constituting the port or harbour of Glasgow are the subjects embraced in the minute” (that is, the wharfs, quays, and other structures), “and that there is no other subject in respect of which they can be assessed under the name of the port and harbour of Glasgow.”

It seems to me that the Lord Justice-Clerk there plainly recognises that a harbour is an assessable subject, but that his view was that, apart from the quays and other works, the trustees were not owners of any harbour. Therefore, in my opinion, the judgment in *Adamson*² was in no way inconsistent with that of the House of Lords in the Leith Docks case,³ or in the Mersey Docks case,⁴ which was there followed.

The reason why the appellants attempted to shew that the judgment in *Adamson*² had been overruled by the subsequent decisions in the House of Lords was that it was held in *Adamson*² that the rates and dues, which the Clyde Trustees were by these statutes authorised to levy, could not be taken into account in estimating the yearly value of the subjects in respect of which they were assessable, in so far as these rates and dues were paid for the navigation of the river, including that part of it which the statutes described as being within the limits of the harbour of Glasgow. The appellants' argument accordingly was that, *Adamson*¹ having been overruled Mar. 4, 1908. by the Mersey Docks case² and the Leith Docks case,³ and it having been held in the latter cases that a harbour was an assessable subject, the rates and dues paid for the navigation of that part of the Clyde within the statutory limits of the Glasgow harbour should be brought into computation.

Assessor for Lanarkshire
v. Clyde Navigation
Trustees.

It seems to me to be a complete answer to that argument that the judgment in *Adamson*¹ has never been overruled; that it was a judgment pronounced by the Inner-House in an action of declarator brought for the very purpose of determining the rights and obligations of the parties in regard to assessment for poor-rates; and that it has been acted on, so far as I know, without challenge for more than forty years.

Lord Low.

The case of *Adamson*¹ was decided in 1863, and in 1866 the question of valuation came before this Court. The learned Judges who then constituted the Court, in fixing the yearly value of the undertaking, gave effect to the decree of declarator which had been pronounced, and they did so by deducting from the proportion of the dues applicable to the first of the three stages into which the Clyde is divided by the statutes (that being the stage with which alone we are concerned in this appeal) one-third thereof as being fairly assignable to that portion of the subjects which the Second Division had held not to be assessable. The rule so laid down has been followed until the present time as the basis upon which the subjects fall to be valued, but I do not say that the apportionment of the dues made in 1866 must be regarded as res judicata, and cannot be revised. If it could be shewn that, owing to a material change of circumstances, the apportionment was no longer fair and reasonable, I think that it would be quite competent for this Court to reconsider it. But no such question was submitted for our determination, although the appellants' counsel did refer to the great change which had taken place during the last forty years, both as regards the extent of the works and the amount of the dues.

I have already said that the main contention of the appellant was that the whole dues should be taken into account in estimating the yearly value, and I have expressed the opinion which I have formed upon that point. The appellant, however, contended alternatively that instead of the principle of valuation which has hitherto been followed, what has come to be known as the contractor's principle should be adopted—that is to say, that the yearly value should be arrived at by taking a percentage upon the structural cost of the quays and other works. That appears to me to be a method of valuation which is not appropriate to the kind of subject in question. Indeed the only reason which can be suggested, so far as I can see, for adopting the contractor's principle is that it would get rid of the limitation placed by the judgment in *Adamson*¹ upon the revenue which may be taken into account, and would make it possible to value the subjects at a much higher amount than under the method which has all along been followed, and which I take to be the approved method of valuing such subjects. I have therefore no hesitation in rejecting the argument that the contractor's method of valuation should be adopted.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that we must hold that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

LORD DUNDAS.—In the year 1866 our predecessors in this Court (Lord Kinloch and Lord Ormidale) laid down a rule for the valuation of the Undertaking of the Clyde Navigation Trustees,¹ which has ever since been acted upon by the various Assessors and Local Authorities. It is obvious that strong grounds would be required to warrant us in now upsetting this uniform practice of about forty years, following upon the decision to which I have referred. But the appellant's counsel undertook to establish the existence of such grounds. They maintained that the Valuation Court in 1866 merely followed a judgment of the Second Division, which the House of Lords subsequently declared to be erroneous. It is true that the decision of the Valuation Judges was really executory of the interlocutor of the Second Division in the declarator Adamson v. Clyde Navigation Trustees.² But I am satisfied that, as your Lordship has pointed out, the appellant's argument proceeds upon a misapprehension; and that nothing was said or done in the Leith case³ to warrant the assertion that the House of Lords expressed or entertained any opinion adverse to what was really decided by the Second Division in 1863, as explained in the clear opinion of Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis. It may be worth while to point out that the same Lord Ordinary (Jerviswoode) decided in the Outer-House the case of *Adamson*² and the Leith case,³ and that, looking to the respective dates of decision, it would appear that the Valuation Judges on 25th July 1866³ must have had in contemplation the judgment of the First Division in the Leith case (17th June 1864⁴), if not also that of the House of Lords in the same case (12th March 1866⁵). I have had an opportunity of reading your Lordship's opinion, and entirely concur with all that you have said on the points argued.

THE JUDGES were of opinion that the determination of the Committee was right.

Entail—Powers of heir in possession—Lease—Outgoing—Obligation in lease to take over sheep stock—Transmission of obligation against succeeding heir of entail—Custom.—In an action brought by the tenant of a sheep farm on an entailed estate in Argyllshire, on the death of his landlord, against the next heir of entail, for declarator that the landlord's obligation in the lease to purchase the tenant's stock of sheep at its termination was binding on the defender, the pursuer averred that from time immemorial such obligations had been a universal condition of sheep farm leases in the north and west of Scotland, founded on the considerations (1) that sheep stock in Gillespie v. Riddell.

The Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) held that the pursuer's averments were relevant and allowed a proof.

The defender having reclaimed the Court assoilized the defender, holding that although the lease (being followed by possession and conferring a real right under the Act 1449) was an alienation struck at by the fetters, it was valid as a necessary act of administration, binding on the estate, but that the obligation to purchase the sheep was a personal obligation, which did not burden the estate, and was not binding on the next heir of entail.

Process—Summons—Defender—Succession—Claim against general estate of testator—Competency of suing individual legatee.—Held that an individual legatee cannot be called upon to discuss the validity of a claim against the testator's estate, which may or may not affect his legacy, in an action to which the general representatives of the testator have not been made parties.

AT Whitsunday 1903 Charles Gordon Gillespie, Strontian, Argyll-shire, entered upon possession of the farm of Ardery, on the estate of Sunart, Argyllshire, under a lease dated 26th May and 6th June 1903, between himself and Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell, Baronet, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Sunart. The lease, which was for fifteen years from Whitsunday 1903, with an option in favour of either party to terminate it at the end of the fifth or tenth year, contained the following clause:—"He" (i.e., the tenant) "shall deliver at the end of the lease to the landlord or incoming tenant, as far as possible, not more than the same number of sheep, and the same classes, as he receives on his entry, and the proprietor agrees that the second party (i.e., the tenant) or his representatives shall receive the same prices as he paid on his entry, providing always that the landlord or incoming tenant shall not be bound to take over more ewes, ewe hogs, or tups than the tenant took over at his entry; and, further, the proprietor or incoming tenant will not be bound to take over more than fifty of the following three classes, namely:—One, two, or three years old wedders, over and above the number of stock the tenant took over at his entry."

Sir Rodney Riddell died on 2d January 1907, and was succeeded in the entailed estate of Sunart by the next heiress of entail, his sister, Louisa Margaretta Riddell, in virtue of the destination contained in the deed of entail affecting the estate of Sunart.* Shortly after succeeding to the estate Miss Riddell intimated that she repudiated the obligation undertaken by her predecessor to take over the sheep stock at the termination of the lease, and also gave notice that she would exercise the option of terminating the lease at the end of the fifth year, viz., Whitsunday 1908.

On 7th September 1907 Charles Gordon Gillespie brought an action against Miss Louisa Margaretta Riddell, heritable proprietrix of the estate of Sunart, "as such proprietrix and also as an individual," in which he concluded (first) for declarator that by the terms of the lease with the pursuer, the late Sir Rodney Riddell "undertook a binding obligation" that on the termination of the lease the sheep stock would be taken over at the prices mentioned; (second) for declarator "that the said obligation is binding upon the defender as heiress of entail in possession of the said lands and estate in succession to the said Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell," or, alternatively, in the event of it not being so found, that the pursuer should be granted certain specified facilities for removing and disposing of his stock; (third) for declarator "that the whole heritable and moveable estate of the deceased Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell is liable for the said obligation"; (fourth) for declarator that the defender, who was a special legatee to certain moveables, as a beneficiary under Sir Rodney Riddell's trust-disposition, was liable for the said obligation to the extent of her beneficial interest in that estate, or was liable to that extent subsidiarie after the trustees and executors had been first discussed.

The pursuer averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 9) "An obligation binding the tenant to deliver the sheep stock on his farm at the termination of his lease to the landlord or incoming tenant, and a corresponding obligation on the landlord to pay for the stock at a fixed or valued rate, is, and has from time immemorial been, a universal condition of sheep farm leases in the north and west of Scotland, and is founded on the considerations (1) that sheep stock in that part of the country requires to be acclimatised to a particular farm or district, and (2) that stock habituated to a certain holding do not wander beyond the boundaries, and thus enable march fences to be dispensed with. For these reasons the condition is one entirely in the interest of estates and of the successive proprietors thereof, who would find their estate holdings practically unlettable if the stock were dispenished at the termination of each lease. These general considerations apply particularly to the estate of Sunart, the leases on which, including those granted by the entailer, have always contained the said condition, and they apply to the farm of Ardery, and to the obligation with regard to stock in the pursuer's lease. Without the said condition the said farm could not have been let in terms of the deed of entail for 'the highest rent that can be got from a good and responsible tenant.' The said obligation was accordingly a condition inter naturalia of the lease, and is binding upon the defender, who has adopted the lease and insisted upon payment of the rent due thereunder."

The pursuer also averred that on his entry in the lease he had taken over the sheep stock at the price of £1319, 1s. 11d., and that the only period of the year at which it was possible to remove and realise sheep stock, except at a ruinous loss, was between the months of August and October. He further set forth the extent to which the defender was a beneficiary under the will of the late Sir Rodney Riddell, and averred that as Sir Rodney's trustees and executors were resident in England and refused to accept the jurisdiction of the Scotch Court, he had been unable to make them parties to the action.

The pursuer pleaded in support of the first two conclusions of the summons;—(1) The late Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell, having undertaken a valid obligation in his lease with the pursuer that the pursuer would be paid for his sheep stock at the termination of his lease, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (2) The obligation in question being inter naturalia of the lease under which the defender is now landlord, et separatim, the defender having adopted the lease, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first alternative of the second conclusion of the summons. He also stated pleas in support of the other conclusions of the summons. Feb. 20, 1908.

Gillespie v.
Riddell.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The trustees and executors of Sir Rodney Riddell not being parties to the action, the defender is entitled to have the third and fourth conclusions thereof dismissed as incompetent against her. (2) The averments of the pursuer are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action, which should be dismissed. (4) There being no obligation to take over the sheep stock at the termination of the lease founded on which is prestatable against the defender, either as heiress of entail in possession or separatim as an individual, she is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. (5) In respect that the obligation to take over the sheep stock could not be made to affect the entailed estate, it cannot affect the defender as heiress of entail in succession to the grantor of said obligation.

On 4th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defender, and dismisses the third and fourth conclusions of the action, and decerns: Quoad ultra repels the second plea in law for the defender, and allows to the parties a proof of their respective averments. . . ."

* "OPINION.—The pursuer in this case is the tenant in possession of the farm of Ardery under a lease entered into between him and Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell. The duration of the lease was fifteen years from Whitsunday 1903, with an option to either party to terminate the lease at the end of the fifth or tenth years thereafter on twelve months' notice. The farm of Ardery is part of the entailed estate of Sunart, in the county of Argyll, to which the defender succeeded on 2d January 1907 as heiress of entail on the death of her brother, Sir Rodney. Shortly after her succession her agents gave notice terminating the lease at Whitsunday 1908; and the pursuer does not deny that the lease will come to an end as at that date.

"When the pursuer entered upon the farm he was required to take over the sheep stock from the outgoing tenant as valued by arbiters; and the total price he paid for it amounted to £1319, 1s. 11d. The lease contains a clause with regard to the delivery of stock at its termination, which is quoted in cond. 2. It takes the tenant bound to deliver to the landlord or incoming tenant, as far as possible, not more than the same number of sheep of the same classes as he received at his entry, and the proprietor agreed that the pursuer should receive the same prices as he paid on his entry for the stock so delivered. The defender's agents, soon after she succeeded to the entailed estate, intimated to the pursuer that she repudiated any obligation to take over the sheep stock; and the leading conclusion of the action deals with this matter. The pursuer seeks declarator that the obligation undertaken by Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell is binding on the defender as heiress of entail in possession of the said lands in succession to him. This declarator proceeds on the assumption of the defender surviving the term of Whitsunday 1908, when the obligation, if there be one, becomes prestatable. But it is obviously convenient that the question of law should be decided before the actual arrival of the term, so that parties may be able to make arrangements for the disposal of the sheep stock; and although the defender pleads that some of the other conclusions are premature, there is no corresponding plea with regard to the first two conclusions. The argument for the defender was accordingly substantially directed on this point to the

Argued for the defender and reclaimer;—The Lord Ordinary was wrong. This was an effort to saddle a succeeding heir of entail with a personal obligation. That was incompetent, for an heir of entail did not take as representing his immediate predecessor, he took as heir of the entailer. The sole obligations undertaken by the preceding heir for which he was responsible were such as had been made to affect the estate. An obligation could only be made to affect the estate if it fell within the exceptions to the prohibitions against burdening the estate with debt, and such an obligation as this was not within these exceptions. The analogy from meliorations bore out this view.¹ There was no force in the argument that the succeeding heir of entail had adopted the lease with all its stipulations. She had only adopted it so far as binding on her.² The fact that the Entail second, fourth, and fifth pleas in law. These pleas raise the general question whether an obligation by an heir of entail in possession of a sheep farm to take over the sheep stock at the termination of a lease to which he is a party is binding on the succeeding heirs of entail.

“Before considering the law, it is necessary to advert to the averments which the pursuer makes, and of which he asks a proof. He says that an obligation binding the tenant to deliver the sheep stock at the termination of the lease and a corresponding obligation on the landlord to pay for the stock at a fixed or valued rate, is ‘and has from time immemorial been a universal condition of sheep farm leases in the north and west of Scotland, and is founded on the considerations (1) that sheep stock in that part of the country requires to be acclimatised to a particular farm or district, and (2) that sheep stock habituated to a certain holding does not wander beyond the boundaries, and this enables march fences to be dispensed with. For these reasons the condition is one entirely in the interest of the estate and of the succeeding proprietors, who would find their holdings practically unlettable if the stock were dispenished at the termination of each lease. Without this condition the farm could never have been let in terms of the deed of entail for ‘the highest rent that could be got from a good and responsible tenant.’ The term of entry and the ish of the lease were also fixed in accordance with the condition that the stock was to remain on the ground, as it is impossible to remove sheep from such a farm at the term of Whitsunday, when lambs are too young to travel, or to realise sheep stock at that term except at a ruinous loss. He further avers that the leases on the estate of Sunart, including those granted by the entailer, have always contained a similar condition. These averments are denied by the defender, who further maintains that they are irrelevant. She admits that the obligation would have been prestable against Sir Rodney Riddell if he had survived the termination of the lease, and might also possibly be binding on his executors, but maintains that they cannot affect an heiress of entail, who Amendment Act of 1878¹ made succeeding heirs of entail liable for obligations for improvement expenditure only emphasised the view that thitherto they had not been liable for any such obligations, and there was no statutory provision imposing on them liability for such an obligation as this. The pursuer's only remedy here, if he had one, was against the representatives of the granter of the lease.² If he desired to have the succeeding heir bound he should have seen that the obligation was made a burden on the estate. Lord Kyllachy took the true view of the matter in Panton v. Mackintosh.³ If the argument for the defender here was sound it could not be upset by evidence that such a stipulation was often inserted. To reach such a result the evidence must amount to proof that the custom was clear and universal,⁴ and there were no averments here to support so wide a proof.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—The pursuer did not takes the estate by singular title, and is not liable for the personal contracts of predecessors; and she says that the obligation to take over the sheep stock is merely a personal contract, and not the less so because it occurs in a lease of heritable subjects.

"It is singular that this question has not hitherto been made the subject of direct decision; and I think it may be assumed in the pursuer's favour that heirs of entail in possession have not hitherto disputed the binding character of similar obligations, though undertaken in leases granted by their predecessors. In some cases, perhaps, they might have no interest to do so, but in others, especially during the last thirty or forty years, when such obligations are supposed to have become specially onerous owing to an alleged practice of valuers to overvalue sheep stock in a question with a landlord; it cannot but have been to the interest of heirs of entail in possession to repudiate such obligations if they thought that they could do so successfully; and if the pursuer's averments as to the custom of inserting similar clauses in leases of sheep farms is to be accepted, such cases must have been very numerous.

"I was referred to various authorities, from which I think it appears to be indisputable that a lease granted by an heir of entail as an act of ordinary administration is binding on a succeeding heir if it has been made real by possession before the succession opened. Now, I think if the pursuer's averments are established, the lease in question was an act of ordinary administration in connection with such a subject as a sheep farm. On the same assumption the obligation which is objected to must, in the general case, be one which it is to the interest of an heir of entail in possession that he should be able to grant, whether he happens to survive the termination of the lease in which it occurs or not. It may be presumed that the rent payable by the tenant depends, at least in part, on the landlord undertaking this obligation, and would have been less if there had been no such obligation—if indeed the subjects would have been lettable at all, as a sheep farm, for a period of five years. It may be that in certain circumstances a burden may be imposed on a succeeding heir of entail for which he receives no corresponding advantage; but that is not conclusive against the burden being one which runs with the lands. In the case of Queensberry, 18th February 1814, F. C., it was held lawful for an heir of entail to stipulate found on the power of an heir in possession to burden the estate, nor on any liability of the succeeding heir as representing his predecessor. He founded solely on the relationship between landlord and tenant, and the right of a tenant in possession under a lease to insist that obligations in connection with ordinary acts of administration by the landlord should be binding on his successors in the estate. Such an obligation as this would unquestionably transmit against singular successors of the landlord,¹ and the question was whether an heir of entail could escape that obligation. An heir of entail was bound by acts done in the due administration of the estate,² and the undertaking of this obligation was such an act. In that part of the country such an obligation was not only customary in the case of leases of sheep farms, but it was quite impossible to let sheep farms without such an obligation. Therefore the undertaking of this obligation was an act done in the course of the due administration of the estate; it for forehand rents in corn farms, so as to deprive the succeeding heir of the right which would have been otherwise competent to him in preference to executors if the legal and conventional terms had been the same; and the subsequent case of Breadalbane v. Jamieson, 4 R. 667, shews that an heir of entail may, by an act which is not in contravention of the entail, impose a burden on the succeeding heir, from which the latter receives no corresponding benefit. The particular act that had this effect was the destruction of the existing mansion-house, which to the extent of its value must have diminished the value of the entailed estate, and the rebuilding of which had only been commenced when the heir of entail died.

"Other burdens which might be undertaken in a lease by an heir of entail, and yet be made to affect the succeeding heir to his disadvantage, may easily be figured. In the lease in question for instance, there is an obligation by the lessor to put the fences and gates in a proper state of repair, and to re-roof the old farm buildings with corrugated iron. This obligation might not have been implemented before the death of the granter, although the tenant had made his right real by entering to the farm; but I apprehend that as an ordinary act of administration the burden would then have fallen to be discharged by the succeeding heir—subject possibly to any right of relief he might have against the executors of his predecessor, if the obligation ought, in ordinary course, to have been implemented before the succession opened.

"I was referred by the defender to a series of cases with regard to ameliorations which are summarised by Lord Deas in his opinion in the case of Breadalbane v. Jamieson, at p. 675. In all these it was held that an obligation by a lessor of entailed lands to pay his tenant for buildings erected by him, or ameliorations made by him during the currency of the lease, was not binding on a succeeding heir of entail who was in possession when the lease expired. These decisions rest upon the principle that an heir of entail is not bound by the personal contracts of his predecessor; and that such an obligation, although occurring in a lease, is to be treated as 'extrinsic of its character as a real right, and not even essential to its object as a contract.' See Lord Deas' opinion in M'Gillivray's Executors, 19 D. 1106. I was also referred to the two recent cases of The Earl of Galloway v. The Duke of Bedford, 4 F. 851, and 6 F. 971, in which the law on this subject was fully discussed in the First Division. In the earlier of these two cases was an obligation inter naturalia of the lease, and was indeed inserted there ex necessitate. The cases cited for the reclaimer were not in point, for the analogy from meliorations was inapplicable here, meliorations being not ordinary acts of administration, but extraordinary acts, and not acts of necessity, as this was, but purely voluntary. These cases, too, so far as dealing with purely personal obligations, were not in point, for this obligation was not of that character, but was an obligation united to a right of property. The opinions expressed in Queensberry v. Montgomery,¹ Waterson v. Stewart,² and Learmonth v. Sinclair's Trustees,³ if not actually deciding the point, were in favour of the pursuer's contention. On a fair construction of the relaxing statutes all such stipulations as were necessary for obtaining leases at an adequate rent would transmit against a succeeding heir of entail. The pursuer was entitled to a proof of the custom he alleged, for if it was made out the obligation founded on it would Gillespie v.

Riddell.

a lease of salmon and trout fishings by an heir of entail was reduced by his successor on the ground that a grant of trout fishing creates merely a personal obligation upon the granter, and does not therefore affect the lands. But, in that case, the principle was clearly recognised that a lease which is within the ordinary powers of administration of an heir of entail in possession, when made real by the tenant having entered on the subjects, is binding on succeeding heirs of entail. The decision, therefore, does not affect the present case, unless it be affirmed that an obligation to take over sheep stock at the end of the lease of a sheep farm is necessarily outwith the range of proper administration. Obligations of a similar kind are common in agricultural leases, e.g., obligations to take over dung or straw left by the tenant at the expiry of the lease at a valuation. It may be that a succeeding heir of entail has not the same interest to challenge the validity of such an obligation as he has in the present case; but in principle the two seem to be indistinguishable, and both must be treated either as personal contracts, or, as I think, as part of the real right acquired by the tenant in possession under a written lease, and as such binding upon singular successors, including heirs of entail. Accordingly I have come to the conclusion that I must repel the second plea in law for the defender, and allow the parties a proof of their averments on this head.

"If the view I have expressed be sound it is probably of small consequence how the third and fourth conclusions are dealt with, but in any event they must be disposed of. The third conclusion seeks a declarator that the whole heritable and moveable estate of the late Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell is liable for the obligation in question; and the fourth seeks a declarator that the defender, as special legatee of certain moveables, is liable for the obligation to the extent of the value of the moveables she has received; or alternatively, that she is liable subsidiarie and subject to the condition that the trustees and executors of the deceased shall have been first discussed. In my opinion the third conclusion cannot be competently dealt with in the absence of the executors and general representatives of the deceased. No judgment pronounced in this action would be res judicata against them, and if the obligation upon which the pursuer founds be one which cannot be enforced against the heir of entail, it follows that the deceased's trustees are the proper parties to convene in a declarator of this kind. The same observation applies to the fourth conclusion, which, as far as I know, is quite unprecedented. If the general representatives are ultimately found liable in the obligation, it follows that the defender will have to make it good to the extent of any moveable estate which she has taken

Feb. 20, 1908. transmit against the heir of entail.¹ The analogy from the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883,² was in favour of the pursuer, for in that Act no distinction was made between heirs of entail and other land-owners with regard to the granting of leases. The defender, too, had adopted the lease with all its stipulations, for she had put in force the stipulation in her favour of breaking the lease, and therefore could not escape the other stipulations, e.g., as to taking over the sheep stock. Further, the Lord Ordinary was wrong in dismissing the third and fourth conclusions. No doubt as a general rule disponees were discussed before special legatees,³ but that was for convenience only, and was not universally binding. General and special disponees had been sued together,⁴ and a declaratory decree had been granted against a special legatee.⁵ That was all the pursuer asked for here, and in view of the hardship of the case, and the necessity for the pursuer making arrangements as to his sheep stock before Whitsunday, he was entitled to such a declaratory decree defining his rights.

At advising on February 20, 1908,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an action at the instance of the tenant of a sheep farm on the entailed estate of Sunart in Argyllshire, for the enforcement of an obligation undertaken by the lessor, the late Sir Rodney Riddell, the heir of entail in possession at the date of the lease. The lease was for fifteen years from Whitsunday 1903, with an option to either party to terminate at the end of the fifth year. The defender, Miss Louisa Riddell, who is now heir in possession, has given notice to terminate at Whitsunday next, and the pursuer maintains that by force of the obligation in question she is bound as heir of entail in possession to take over his sheep stock at the same price as he paid on his entry for the sheep stock then on the farm. The primary conclusions of the summons are thus directed against the present heir of entail. But there are two subsidiary conclusions for declarator—first, that the whole heritable and moveable estate of the late Sir Rodney is liable for the obligation; and secondly, that Miss Riddell is liable as a special legatee under his will to the extent of the value of her special legacy. These last conclusions, the third and fourth, the Lord Ordinary has dismissed as incompetent, and I believe that all your Lordships are satisfied of the soundness of that judgment. If a debt is to be made good against the estate of Sir Rodney Riddell the proper contradictors are his teeby succession. But I think it would be out of the question that she should have to litigate a matter in which she is not primarily interested, and may not be interested at all if there are sufficient funds to meet the deceased's whole obligations, as well as the legacies which he bequeathed. The pursuer's proper course is to sue the trustees and executors in their own forum, and if he constitutes his claim against them and fails to recover his debt from want of funds, he may perhaps be entitled to have recourse to the defender to the extent to which she has obtained benefit from the estate, but it will be time enough to decide this when the question is raised. I shall accordingly dismiss these conclusions."

tamentary trustees and executors, and an individual legatee cannot be called upon to discuss the validity of a claim against the general estate, which may or may not affect her particular legacy, in an action to which the general representatives of the testator have not been made parties. The Lord Ordinary's observation appears to be perfectly just when he says that the pursuer's proper course, if he has a claim against the estate, is to sue the trustees and executors in their own forum.

We can therefore express no opinion in this case as to the liability of Sir Rodney's personal representatives. They are not called as defenders, and no judgment we could pronounce in this action would be res judicata against them. The only question with which we are concerned is the liability of the heir of entail.

The Lord Ordinary says it is singular that this question has not hitherto been made the subject of direct decision, and observes that it may be assumed in the pursuer's favour that heirs of entail in possession have not hitherto disputed the binding character of similar obligations. This is not, perhaps, a very safe method of reasoning, because it is as easy to assume that claims against heirs of entail have never been pressed as that they have always been conceded. But the question arose directly for decision in Panton v. Mackintosh,¹ and was decided by Lord Kyllachy in favour of the heir of entail. This is an authority which we regard with the highest respect, but since it is not binding on this Court it will be proper to consider in the first place how the law stands apart from Lord Kyllachy's decision.

If the question is to be considered a novel one, it is, however, to be solved by principles that are well settled. The general rule is established by a great mass of authority, that the personal contracts and obligations of heirs of entail are not binding on their successors in the entailed estate; and this rests on the obvious principle that a succeeding heir who takes his interest in the estate from the entailer alone does not represent a preceding heir from whom he takes nothing whatever. It is true that, subject to certain limitations, leases granted by an heir in possession are binding on his successor. But this does not depend on contract or obligation. It is because the lessor in the lawful administration of his own property has given the lessee a real right which will be effectual against all subsequent owners. But to make it valid it must be made real, or in other words, the tenant must have entered on possession, according to the general rule of law which is thus stated by Lord Westbury in Campbell v. M'Lean,² "to make it valid as against the singular successor, the grant must be brought within the operation of the statute of 1449, that is, it must be shewn to be a real right. A lease by the law of Scotland is a personal contract; and the entry of the intended tenant upon the property intended to be demised is equivalent to seisin, and the right thenceforth becomes a real right." Accordingly, it was held in *Kerr v. Redhead*³ that while a lease followed by possession is effectual, a contract to grant a lease is not binding upon the next heir. "If he had lived," says Lord Thurlow, speaking of the contracting heir, "he must have fulfilled his agreement, but as he did not live,

³ 3 Pat. App. 309.

Feb. 20, 1908. it cannot be transferred against a singular successor, which is precisely the character of an heir of entail." So also in his judgment as to the Gillespie v. Riddell. Queensberry Leases,¹ Lord Eldon, after shewing that a lease containing covenant to renew from time to time might be perfectly good for the term current at the grantor's death, that being otherwise a competent term, goes on to say,—“With respect to the covenant for another lease, it is a mere personal contract, upon which it appears to me there could be no possession”; and refers to Leslie v. Orme,² where he says, upon the main question, a lease for four nineteen years was sustained, and yet with regard to a reversionary lease, where no possession had been had, the House held it to be bad. The principle is, and it is trite law, that the heir of entail in possession is fiar of the estate, and as free to deal with it as any other fiar except in so far as he is restrained by the conditions of the entail. It follows that the leases he may have granted, if they have been made real by possession, will be good against his successors in so far, but only in so far, as they do not contravene the cardinal prohibitions. It was at one time a difficulty in the application of this doctrine that, just because it creates a real right in the land, every lease is an alienation, and therefore a contravention of the prohibition to alienate or dispoise. But that problem was finally solved by the judgment of the House of Lords in the “Queensberry leases”; and it is now settled that while long leases are void as contraventions of the entail, short leases, which may now be taken as those which do not exceed the period allowed by the Rosebery Act or by the deed of entail, may be sustained. But this is a relaxation admitted only because it was held to be indispensable for the reasonable enjoyment of the estate, which the entailer intended for all his heirs in succession; and Lord Redesdale observes,—“It seems to me that a power thus yielded to necessity, and only to necessity, ought to be bounded by the necessity which compels it to be yielded—that is, by that which, generally speaking, is compatible with the future as well as with the present enjoyment of the estate.” No lease can be sustained, therefore, which exceeds the necessary term, or which infringes otherwise the rights of an heir who may succeed during its currency.

I have dwelt on this point because, as Lord President Inglis has said, the proposition that the heir in possession is fiar of the estate, but subject to the prohibitions and conditions of the entail, is the foundation of all the law applicable to questions of this kind. It follows that each heir in his turn takes the estate subject to the real rights and burdens which have been validly laid upon it by his predecessor, and entirely free from all such as are invalidated by the fettering clauses, and also from all liabilities which stand upon personal obligation and have not been made to affect the estate itself. The point to be determined, therefore, is to which of these classes the obligation in question belongs. There is apparent force in the contention favoured by the Lord Ordinary that if leases are allowed, all stipulations which are reasonable and customary as between landlord and tenant must be admitted as conditions without which a good tenant could hardly be obtained. But the conditions of the lease must be controlled by the limitations of the lessor's power to dispose of the estate ; and I am unable Feb. 20, 1908. to assent to the Lord Ordinary's conclusion, because it disregards this over-ruling principle, and is thus in my opinion irreconcilable with a long series ^{Gillespie v. Riddell.} of decisions which have been accepted by the House of Lords as fixing ^{Lord Kinnear.}

the law.

The cases, or most of them, are, as the Lord Ordinary observes, collected in the opinion of Lord Deas in Breadalbane v. Jamieson.¹ What he regards as the leading case is Dillon v. Campbell.² It was stipulated in a lease granted by an heir of entail in possession that the tenant should be entitled at the end of the lease to the value of buildings to be erected by him. The granter of the lease died during its currency, and at its expiration the tenant brought an action for the value of the buildings against the succeeding heir, and pleaded that the estate had benefited by the expenditure. The report bears that the Lords were at first moved by the equitable nature of the pursuer's demand ; but the answer which ultimately prevailed was that no debt could be made to affect the heir of entail which could not also be made to affect the estate, and consequently that to bind the next heir for improvement debts would infer a contravention of the prohibition against the contraction of debt. The ground of judgment is very clearly brought out in the interlocutor of Lord Braxfield, Ordinary, to which the Court in the end adhered, and by which the defender was assolizied "in respect he did not represent the granter of the lease otherwise than as heir of entail, which entail contained the usual prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses de non alienando vel contrahendo debita." The same principle received effect in Webster v. Farquhar,³ and Taylor v. Bethune of Balfour.⁴ The question came before the House of Lords in Tod v. Moncrieff and Skene.⁵ In that case an heir of entail in possession had granted a lease by which she bound herself or "the proprietor of the lands at the end of the lease" to pay to the tenant a sum of £625, which the latter had agreed to expend in erecting a new steading on the farm. The tenant brought an action for payment of this sum against the executor of the granter of the lease, who by that time had died, and the executor in his turn brought an action of relief against the new heir of entail, who was then in possession.

All the parties interested were thus before the Court ; and the judgment was that the executor was bound, and that no liability attached to the heir of entail. The argument for the executor was the obvious one that the obligation was imposed in terms on the proprietor of the lands for the time being, who, moreover, would alone derive benefit from the expenditure. The answer which prevailed was that the obligation being personal must be enforceable against the granter and her personal representatives, and could not affect the heir of entail, because the entail contained a prohibition against contracting debt or burdening the lands with sums of money. The decision of this Court was affirmed in the House of Lords with a variation which does not affect the question in hand, and Lord Gifford says in moving the affirmance,—“It is hardly necessary for me to state that in cases of this

Feb. 20, 1908. nature it is certainly not competent for the heir of entail in possession to erect farmhouses and other buildings upon the farm and to throw any of the expense to be incurred upon the succeeding heir of entail." He points out that under the Montgomery Act the estate may be burdened with a certain proportion of the expense necessarily incurred, and observes that but for the aid of that statute the incapacity of an heir of entail to build farmhouses without taking the whole expense upon himself might be very prejudicial to all the succeeding heirs. But in that case the heir in possession had not resorted to the statute, and Lord Gifford appears to have had no doubt that except in the mode prescribed by the statute she could throw no part of the burden, and even with the aid of the statute could not throw the whole burden, on the succeeding heir. "On the general point," he says, "the decisions appear to be conclusive." A similar decision was pronounced, and the determining principle was again affirmed, in Fraser v. Fraser.¹ But I may observe, in passing, that this case, while it is entirely in accordance with previous decisions, brings out very clearly a distinction which, however obvious, was, I think, overlooked in the discussion of the authorities—the distinction between obligations created by an entailer and those created by an heir of entail. General Fraser, the maker of an entail, granted, or, which is the same thing, authorised his trustees to grant, leases containing obligations on the landlord to pay the tenant for meliorations. His brother Archibald Fraser succeeded as first heir of entail, while the leases were still current. There could be no question that as a gratuitous taker he was liable for the entailer's debts and obligations, and among the rest for the stipulated payment for meliorations. But instead of performing his obligation according to its terms at the end of the lease, he made an agreement with the tenants by which he granted new leases for nineteen years on their renouncing the existing leases and postponing their claims for meliorations till the expiration of the new period, when he bound himself and his heirs to pay these and also certain other meliorations to be undertaken by the tenants. In an action at the instance of a tenant against the next succeeding heir it was held that Archibald Fraser had no power to transfer to the next heir obligations created by the entailer which had become exigible during his own possession, nor to burden either that heir or the estate with the new obligations undertaken in the leases granted by himself.

The obligation in question in *Mackenzie v. Mackenzie*² was of a somewhat different character, but it fell within the same rule. An heir in possession bound himself in a lease of a farm to trench, drain, and lime a part of it. This was held to be a personal obligation which did not transmit against subsequent heirs of entail. It was not considered as a contravention, because it neither was nor could have been made a real burden on the land, and it made no difference that it was inserted in a lease, because the real right acquired under a lease is a right to possession of the land, and stipulations engrafted on the lease by which the landlord undertakes to pay money or perform an obligation are purely personal. The decision therefore illustrates another aspect of the general doctrine laid down in Dillon v. Campbell,³ that an heir of entail is not bound by the obligations of a preceding heir, Feb. 20, 1908. except in so far as they may have been made validly to affect the entailed estate without involving a contravention.

Gillespie v.
Riddell.

Three cases were cited by the pursuer's counsel for the purpose of shewing that what he described as ordinary acts of management customary in a district are binding on subsequent heirs of entail, even to their prejudice. This is exactly the argument which was urged unsuccessfully in the House of Lords against the heir of entail in Fraser v. Fraser,¹ except that in that case the transaction was said to be beneficial. But there is nothing in the cases cited inconsistent with the general doctrine as I have stated it. In the case of *Lord Queensberry v. Montgomery*² it was held competent for an heir of entail to stipulate for forehand rents in corn farms, so as to secure for his own executor a term's rent, which, if the legal and conventional terms had been the same, would have gone to the next heir. But the point of the case is that the system of management under which corn farms were fore-rented was not introduced by the deceased heir, but had been established before his succession by the entailer. The Lord Ordinary observes that the succeeding heir was deprived of a benefit which would otherwise have belonged to him. But the argument for the successful executors was that the deceased heir would have lost half a year's rent if he had altered the entailer's system, and it is evident that if when a deed of entail comes into operation the farms are let for forehand rents, the only possible way of equalising the interests of all the succeeding heirs is to continue the system unaltered, because the heir during whose possession the rule might be changed could never recover a half year's rent which had been paid to the entailer's executors. The argument in the case of *Lord Queensberry*² therefore was that the rule as to forehand rent is regulated by the will of the entailer, and an heir of entail is not bound to alter the rule to his own prejudice and against the entailer's practice. It was conceded that "an heir of entail is not entitled to alter the terms of payment of rent and to substitute others so as to give a privilege to his executors over the heir"; and the law is distinctly laid down to that effect by Lord President Inglis in Lord Herries v. Maxwell.³ The case related to the apportionment of rents under the Act of 1870, and it was necessary to determine whether a rent payable at a certain term "for the half year preceding," during which no crop had been sown or reaped, belonged to the heir or to the executors. The Lord President, after laying down the rule that rents which were due and exigible must go to the executor, whether forehand or not, goes on to say,—“This rule would not have been applicable to an entailed estate if forehand rents were a novelty on that estate—if, for example, the last heir who died had introduced forehand rents, having found a different system in existence at his succession. That would have been taking undue advantage of the next heir of entail, but that is not the case here, for it is stated that forehand rents were the law of the estate. It was both the custom of the district, and the rule that had been adopted by the entailer and continued in all subsequent leases.” The principle seems to me to be very clear, that while an absolute

Feb. 20, 1908. owner may choose between his heir and his executor, an heir of entail cannot in any way prejudice the succeeding heir's right.

Gillespie v. Riddell.

*Sinclair v. Learmonth*¹ is, in my opinion inapposite. It was held that an heir of entail was liable, by virtue of a custom having the force of law, to pay the tenant the value of certain woodwork on houses erected by him. But the liability was not rested upon contract but upon a general rule of law applicable to all landlords whether their lands were entailed or not, and whether they were heirs or singular successors. Lord Gifford treated it as a question of tenant's fixtures. He says—"Such woodwork, though fixed, remains in that district the tenant's property, and the landlord must pay for it as such—that is, whoever is landlord at the ish must pay for it if he retains it." Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff thought the question whether the obligation to pay transmitted against a succeeding heir of entail or against the executor of the original lessor did not arise (firstly), because in the particular case the deceased heir of entail never undertook any obligation whatever to the outgoing tenant in regard to the right of tenancy on which the claim was founded; and, secondly, because the immemorial custom or usage in the county of Caithness, which the Court held to be effectual, operated not by implied paction or contract but by law, and therefore, said his Lordship, "is as good against the landlord whether he be owner in fee-simple or under an entail, as if a statute had been passed to that effect." The case is therefore no authority on the transmissibility of obligations between heirs of entail.

The third case relied on by the pursuer, Breadalbane v. Jamieson,² in so far as it has any bearing, is only another illustration of the general principle. The Marquis of Breadalbane had pulled down the old house of Ardmaddy in order to build a new mansion-house more suitable to the estate, and died before the new house was finished. It was held in an action at the instance of the next heir that his executors and his general estate were not liable to a pecuniary claim of an amount requisite to complete the mansion. It is true, as the Lord Ordinary observes, that this left the heir of entail under a disadvantage. But the ground on which it was found that he could not be relieved at the expense of the executors is perfectly consistent with the former decisions. To destroy or alienate the mansion-house would have been a contravention of the prohibitions, but to pull it down in order to reconstruct it was a lawful exercise of the powers of a fiar who was not in that particular subject to any restriction. The deceased Marquis had therefore done no wrong, and if he died before his purpose to rebuild had been carried out, the succeeding heir took the estate in a condition which had been brought about without any contravention. In those circumstances, the Lord President says there can be no implied obligation between the successive heirs, and no liability except what is created by the fetters of the entail. The only measure of their rights and liabilities is the deed of entail, and no pecuniary liability can be imposed either on a subsequent heir or on the general estate of his predecessor except what the deed of entail authorises. I may add to this discussion of the authorities that of the two recent cases between the *Earl of Galloway*³ and the Duke of Bedford, to which the Lord Ordinary refers, the first is, in Feb. 20, 1908. my judgment, entirely in accordance with the whole series of decisions from *Gillespie v. Dillon v. Campbell*¹ downwards. The second is, I think, distinguishable from *Moncreiff v. Skene*² and the other cases in which liability has been fixed upon executors. But, however that may be, it has no bearing on the question now to be decided. Riddell.

Lord Kinnear.

If my view of the general rule of law is correct, its application to the particular contract before us is evident. The obligation which the pursuer seeks to enforce is that the tenant "shall deliver at the end of the lease to the landlord or incoming tenant, as far as possible, not more than the same number of sheep and the same classes as he receives on his entry, and the proprietor agrees that the second party," i.e., the tenant, "or his representatives, shall receive the same prices as he paid on his entry." The question is whether such a stipulation as that can be made good against the defender on the only ground which could enable the granter of the lease to create any liability as against the next heir of entail, to wit, that he was in his time the proprietor of the land, and free to deal with it, except in so far as he was restrained by the fetters. By a restricted construction of the fetters he was enabled to grant a lease which might be valid as a real right. But that will not support an obligation which, although contained in a lease, cannot be made real. It appears to me impossible to make such an obligation as this a real burden upon land consistently with the principles laid down in Coutts v. The Tailors of Aberdeen.³ But if it were possible it would involve a contravention, because it is a stipulation for the payment of money, or, in other words, it would affect the estate with debt, and therefore it would be made void and null by force of the irritant clause. But in its true character it is, in my opinion, a personal contract over and above the lease, and therefore it is ineffectual as against the defender, who does not represent the contracting owner. It is, as Lord Kyllachy points out in Panton v. Mackintosh,⁴ very much more onerous than the obligations for meliorations, which have over and over again been found to be ineffectual against heirs of entail. There would seem to be two ways, in one or other of which it must be performed. Either the heir must find a new tenant at whatever cost, ready to take over the sheep stock at the pursuer's price, or else he must pay the price and take the stock himself. In the first view, the heir in possession undertakes to regulate the terms of a lease to be granted by his successor after his own possession has come to an end, and that cannot be supported consistently with the decisions of the House of Lords in *Kerr v. Redhead*⁵ and in the Queensberry Leases.⁶ In the second view, it imposes upon the heir a contract to purchase a stock of sheep at a price which the pursuer alleges upon record is above their value; and that is just as inconsistent as the first alternative with the principles which have regulated such questions for more than a hundred years. For these reasons I agree entirely with the judgment of Lord Kyllachy in Panton v. Mackintosh,⁴ and I think we ought to follow his decision.

Feb. 20, 1908. We ought not, however, to pass unnoticed the argument for the pursuer, that in equity his claim ought to be sustained. If he is right in his allegation that he has a good claim in law against the general estate of the lessor, Gillespie v. Riddell, I am unable to see any equity in imposing upon the defender a liability, Lord Kinnear. which does not properly attach to her, in order to relieve him of the inconvenience of suing his true debtor in another Court. But if it were assumed that the executors are not liable, the equity is by no means so obvious as in the cases with reference to meliorations, for in these cases the heir of entail had benefit from the expenditure on farms and buildings. The defender on the other hand, does not take the sheep stock, for which she declines to pay. But the true answer is to be found in the opinion of Lord Thurlow in Kerr v. Redhead,¹ and in accordance with that judgment we must hold that the tenant has no right in equity if he has no right in law.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree entirely with the opinion which my brother Lord Kinnear has just delivered, and as he has gone into the matter so fully I only intend to add a few words. The key to the solution of this question seems to me to consist in one or two well-known and old-established propositions. When you seek to enforce the personal contract of one man against another man you must shew that that other man represents him. An heir of entail taking in succession to another heir of entail does not represent the prior heir of entail at all; he takes from the entailor. A lease in its origin is a personal contract, and accordingly a lease entered into by the proprietor of an estate, whether he was heir of entail or whether he was a person holding the estate in fee-simple, would not be binding upon anyone who did not represent that man—and so, of course, it would not be binding against an ordinary purchaser or a singular successor—were it not for the old statute which made leases of a certain duration real rights. Accordingly, the efficacy of a lease against a person who does not represent the grantor of the lease is always due to the fact of its being made a real right by statute, and not to the fact of its being a personal contract. Now, when you come to deal with leases in the case of heirs of entail you of course come athwart the conditions of the entail itself. There is no doubt that a lease is an alienation of the estate, because, in so far as it is a real right, it is a giving away of the estate, no doubt temporarily, but still a giving it away for the time being to someone else. Accordingly, if the matter had been treated strictissimi juris there can, I think, be no doubt that no lease would have been good as against an heir of entail as being an alienation. It was held to be an alienation in the well-known set of cases which are known by the general name of the Queensberry Leases,² but it was held at the same time that it was a necessity of the situation that a certain relaxation should be made, and the rule of relaxation that was made was that a lease should not be treated as an alienation where it was of such duration that it could be held to enure to the benefit not of one heir, but of the whole heirs of entail as a body. I think it is quite clear, when you come to a stipulation of the sort that we are dealing with here, that it will not fall within that exception; and I entirely agree with what Lord Kinnear said in the course of his opinion, that there arises a very necessary difference between the obligation upon an heir of entail where all that the heir of entail for the time being has to submit to is the taking away of his land for a temporary period under the condition of being paid therefor, and where the thing he has to submit to is, not the enforcement of a real right, but the payment of a sum of money. I agree with the doubt which his Lordship indicated, but which he passed over, namely, the doubt whether anything that is a payment of money of uncertain amount to be recovered as being a real right, can ever square with the well-known canon of rules which Lord Corehouse laid down in the Tailors of Aberdeen.¹ Accordingly I also agree with the conclusion which Lord Kinnear came to, that you will find, on looking at the sum total of the cases, that nothing has ever been enforced against an heir of entail except the mere giving up of land—nothing in the way of making him perform some other obligation which may mean more than the giving up of land.

I think this will become even more clear if one tests it for the moment by the remedy. Supposing that an heir of entail in possession, against whom an obligation of this kind was sought to be enforced, was entirely impecunious, how are you going to work it out by diligence? Of course, as far as ordinary possession upon a lease is concerned, that is simple enough. All you have got to do, supposing the new landlord drove forth the tenant by force out of his farm, would be to interdict the heir of entail, and the tenant would be restored to the occupation of his farm. That is the protection which the Court would give. But supposing the heir of entail refuses to pay the sum which is the true value of the sheep, and has no money, what is to be done? If you set to work by adjudication, which on the expiry of the legal might take away the estate altogether, that surely would be alienation with a vengeance. In other words, it would be a sort of alienation which certainly would not fall within the exception which was laid down by the House of Lords in the Queensberry Lease cases.² If you did not proceed by adjudication, but proceeded by the other well-known diligence of poiding the ground, you would not get any more satisfactory result, because it is perfectly clear that the consequences of poiding the ground would fall entirely upon the back of one heir of entail in the succession of heirs taking the land, whereas the whole idea of the exception laid down in the *Queensberry Leases*² is that the thing is for the benefit of the whole heirs of entail. Upon these grounds, and I have merely added a very few words to what was so well explained by Lord Kinnear, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment here cannot stand.

LORD M'LAREN.—I cannot usefully add anything to the opinion which Lord Kinnear has delivered, and in which I concur on all points. In listening to the opinion one observation did occur to me, not altogether independent, but rather supplementary, to what has been said, to the effect that however this claim is put—if it were clearly expressed as a real burden in the lease—it would amount to an alienation of the estate, and therefore

Feb. 20, 1908. to a contravention of the prohibitions in the entail. In the record the material clauses of the lease are set out, and in the clause in question the obligation is, "That the proprietor agrees that the second party or his representatives shall receive the same price for the sheep as he paid on entry." It is not said from whom he is to receive the money. The obligation may either mean that the granter of the lease binds himself and his heirs and executors to pay this price at the expiration of the lease, or it may mean that he proposes that his successor in the entail shall pay the price of the stock out of his private means, or it may mean that he would transmit this obligation, supposed to be for the benefit of the estate, as a real burden affecting the entailed estate. As to the first alternative I need say nothing, for the reasons expressed by the Lord Ordinary and Lord Kinneir, that neither the heir-at-law nor the personal representatives are parties to this action. As to the second alternative, the conclusion of the summons is just as ambiguous as the lease itself is in regard to the nature of the obligation or the persons affected by it. We are asked to make a declaratory finding that the obligation is binding on the defender as heiress of entail in possession of the said lands, and that may either mean that she is to pay the money out of other sources than the estate, or that she is in some way or other compelled to fulfil the obligation out of the estate. I agree with your Lordship that the real test, or a very convincing test, of the efficacy of the obligation is to bring it to the test of diligence. Supposing that the pursuer had taken the view that the heiress of entail was personally liable, and had concluded for payment of the same price or value of the sheep stock as he had himself paid to the tenant on his entry to the farm, if he had gone on to formulate a petitory conclusion for the payment of that sum of money, what would the answer of the defender be? She would say,—“I am not confirmed in the personal estate, nor have I made up a title by service as heir in general; what I have done is to obtain service as heir of provision, which has the effect of establishing that I am the person pointed out in the destination as heir of entail, and entitles me to have an entry from the Crown or the superior, as the case may be, which will put me in possession of this estate.” There is nothing in such an entry that could possibly subject the defender to take over the debts of the previous heir in possession, and I do not suppose that such a proceeding was contemplated by the pursuer, because nothing was suggested in argument about it. What was really maintained to us was that in some way or other the obligation was one attaching to the estate and for the benefit of the estate, the fulfilment of which was therefore obligatory on the heirs of entail in their order. Supposing that the defender takes up a position of passive resistance, as she is quite entitled to do, then there is no other way of making the pursuer's theory effective and recovering the money out of the land than by adjudication of the entailed estate. If the adjudication had been obtained in the lifetime of the granter of the obligation, could it for a moment be doubted that this would be a contravention of the prohibition against contracting debt whereby the estate should be evicted? Is it less so when the proceeding is taken after his death with relation to the same subject and with the same result? But then the forfeiture only affects the interest of the granter of the lease, and does not touch his successor. I think when the case is looked at in this way the essential unsoundness of Feb. 20, 1903. the argument becomes very evident, because it is then seen that what has been done or attempted is really a diminution of the capital value of the estate to all future heirs of entail, and therefore a contravention of the conditions of the entail. I do not add anything further, except that I agree that it is wholly unnecessary that there should be a proof in this case. Subject to anything that may be said as to the form of the judgment, I think we must reverse the decision of the Lord Ordinary upon the main question, but of course I agree that we should adhere as to the conclusions affecting the personal representatives.

* The case of Panton v. Mackintosh referred to above was decided by Lord Kyllachy, in the Outer-House, on 20th March 1903.

John Panton was tenant in the farm of Dalmunzie, in virtue of a lease dated October 1883 and expiring at Martinmas 1902, which contained this clause—"And the said John Panton is bound, as he hereby binds and obliges himself, to take over from the said James Small" (the previous tenant) "the sheep stock on the lands hereby let at the valuation of two men mutually chosen, or of an oversman in case of difference; the said Charles Hills Mackintosh (the lessor, then heir of entail in possession) binds and obliges himself, at the expiry of this lease, to bind the next or incoming tenant to take from the said John Panton the stock of sheep on the said lands hereby let at the valuation of two men. . . ."

Panton's widow and executrix brought an action of declarator against the heir of entail in possession, who had in 1893 succeeded Charles Hills Mackintosh in the estate, to have it declared that the defender was bound, in virtue of the lease granted by his predecessor, either to secure a new tenant in the farm whom he should bind to take over the pursuer's sheep stock at valuation as at Martinmas 1902, or else himself take the stock over.

Lord Kyllachy, in granting the defender absolvitor on the ground that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, said—"In this case I am not satisfied that even if the estate of Dalmunzie had been unentailed and the defender had succeeded his uncle, the lessor, as heir-at-law or gratuitous disponee, he (the defender) could have been held liable in terms of this summons either to secure a tenant who should take over the sheep stock at valuation or else to take over the sheep stock himself on the same terms. The obligation in the lease (differing from that in the former lease to Mr Small) imposes on the lessor no obligation in any event to take over the sheep stock. It simply requires that he will take the next or incoming tenant bound to do so. And I doubt much whether that implies any undertaking applicable to the case of the lessor taking the farm into his own hands, or at all events applicable to the case, which apparently has happened, of his doing so after ineffectual attempts to let the farms—attempts not said to have been other than honest—but which have not resulted in any offer of any kind being received.

"But it is not, I think, necessary to determine finally any question as to the construction of this obligation. For the defender is an heir of entail, and while the lease being a lease of ordinary duration may as a title of Parent and Child—Bastard—Filiation—Proof—Opportunity—Corroboration—False denials by defender.—Observed that in actions of filiation and aliment opportunity alone will not amount to corroboration of the pursuer's evidence, unless it is of such a character as to bring in the element of suspicion, or has a complexion put upon it by statements made by the defender which are proved to be false.

Dicta in Macpherson v. Largue, June 16, 1896, 23 R. 785, approved.

1st DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

HELEN DAWSON, 3 Fingal Street, Glasgow, brought an action of filiation and aliment in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow, against William M'Kenzie, 13 Holmhead Street there.

A proof was allowed and led. At the proof it was established that possession have been good as against him, it is I think conclusively settled that he is not liable in performance of any obligation undertaken by a preceding heir of entail, although relating to the entailed lands, and contained in a lease, which is in itself a contravention of the entail. That principle is perhaps best illustrated by the cases upon melioration which are to be found collected and commented upon in Jamieson v. Earl of Breadalbane (March 16, 1877, 4 R. 667), and Learmonth v. Sinclair (January 23, 1878, 5 R. 548). And in view of the doctrine of these cases I am not, I confess, sure whether the pursuer's position would be worse or better according as his construction or the defender's construction of the obligation was preferred. For if the lessor is to be held as having himself undertaken to take over the sheep stock, that is an obligation considerably more onerous than any involved in most obligations for meliorations, while, on the other hand, if the lessor is to be held to have undertaken for himself and his heirs of entail to let the farm at all cost, and do so at such rent, if any, as could be got with such a burden attaching to the tenancy, the interference with the heir of entail's rights would be of a kind which would be certainly novel, and I think very difficult to support.

"It is said that in the case of a fee-simple estate the obligation would have been good as against purchasers and singular successors, and perhaps it might (I do not know), but so also would be an obligation to pay meliorations. And yet, as I have said, there is no doubt as to the heir of entail's freedom in that matter, or rather as to his freedom prior to the recent statute (Entail Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1878, 41 and 42 Vict. cap. 28). The truth is that the considerations which determine the liability of, for instance, a purchaser, are wholly different from those which determine the liability of an heir of entail. With a purchaser the question is as to the terms, express or implied, of his disposition. With an heir of entail, on the other hand, the question is as to the effect of the fetters of the entail.

"It is also urged that there is here an averment that the clause in question is usual and customary in similar leases. But I do not see my way to allowing a proof upon that point. If the averment had been that, apart from all stipulation, the obligation in question was effectual, by force of custom having the force of law, such an averment might have required consideration. For, although not perhaps necessary to the decision, there are opinions upon that subject expressed by Judges of eminence in the case of Learmonth v. Sinclair (cit. sup.), which would require to be reckoned with. But the averment here falls obviously far short of anything of that kind. All that is said is that such clauses are usual and customary in similar leases. And I am afraid that there are many clauses not unusual in leases which are yet beyond all doubt contraventions of a strict entail. I do not, therefore, see my way to allowing a proof of the averment referred to. . . ."

suspicion, and there was no proof of familiarities. The statements made by the defender in the witness-box were not disproved in any material particular by the other evidence adduced at the proof.

On 28th November 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (M. G. Davidson)
assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie), who, on 22d February 1907, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and granted decree as craved.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard before the First Division on 21st February 1908, when the undernoted authorities were referred to.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—In a case like this I am afraid that the Court will always be left with the feeling that possibly it may not have arrived at the real truth. Yet, none the less, in the consideration of such delicate circumstances, it is absolutely necessary for the security of people in general that the Court should not be moved by sympathy or by moral inferences to depart from the rules already laid down by which evidence must be judged.
I do not think it necessary to say more, as to the rules which prevail in regard to such cases as this, than has been said already. The modern doctrine—and the modern doctrine owed its introduction to the alteration of the old law under which the parties were not competent witnesses—the modern doctrine was first laid down in the case of M'Bayne,² and perhaps the best expression of it was that given in a more recent decision by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner, in the case of Macpherson,³ with which I entirely concur. The outcome of it is this, that there must be something more than the pursuer's own statement, and that that something must amount to corroboration. Now the mistake which the learned Sheriff has made here is in taking the mere proof of opportunity as amounting to corroboration. Mere opportunity alone does not amount to corroboration, but two things may be said about it. One is that the opportunity may be of such a character as to bring in the element of suspicion.
That is, that the circumstances and locality of the opportunity may be such as in themselves to amount to corroboration. The other is that the opportunity may have a complexion put upon it by statements made by the defender which are proved to be false. It is not that a false statement made by the defender proves that the pursuer's statements are true, but it may give to a proved opportunity a different complexion from what it would have borne had no such false statement been made. I am really only repeating in other words what was said by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of Macpherson.³ He there said,—“No corroboration can be derived from evidence of the defender which shews he is

Feb. 21, 1908. not speaking the truth. If his evidence is not to be believed it must be taken out of the case altogether, and the case must be treated as if he had not been examined." He then refers to the facts in the case before him, and continues,—“But if those facts were capable of leading to a certain inference, and if the defender made no answer when that inference was suggested, it is then that that absence of explanation by the defender's evidence would come to be of importance, and in the same way his denial of those facts, which are held to be proved, is significant, as it gives a complexion to them which they might not otherwise bear if explained.” Accordingly, if I had found, or could have found, from the evidence here that the defender had denied things—possibly innocent in themselves—which were affirmed by other witnesses, that might have afforded the amount of corroboration necessary to establish the pursuer's case. That would have brought it within the same class of facts that were present in the case of M'Bayne,¹ where the thing that turned the scale was that the defender denied ever having seen the pursuer before the occasion when she stopped him in the street and charged him with being the father of her child, while it was held to be established that he had twice met her before, though in circumstances which could not in themselves give rise to suspicion. Those facts seem to me to be an illustration of the minimum that will suffice as corroboration, and it does not appear to me that that minimum is afforded by the facts of the present case.

There is also this, that there appears to be something here which might have been brought out at the proof, but which has not been brought out. There are certain letters, the second of which seems to me to have a strong ring of truth about it. But these are not evidence against the defender though they might have been made available as evidence had they been put to the defender in his cross-examination. That, however, as I say, has not been done.

On the whole matter, therefore, I think that the pursuer has not made out her case, and that the only course open to us is to recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff and restore the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in your Lordship's opinion, and it is hardly necessary to add anything. It is a very common state of the evidence in such cases as this that the pursuer's case depends only upon her own evidence, with a certain amount of corroboration as to opportunities, and then the question of fact arises whether these opportunities were such as to raise legal grounds of suspicion, or were merely of the nature of innocent meetings between man and woman. I think that in this class of cases the law laid down by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of *Macpherson*² comes to be of importance, because I agree with his Lordship that it is not sufficient corroboration if you merely displace the evidence of the defender and shew that he has made false statements. There must be corroboration of the pursuer's evidence; yet when the effect of the defender's false evidence, i.e., his denial of circumstances which are otherwise proved, is to shew that there is something of which he is ashamed, or something the admission of which he conceived would throw suspicion upon himself, this will put a Feb. 21, 1908. different complexion on what the Court might otherwise be disposed to regard as innocent intimacy between the parties. Here there is nothing that is calculated to throw doubt on the truth of the defender's statements. Although there is no evidence tending to shew to what other person the paternity of the pursuer's child should be attributed, yet I think the pursuer has not established her case against the defender, and the Sheriff-substitute's judgment is right.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the learned Sheriff proceeds on a combination of two grounds, both of which are grounds of inference of fact and not of legal opinion, namely, first, that there was opportunity, and second, that the defender denies too much.

Now, I think only the first of these two grounds can reasonably be accepted as made out, for when the defender's evidence is compared with the evidence against him, one cannot find that he denies anything which has been really proved, and therefore, I think we reach the question whether the bare statement of the pursuer herself, coupled with evidence of opportunity in the sense that both were together in circumstances in which connection was not impossible, is sufficient to prove the pursuer's case. It is not proved that they were alone together in such circumstances as to give rise to suspicion or reproach, and there is no evidence of opportunity in any other sense than that it was not physically or morally impossible that connection might have taken place, and the result therefore is that there is no evidence on which the Court can proceed other than the pursuer's own statement, which, of course, is not enough.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and assoilzied the defender.

Ship—Salvage—Services rendered under contract.—Services rendered by one vessel to another in distress are not "salvage" services unless voluntarily rendered.

One vessel assisted another in distress. Both vessels were insured in the same mutual insurance company, under policies which contained a condition that any vessel insured in the company should if necessary render assistance to any other vessel insured in the same company.

Held that the services rendered, being contractual and obligatory, were not "salvage" services entitling the owners of the vessel rendering them to "salvage" remuneration.

ON 13th June 1907 the steam-trawler "Clan Grant," owned by the Clan Steam Trawling Company, Limited, rendered assistance to the steam-trawler "Strathclyde," owned by the Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Company, Limited, at a time when the latter vessel was

The owners, and the master, mate, and crew of the "Clan Grant" raised an action against the owners of the "Strathclyde" concluding for payment of £500 as salvage.

The defenders, while admitting that services had been rendered, stated, inter alia:—(Ans. 9) " . . . The 'Strathclyde' and the 'Clan Grant' were insured in the Aberdeen Mutual Steamship and Trawlers Insurance Company, and each of these vessels was bound to come to the assistance of the other when in distress in terms of the policy of insurance effected by each of the said vessels with the said insurance company, and the rules of said company. The 'Strathclyde's' policy of insurance is herewith produced and referred to, as are also the rules of the said insurance company (incorporated in all policies of assurance effected with said company), and reference is specially made to Rule 30.* It is explained that the system of

And it is mutually agreed between the assured and assurers, that the articles of association of the assurers' company, and the rules of the company, shall be deemed part hereof, and be binding upon the assured and assurers as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if such articles were inserted in this policy, and any breach thereof will invalidate the same."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuers having salvaged the defenders' ship, they are entitled to salvage from the defenders.
 (3) The conditions of the policies of insurance and rules of said insurance company libelled, not excluding claims for remuneration for salvage services, the defenders' plea in bar of the pursuers' right to claim salvage should be repelled.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuers, the Clan Steam Trawling Company, Limited, being under pre-existing obligation to render the services in question to the "Strathclyde," are not entitled to salvage, and the defenders are entitled to absolver, quoad the claims of these pursuers, with expenses.

By interlocutor dated 7th January 1908, the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) repelled the first plea in law for the defenders, and allowed a proof.*

from all the members in the following manner, viz.:—All claims for total loss, damage done, and general average, and for particular average shall be assessed on the capital at risk in each class respectively on the dates of such claims arising. The members of each class shall contribute only to the insurance claims of vessels insured in that class."

The following excerpt is taken from the Rules of the Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Company :—

"92. Steamers insured in this association bind themselves to give assistance to any vessel broken down or in distress, insured in this association, or in the associations of the United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawlers Insurance and Indemnity Association (North Shields), Tyne Steam Tug Towing Mutual (Shields), Percy Mutual (Newcastle), Forth and North Sea Steamboat Mutual (Leith), it having been arranged that the vessels in these associations shall be bound to like conditions, and that the compensation for services rendered be decided and determined by the committees of the association or associations in which the vessels were insured."

* "OPINION.—The pursuers in this action are the owners, officers, and crew of the steam-trawler 'Clan Grant'; and they seek to recover a sum of £500 in respect of salvage services rendered to the defenders' vessel 'Strathclyde.' It is not disputed that the facts averred disclose a relevant case for compensation as for salvage services; and the defenders on record state that they are willing to pay reasonable compensation to the officers and crew of the 'Clan Grant.' They plead, however, that the owners' claim is excluded because they were under a pre-existing obligation to render the services in question to the 'Strathclyde,' and it was this matter alone which was the subject of discussion in the Procedure-roll.

"The pre-existing obligation in question is derived from the Rules of the Aberdeen Mutual Steamship and Trawlers Insurance Company, with which Company both the 'Clan Grant' and the 'Strathclyde' were insured." (His Lordship quoted articles 3 and 9 of the articles of association, and article 30 of the rules)—"Appealing to this rule the defenders say that the owners of the 'Clan Grant' were under a general obligation to render

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The services rendered by the "Clan Grant" were rendered in fulfilment of an obligation undertaken by the owners in their contract of insurance. The fact that they were thus contractual and not voluntary took them out of the category of salvage services, it being well settled that services rendered by one vessel to another were only salvage services when they were rendered voluntarily and were not attributable either to legal obligation or official duty.¹ An excellent illustration of the rule was to be found in the cases of the tug or pilot who were only entitled to salvage remuneration for extraordinary services outwith the scope of their contract of employment.² It followed accordingly that if the services rendered by the pursuers were not salvage services, they could not form the basis of a claim for remuneration in a salvage action. If any remuneration was due them it must be under the contract of insurance, and it could only be recovered in another action salvage services to any vessel in distress insured in the same company; and that the claim for salvage services as distinguished from a claim for actual loss incurred in rendering the services is accordingly barred.

"The authority relied on in support of this proposition was a decision of Lord Stowell in the case of the 'Zephyr,' 2 Hagg. 43; and undoubtedly if the rubric is to be read as laying down an absolute rule on the subject apart from the special circumstances in which the question arose, it supports the defenders' contention. In that case two vessels had agreed to sail as consorts, and to render to each other mutual assistance. In the course of the voyage one of the vessels rendered certain services to the other by standing by for several days; but these services were held in fact, as I read the decision, not to be such as would found a salvage claim. This was obviously a sufficient ground for dismissing the action. But the learned Judge prefaced his judgment with some observations in which he indicated that the claim would in any event have been barred by the mutual agreement to which I have referred. The case, however, was a very special one, and does not, in my opinion, support the general proposition that, where the owners of two vessels have agreed to give assistance to each other if broken down or in distress no claim for remuneration as for salvage can ever arise. In the case of the 'Zephyr' it must be held to have been implied in the agreement that such services as were actually rendered were to be mutually given by the vessels concerned without remuneration; and it is material to a proper understanding of the case that the Court held that the services, which were the subject of the action, were not salvage services at all.

"The defenders also referred to the case of Harriot, 1 W. Rob. (Adm.) 439; the 'Maria Jane,' 14 Jur. 857; and 'Sappho,' L. R., 3 P. C. A. 690. In the last of these cases it was decided that when salvage services are performed by one ship to another belonging to the same owners the master and crew of the salving ship are entitled to salvage remuneration; although no claim will lie at the instance of the owners. The decision, therefore, does not touch the present case; and it does not appear to me that the observations based upon the contract. A consideration, however, of the policy, articles, and rules, especially Rule 30, clearly shewed that no pecuniary payment was contemplated, the quid pro quo being lower premiums and the right to obtain similar gratuitous assistance from every other vessel insured with the Company. The pursuers' suggestion that it would be against public policy to refuse an award of salvage in the present action was without foundation, seeing that the defenders were willing to compensate the master and crew. The "Waterloo,"¹ founded on by the pursuers, contained nothing which controverted the general proposition laid down in the authorities already cited, and the "Margery"² only dealt with the rights of the master and crew, which were not here disputed.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—The Lord Ordinary was right. Salvage had been defined as the "compensation paid for the saving of a ship or her apparel or cargo."³ The respondents' vessel made by Lord Justice Mellish, in delivering the judgment of the Court, have any bearing upon the question at issue here. Nor does there appear to me to be any analogy between the case of seamen who render services connected with the saving of their own ship and the case of shipowners who are not otherwise connected than that both their vessels are insured in the same company rendering services to each other's vessels. In my opinion, therefore, there is no law to the effect that a pre-existing obligation constituted by an agreement between two shipowners to render salvage services to each other's ship operates in all cases as a bar to a claim for compensation. Such an agreement really does not add very much to the moral obligation which every ship is under to give assistance where possible to another ship that is in distress.

"I do not affirm that shipowners may not, by agreement, bar themselves from any claim for salvage remuneration in respect of services rendered to each other's property. Such an agreement might conceivably be objected to as being contrary to public policy. But, assuming its validity, I think it must be clear, from the agreement, that the rendering of assistance to a vessel in distress shall not found a claim for remuneration. The right to obtain salvage remuneration is one very much favoured in the law, and therefore cannot be excluded unless by express words or by very clear implication from the language used. Rule 30 contains no express exclusion of such a claim, and it does not appear to me that there is any implication at all that it should be excluded. If the question had arisen with a vessel belonging to the Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Company of Sunderland, I find, from the rules of that association (rule 92), that compensation would have been claimable, although the amount would require to be fixed by the committees of the associations in which the vessels were insured, and not by the ordinary tribunals of the country. The defenders here say that they are willing to pay the owners of the 'Clan Grant' any outlay they have incurred or any damage they have sustained in connection with the services rendered, and that it has been the practice of the insurance company to meet such claims. If their argument, however, is good for anything, I think they must maintain that even such a claim is barred by Rule 30. It is possible to read into Rule 30 an implication that no compensation shall be allowed for assistance given in terms of that rule; but I cannot understand on what principle compensation should be limited to those cases where loss or outlay has been incurred in rendering services. A similar question was mooted, although not decided, in the case of the 'Margery,' L. R., [1902] P. 157; but it was not necessary to arrive at any decision on

Feb. 25, 1908. had saved the reclaimers' vessel, and all that they now claimed was compensation. Claims for such compensation were always favourably regarded by the Court for reasons of public policy, and the right to obtain it could only be excluded by express provision or by the clearest implication.¹ There was no such express provision here. Rule 30, it was true, provided that vessels were to assist each other, but it did not provide that they were to do so gratuitously, although it could easily have done so had that been intended. That such an intention was not to be implied, but rather the contrary, was apparent from Rule 92 of the Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Company, which referred in distinct terms to "compensation for services rendered." The fallacy which underlay the reclaimers' whole argument was that of regarding a simple obligation to perform services as equivalent to an obligation to perform services gratuitously. An examination of the cases where salvage remuneration had been held to be excluded shewed that they fell into one of two classes, viz. :—(a) cases where the ships were engaged upon a common enterprise;² (b) cases where the persons rendering the services stood in some special relation of duty to the vessel saved, such as pilot, tug, or crew.³ The "Margery,"⁴ although not entirely analogous in its circumstances, was, so far as it went, an authority favourable to the respondents.

At advising, on 25th February 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—At the hearing of this case I formed a fairly decided opinion that this reclaiming note must be successful, and a subsequent investigation of the authorities to be found in previous decisions confirmed my view as taken at first. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that "salvage remuneration" is very much favoured in the law, but he seems to me to err in holding that this is a case of salvage. It does not appear to me that the services rendered by the "Clan Grant" to the "Strathclyde" fall under the description of salvage services. The whole tone of the authorities is to be found in the expression "voluntary." Services to be rendered by one vessel to another in distress are services for which salvage is exigible when the service is not a service of contract or obligation, but is a service which those rendering it could refuse to render without committing any the point now at issue, because the owners of the salving vessel were not parties to the suit but were content with the award of compensation which the committee of the Sunderland Association had made in their favour. Without, therefore, expressing any opinion as to the validity of a bargain between the members of a mutual insurance company that their vessels should mutually render assistance on the footing of not being remunerated for their services, however meritorious, I reach the conclusion that the present claim is not barred because there is nothing in the agreement to exclude the right of the salvor to receive the remuneration for his services which the law gives him. I shall therefore repel the first plea in law for the defenders, and allow parties a proof of their respective averments."

breach of contract or duty undertaken as matter of obligation. It is of Feb. 25, 1908. course true that there is a duty in the sense of the moral law to render succour as far as may be possible to those in distress at sea. This moral obligation applies on land as well as on sea, and its force as a moral obligation is only greater in the case of sea perils because these are in the general case more clamant in their call for aid because of their exceptionally dangerous character. But this is an obligation which applies not to seafaring matters only, but to all circumstances in which the citizen can by timely assistance save others from danger; and even that obligation can hardly be held to exist as regards saving of corporeal subjects. It applies only to persons. But whatever be the extent of it, it is plainly not an obligation in law. Its non-fulfilment cannot be visited with either public official censure or give claim in civil suit in respect of failure. Salvage in its true sense is suitable reward for services voluntarily rendered in circumstances where by the services offered on the one hand and accepted on the other there is saving of what otherwise was in risk of perishing or being lost.

The Clan
Steam Trawling Co.,
Limited, v.
Aberdeen
Steam Trawling and Fishing Co.,
Limited.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.

It seems to me quite clear that the word "salvage" does not apply to services which those rendering them had by contract undertaken to render.

Here, in this case, the insurance conditions were that the vessels mutually insured gave, as part of the consideration for the insurance, an obligation to render assistance to vessels mutually insured with them. It may be taken to be quite certain that this obligation was as much a part of the premium of insurance as the money paid by the insurer. Each insured bargained for the assistance of the others, and undertook to render assistance to the others, when any two vessels came to be the one in the position of being a vessel in distress, and the other a vessel able to render assistance. It was a perfectly intelligible and efficient contract for benefit, which the one had a right to claim and the other had contracted to give.

That being so, I have without hesitation come to the conclusion that the defenders' plea in law which the Lord Ordinary has repelled should be sustained. I do not think it necessary to go over the authorities in detail. I have had an opportunity of perusing an opinion of Lord Ardwall which reviews these authorities very fully, and in which I concur.

Accordingly I would move your Lordships to recall the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, to sustain the first plea in law for the defenders, and to grant absolvitor from the claim for salvage. The defenders are willing to meet such charges as may be necessary to meet outlays and payments to officers and crew of the "Clan Grant," and the case will be remitted back to the Lord Ordinary that this matter may be disposed of.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—Had the proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary been a proof before answer I should have been disposed to think that the inquiry might have thrown some light on the question whether the sum claimed by the owners of the "Clan Grant" was for "salvage services" as claimed in the summons. But that is not the nature of the proof, for the Lord Ordinary prefaces his allowance of it by repelling the first plea in law for the defenders, which distinctly tables the proposition that the owners are not entitled to salvage. Now, being thus brought face to face with

Feb. 25, 1908. the question whether this claim, so far as at the instance of the owners, is a salvage claim at all, I have come to agree with the opinion of your Lordship and also with that which my brother Lord Ardwall is about to read.

The Clan
Steam Trawling Co.,
Limited, v.
Aberdeen
Steam Trawling and Fishing Co.,
Limited.

LORD ARDWALL.—This is an action raised by the Clan Steam Trawling Company, Limited, as owners of the ship “Clan Grant,” and the officers and crew of the said ship, against the Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Company, Limited, the owners of the steam-trawler “Strathclyde,” and it concludes for payment of £500 in name of salvage in respect of “the salvage services specified in the condescendence.”

It is not disputed by the defenders that if the services in respect of which the claim is made had been rendered spontaneously and voluntarily, the owners of the “Clan Grant” would have been entitled to salvage; but in their first plea in law they plead that the pursuers, the owners of the “Clan Grant,” being under pre-existing obligation to render the services in question to the “Strathclyde,” are not entitled to salvage. With regard to the claim of the officers and crew, the defenders represent themselves as being willing to pay a reasonable amount of salvage, and with regard to them, the only question that remains is as to the amount to be paid.

The question that has to be decided now is whether the first plea in law for the defenders ought to be sustained or repelled. The Lord Ordinary repelled the plea on the ground, apparently, that the services rendered by the “Clan Grant” were “salvage services,” and that there is nothing in the contract founded on by the defenders to exclude the claim. He expresses himself thus,—“The right to obtain salvage remuneration is one very much favoured in the law, and therefore cannot be excluded except by express words or by very clear implication from the language used. Rule 30 contains no express exclusion of such a claim, and it does not appear to me that there is any implication at all that it should be excluded”; and again he says,—“I reach the conclusion that the present claim is not barred, because there is nothing in the agreement to exclude the right of the salvor to receive the remuneration for his services which the law gives him.”

It humbly appears to me that the Lord Ordinary has in these passages and the rest of his opinion assumed that the services rendered were salvage services giving the pursuers a right to remuneration unless such right was barred by contract.

I cannot help thinking that the Lord Ordinary by making the assumption alluded to has failed to attend to what is implied in the term “salvage services,” and that the question is not whether the pursuers have barred themselves from claiming the salvage remuneration they are entitled to, but whether they are entitled to any salvage remuneration at all—in other words, whether their services were of the nature of “salvage services.”

Now, I think it clear upon the authorities that in order to entitle a person to claim salvage remuneration, the services in respect of which he claims must have been spontaneously and voluntarily rendered, and not rendered in respect of any contractual or official duty resting on the person rendering them. This, I think, is established by a series of dicta pronounced by Judges of the greatest eminence in a variety of cases.

In the case of the "Neptune"¹ Lord Stowell is reported as having Feb. 25, 1908. expressed himself as follows :—"What is a salvor? A person who, without any particular relation to a ship in distress, proffers useful service, and gives it as a volunteer without any pre-existing covenant that connected him with the duty of employing himself for the preservation of that ship." And the same noble and learned Lord in the case of the "Zephyr"² refused to entertain a claim of salvage for services rendered by one vessel to another, where the vessels were sailing as consorts and under an agreement to render mutual assistance. And in the same volume of Reports, in the case of the "Calypso,"³ Sir Christopher Robinson, in considering an alleged distinction between civil and military salvage, expressed himself thus :—"It will be found, I think, that both these forms of salvage resolve themselves into the equity of rewarding spontaneous services rendered in the protection of the lives and property of others. This is a general principle of natural equity, and it was considered as giving a cause of action in the Roman law, and from that source it was adopted by jurisdictions of this nature in the different countries of Europe." He then refers to a judgment of Sir William Wiseman in which he refers to the Digest, lib. 3, tit. 5.

The case of the "Waterloo"⁴ was quoted by the pursuers for certain dicta therein which they alleged to be favourable to their contention. In that case the East India Company attempted to escape liability for a claim for salvage on the ground that there was a usage and practice exempting them from payment of salvage when ships belonging to them were salvaged by a ship in their employment. Lord Stowell, then Sir William Scott, held that no such custom or usage was proved, and in the course of his judgment said that where an exemption is claimed from a submission to a general rule, the exemption must be so set forth as to be intelligible in its extent; an indefinite claim of exemption is "rank"—and other remarks to the same effect; but nowhere as far as I read the judgment is there anything controverting the general principle that to bring services within the category of salvage services they must be rendered voluntarily, and not in respect of any contract or official duty. The soundness of the definitions and dicta above quoted have been recognised in a variety of cases; for instance, in the *Cargo ex "Schüller,"*⁵ Lord Justice Brett says, at page 149—"Both cases are therefore consistent with what was said in the 'Thetis'⁶ and the 'Neptune,'⁷ that salvage is the service which volunteer adventurers spontaneously render to the owners in the recovery of property from loss or damage at sea under the responsibility of making restitution, and with a lien for their reward."

In the case of the "Solway Prince,"⁸ it was held by Sir F. H. Jeune that a contract with underwriters which was not depending on success precluded the plaintiffs from asserting a "maritime lien" on the vessel and claiming salvage remuneration from her owners. In delivering judgment he said—"There is not, so far as I know, any direct authority in the Court

See the 'Neptune'¹ and the 'Hannibal.'² These authorities at least illustrate the voluntary character which is held to be essential to the claim of a salvor, and they shew that if work be done in pursuance of a contract other than a salvage contract, it does not under ordinary circumstances give rise to a salvage claim."

Lord Ardwall. The rule of these decisions is very well set forth in Lord Justice Kennedy's Treatise on Civil Salvage. On page 2 his definition of salvage services concludes thus:—"If and so far as the rendering of such services is voluntary and attributable neither to legal obligation, nor to the interests of self-preservation, nor to the stress of official duty"; and again he says, on page 28 of the same work—"Voluntariness on the part of the salvor is equally with danger to the thing saved an essential element in the constitution of a salvage service."

The cases in which the services of a tug or of a pilot were remunerated as salvage services were referred to as detracting from the universality of the rule regarding voluntariness that I have just been considering, and, in particular the case of Akerblom v. Price, &c.,³ was referred to. In that case some pilots had rendered important services towards a vessel, and it was held that they were entitled to be remunerated as for salvage services, but in concluding the judgment of the Court, Lord Justice Brett spoke as follows:—"We have thought it right to give our reasons at length, but we might decide this case by saying that the service rendered was one which the pilots were not bound to render. It was a danger they were not bound to encounter; next that the service was not one of pilotage; it was not a piloting to any port or place, but of taking out—a salving from danger."

And so with regard to all similar cases it appears that the services were considered to be salvage services, because they were outside of and not within the contracts of towage or pilotage. In the present case the alleged salvage services, according to the pursuer's own averments, were of a most ordinary description.

The law standing thus, the only question is whether in the present case the owners of the "Clan Grant" were or were not under a contractual obligation to render the services they did to the "Strathclyde." This depends on the effect to be given to the policies of insurance, the articles of association, and the rules of the Aberdeen Mutual Steamship and Trawlers Insurance Company. The "Clan Grant" was insured with this company under a policy which is No. 15 of process, and in that policy it is provided that the premiums or contributions of the nature of premiums payable in respect of the insurance are to be calculated according to the losses by way of mutual insurance, and the policy goes on to provide thus:—"And it is mutually agreed between the assured and assurers that the articles of association of the assurers' company and the rules of the company shall be deemed part hereof, and be binding upon the assured and assurers as fully and effectually, to all intents and purposes, as if such articles were inserted Feb. 25, 1903. in this policy, and any breach thereof will invalidate the same."

By No. 3 of the articles of association it is provided that every insurer is to be deemed to become a member of the company, and by article 9 the members bind themselves to accept and agree to be bound by the rules of the company. Article 30 of the rules of the insurance company provides as follows:—"Ships insured in this company shall give assistance to any steamer broken down or in distress which is insured either in this company, or in the Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Company (Sunderland), or the United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawler Insurance and Indemnity Association (Shields), or any other association with which an agreement is or may be entered into." And Rule 32 provides that the funds required for the payment of claims shall be raised by contributions from all the members.

The Clan

Steam Trawling Co.,
Limited, v.
Aberdeen
Steam Trawling and Fishing Co.,
Limited.

Lord Ardwall

The "Strathclyde" was insured with the same company under a policy of insurance in identical terms with the policy over the "Clan Grant."

It is obvious from the above contract of insurance taken along with the articles and rules, which are declared to be incorporated therewith, that there was established a mutuality of obligation between all the members of the insurance company—all the members had an interest in keeping down claims for loss, because the fewer of these the smaller would be the contribution periodically demanded from the various members, and while each member was bound by the rules to give assistance to ships of other members of the company, he was on his part entitled to receive assistance from them, and if a ship belonging to any member of the company failed to give assistance to any other ship insured in the company which was broken down or in distress it is, I think, clear, first, that the owners of the former ship would be guilty of a breach of contract, in consequence of which their own policy would be invalid, and they might in addition be subjected to an action for damages.

I therefore think that it is perfectly plain that in the present case the "Clan Grant" was bound to give assistance to the "Strathclyde," which was in distress at the time the services condescended on were rendered. If this is so, it appears to me that there is an end of the pursuers' case, so far as at the instance of the owners of the "Clan Grant," because there was a pre-existing contract under which that vessel was bound in the circumstances to give assistance to the "Strathclyde," in other words, the services which were rendered by the "Clan Grant" to the "Strathclyde" were not in law salvage services at all, but were services rendered in pursuance of the contract between the owners of the "Clan Grant" and the Mutual Insurance Company, in which the owners of the "Strathclyde" had a jus quæsitum.

This being so, it is irrelevant and unnecessary to inquire whether the owners of the "Clan Grant" are barred by the contract from claiming remuneration as for salvage services, there being no salvage services for which remuneration can be claimed. But it is satisfactory to notice that the conclusion I have arrived at as matter of law is truly in accordance with the special contract, because I think it clearly appears from Article 25 that no remuneration for services was contemplated by the contract except for charges and expenses, and Rule 92 of the Total Loss Mutual Steamship

Feb. 25, 1908. Insurance Company, which was referred to by the pursuers as aiding their argument, is, I think, equally clear to the effect that salvage remuneration is not contemplated as a reward to steamers insured in that association giving assistance to vessels in distress, but only such "compensation" as may be determined by the committees of the association, and I need hardly point out that compensation and salvage remuneration, or "reward" as it is sometimes termed, are two very different things, and are arrived at in very different ways. To take one point of difference, the value of the property salvaged falls to be taken into account in salvage remuneration, whereas it has no place in a claim for compensation.

Lord Ardwall.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled; that the first plea in law for the defenders should be sustained, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the action so far as at the instance of the Clan Steam Trawling Company, Limited, and that quoad ultra the case should be remitted to the Lord Ordinary for further procedure.

LORD LOW was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor reclaimed against: Sustain the first plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action so far as laid at the instance of the Clan Steam Trawling Company, Limited: Remit," &c.

Succession—Testament—Vesting—Vesting subject to Defeasance—Conditional Institution of Issue—Direction to divide at postponed period—Power to advance meantime.—A testator by his general settlement appointed his wife his sole trustee with power to advance for the purpose of setting up any of his children in business—all payments to children "being reckoned as part of their ultimate share,"—and left his wife the liferent of his whole estate, "the same to be realised and divided equally on her death among" his "children, share and share alike, the issue of predeceasing children taking among them the share which would have fallen to their parents if in life."

Held that the estate vested in the children of the testator a morte testatoris subject to defeasance in the event of their predeceasing the liferentrix leaving issue.

Opinion reserved as to whether defeasance took place on a child's issue surviving their parent irrespective of whether or not they survived the liferentrix.

JAMES PENNY of Park, in the counties of Aberdeen and Kincardine (hereinafter called the truster), died on 22d January 1902, leaving a general settlement dated 10th September 1901. The settlement provided as follows:—"I . . . do hereby . . . appoint my wife to be my sole trustee and executrix, with power to her as trustee and executrix foresaid to borrow money on the security of my estate, either for the purpose of setting up any of my children in business or on their marriage . . . all payments made to children being reckoned as part of their ultimate share when the same falls to be divided: And I leave my said wife the liferent of my whole means and estate of every kind, the same to be realised and divided equally on her death among my children, share and share alike, the issue of predeceasing children taking among them the share which would have fallen to their parents if in life."

Penny's
Trustees v.
Adam.

2D DIVISION.

The truster left estate of the value of £20,000, whereof £19,500 was heritage, comprising the estate of Park, certain fishings, and certain feu-duties.

The truster was survived by his wife and by eight children. One of these children, James Penny of Lochwood, died on 1st November 1905, survived by a widow and three pupil children, and also by his mother, and the other seven children of the truster. He left a trust-disposition and settlement by which he conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and directed them, inter alia, to pay the income to his wife during her lifetime.

Before his death, James Penny of Lochwood had received a payment of £609, 17s. 9d. under the powers contained in the truster's general settlement, for the purpose of setting him up in business.

Questions having arisen as to what right, if any, James Penny of Lochwood had in the estate of his father the truster, the present special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The parties to the special case were:—(1) The trustees, original and assumed, of James Penny of Park, the truster; (2) the truster's surviving children; (3) the testamentary trustees of James Penny of Lochwood; (4) the widow of James Penny of Lochwood; (5) the tutors of the three pupil children of James Penny of Lochwood.

The special case contained the following statement:—

"The whole estate of the said James Penny of Lochwood, exclusive of any right he may be found to have had to a share of his father's estate, will not exceed £1000, and it will therefore be necessary for his widow, the fourth party hereto, to be advised whether or not she should claim her legal rights; but until the questions raised by this case are decided, it is impossible for her to ascertain what her husband's rights in the succession of his father may amount to in the circumstances which have arisen."

The second, third, and fourth parties maintained that on a sound construction of the general settlement of James Penny of Park, the truster, a share of the fee of his estate vested absolutely at his death in the children who survived him. The third and fourth parties maintained that the share which so vested in James Penny of Lochwood fell to be accounted for to the third parties as his testamentary trustees and executors and to be administered as part of his estate.

The fifth parties maintained that as James Penny of Lochwood predeceased the period of division of the estate of James Penny of Park, the truster; namely, the death of Mrs Mary Penny, the truster's widow, who was still alive, no share of the fee of the estate had vested

Feb. 25, 1908. in him, and the share of the estate destined to him was not carried to his trustees (the third parties) by the general conveyance in his trust-disposition and settlement.

Penny's
Trustees v.
Adam.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Did the fee of the shares of the estate of the truster vest in his children a morte testatoris? or, Did said estate vest in the children of the truster subject to defeasance in the event of their predeceasing their mother, the liferentrix, leaving issue? or, Is the vesting of said estate postponed till the expiry of said liferent? (2) (As amended) In the event of the first branch of the first question being answered in the negative does the amount of the payment made to James Penny of Lochwood during his mother's lifetime fall to be deducted from the share of the estate payable to his children?”

The second and fifth parties ultimately conceded that the second question fell to be answered in the affirmative.

The case was heard before the Second Division on 7th January 1908.

Argued for the first and fifth parties;—Under the truster's settlement vesting took place in his children a morte testatoris subject to defeasance in the event of their predeceasing the liferentrix leaving issue. The present case was ruled by the decision in Cairns' Trustees v. Cairns.¹ The only distinction between that case and the present was that here there was a power to advance. But a power to advance did not affect the question of vesting.² Predeceasing here meant predeceasing the liferentrix. That was in accordance with the ordinary rule of construction. Words of survivorship³ and predecease⁴ prima facie referred to the period of division. In the present case even apart from the general rule “predeceasing” must refer to the period mentioned immediately before, viz., the date of the death of the liferentrix. “Their ultimate share” meant the share eventually taken by a child, or by his issue if he predeceased the liferentrix. The argument now based upon the fact that here the word “predeceasing” was not unequivocally or expressly referable to the period of division was stated in *Cairns' Trustees*¹ as appeared from the argument in that case as reported.⁵ The only possible alternative to vesting subject to defeasance was suspension of vesting altogether till the period of division.⁶

Argued for the second, third, and fourth parties;—A share of the truster's estate vested indefeasibly a morte testatoris in each of the truster's children who survived him. Where a destination over to the issue of predeceasing children of the testator was unambiguously and per expressum referable to the period of division there was a strong presumption against vesting a morte. But where the period to which the destination over referred was ambiguous the primary presumption in favour of vesting a morte prevailed.⁷ *Cairns' Trustees*¹ was the only case where, with no express reference of the destination over to ^{Feb. 25, 1908.} the period of division and no survivorship clause, indefeasible vesting ^{Penny's} a morte had been negatived. In *Cairns' Trustees*¹ the distinction now ^{Trustees v.} stated was not considered by the Court. In Provan v. Provan,² in Adam. Parlane's Trustees v. Parlane,³ and Forrest's Trustees v. Mitchell's Trustees,⁴ the reference to the period of division was unequivocal. In Bowman,⁵ the opinions were divided as to the effect of a destination over to heirs. The direction to divide at a postponed period was not important.⁶ Conceding the presumption to be that a destination over referred to the period of division, yet it was plain from the cases cited⁷ that this presumption had been held to be overcome in the case of settlements containing expressions the same as those found here, and occurring in the same collocation with the period of division, and even in the case of settlements where the destination over was unequivocally referable to the period of division.⁸ The case of *Cairns' Trustees*¹ was distinguishable. In that case it was said that there was nothing in the context to take the case out of the general rule. Here there was a power to advance. Such a power had been held to be in favour of vesting a morte.⁹ But here the power to advance was not a mere incidental provision. It was placed in the forefront of the settlement as one of its main purposes. The trustee was empowered to give one of the children his whole share at once, and so defeat the rights of the grandchildren if the argument for the fifth parties was well founded. It was not likely that the truster intended his trustee to have power to give away the whole share before anything had vested, and when such a power was given it was more reasonable to hold that the testator intended vesting a morte.¹⁰ The power to advance was confined to children, and did not extend to issue of children. There was nothing to shew that division was postponed with a view of determining the class of beneficiaries, or that there was any other purpose except that the widow might retain the position of the liferentrix of the truster's heritable estate. The terms of the settlement shewed that the truster specially contemplated benefit to his immediate children rather than to his grandchildren.

At advising, on 25th February 1908,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The will in this case is a very simple one, with few complications. I am of opinion that its just construction is governed, so far as the provisions of one will can be said to govern another, by the case of Cairns' Trustees,¹ and that we should answer the first question by affirming its second alternative, i.e., by holding that the fee of the shares of the truster's estate vested in his children a morte testatoris, but

Trustees v.
Adam.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

The only material facts are that the testator, Mr Penny of Park in Aberdeenshire, died on 22d January 1902 possessed of a heritable estate worth nearly £20,000, which was almost all he had. He was survived by his widow, who is still alive, and by four sons and four daughters. To his widow he left the liferent of his whole estate. He also appointed her his sole trustee and executrix, giving her power to borrow money on the security of his estate, either for the purpose of setting up any of his children in business, or on their marriage, or for the purpose of paying estate-duty, or for the proper upholding of the buildings on the estate of Park, "all payments made to children being reckoned as part of their ultimate share when the same falls to be divided." With regard to the fee of his estate, after giving the liferent to his widow, he directed the same to be "realised and divided equally on her death among my children, share and share alike, the issue of predeceasing children taking among them the share which would have fallen to their parents if in life."

The eldest son, James Penny of Lochwood, died on 1st November 1905, having received a payment from his father's trust of £609, 17s. 9d. under the powers of the will for the purpose of setting him up in business. He was survived by a widow and three daughters, who are still in pupillarity. It is maintained for the tutors and curators of these pupil children that their father, James Penny of Lochwood, having died before the period of division of the truster's estate, viz., the death of the liferentrix, no share of the fee vested in him, but passed to them as conditional institutes. Their mother also urges a plea which has some similarity to that stated in Cairns' case,¹ viz., that she desires to know what her late husband was entitled to under his father's will in order that she may decide whether to claim her legal rights or not. The same principle which led us to sustain the competency of the special case in Cairns' case,¹ though the liferentrix was alive and no payments could take place till her death, should enable us, I think, to answer the second question. I should propose to answer it in the affirmative, simply because the testator has expressly said that "all payments made to children are to be reckoned as part of their ultimate share when the same falls to be divided." These words seem to me to include a prospective share, ultimately falling either to an immediate child of the truster or to those in his right.

With regard to the question of vesting, it all turns, just as it did in Cairns' case,¹ on the meaning to be attached to the words "the issue of predeceasing children taking among them the share which would have fallen to their parents if in life." Now, when the word "predecease" or "survivorship" occurs in a will, it plainly refers to some point of time—either death before the time, whatever it may be, or survivance after the time. I find that Lord Low in his opinion, at the top of page 124, deals with the words as in pari casu, for he speaks of "there being nothing in the context to take the case out of the general rule that provisions in regard to predecease or survivorship refer to the term of payment." And the effect of the whole judgment was to hold that, while it was impossible to limit Feb. 25, 1908 the words "any predeceasing child" to the event of the immediate child ^{Penny's} predeceasing the testator himself, it would be contrary to the current of ^{Trustees v. Adam.} recent decision to hold that vesting was absolutely suspended. Accordingly we all agreed with Lord Kyllachy in the view which he had expressed in ^{LdStormonth-Darling.} the case of Wylie's Trustees,¹ that "a contingency depending merely upon the existence or survivance of issue falls to be read as a resolute and not as a suspensive condition." But we did not decide there—and, as I understand, we do not decide here—that defeasance necessarily takes place on the child's issue merely surviving their parent (which has happened in the case of the three children of James Penny of Lochwood) irrespective of whether or not they also survive the liferentrix (which either may or may not happen). That question was expressly reserved by Lord Kyllachy in his opinion at page 122 of S. C. 1907, and it would hardly be proper that we should attempt to decide it ab ante, since it may never arise as a practical question. I think, therefore, that we should reserve it here.

For these reasons I am for answering the first and third branches of the first question in the negative, and the second branch of the first question in the affirmative. Further, I am for answering the second question (as amended) in the affirmative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

LORD LOW was absent.

Process—Jury Trial—New Trial—Reparation—Excessive Damages—Consent of Parties.—In an application for a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, the Court cannot refuse a new trial and itself assess the damages without obtaining the consent of both parties. ^{Boal v. Watt v. Watt, L. R., [1905] A. C. 115, followed.

(SEE S. C. 1907, p. 1120.)

Samuel Boal raised an action of damages against the Scottish Catholic Printing Company, Limited, for a slander contained in a newspaper of which the defenders were the proprietors. The case was tried before the Lord President and a jury on 23d December 1907, when the jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £250.

The defenders applied for a new trial on the ground that the damages awarded were excessive.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. President and a Jury

Feb. 27, 1908.

Boal v.
Scottish Catholic Printing Co.,
Limited.

The LORD PRESIDENT raised the question of the power of the Court, if they considered the damages excessive, to reduce them without granting a new trial, and referred to the case of *Watt v. Watt*¹. The cases of *Johnston v. Dilke*² and *Ritchie & Son v. Barton*³ were also cited as illustrating the practice of the Court.

In reply to the Lord President, counsel for the pursuer and the defenders both stated that they were willing to accept whatever decision as to the amount of damages might be pronounced by the Court in the cause.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The finding of the Court is that the verdict be reduced to £125, which will carry the expenses of the action with the exception of those connected with the motion for a new trial, as to which no expenses will be found due to or by either party. I think it right, for the guidance of the Bar and of the profession in general, to say a few words more, for this is the first case since the decision of the House of Lords in the case of *Watt v. Watt*¹ in which we have had an opportunity of stating the opinion of the Court in this matter. After the judgment in that case, it is no longer possible to follow the old practice by which, in cases where the Court thought that the amount of the damages found due by the jury was excessive, but that the verdict was otherwise justified, the Court were in the habit, without consulting the defender, of giving the pursuer the alternative of accepting the amount which they thought reasonable, or of facing a new trial. The case of *Watt*¹ seems to have laid down that the consent of the pursuer only is not enough, and that a verdict for a new amount can be pronounced by the Court only with the consent of both parties. Accordingly, in the present case we should not have done as we have done to-day, had we not previously obtained the consent of both parties.

I may add that, speaking as the Judge who presided at the trial, it is my opinion that, had a new trial been granted the pursuer would again have secured a verdict; for although I do not think that any malus animus was proved on the part of the writer of the article, still I think that the article associated the pursuer with a somewhat doubtful transaction, with which he had nothing to do, and that this had been taken advantage of to injure the pursuer in his profession. At the same time the damages found due by the jury were excessive—more than double the whole earnings of the pursuer for the year. Looking to the fact that his character has been completely cleared, we think that the sum which we have awarded is sufficient compensation.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. The judgment of the House of Lords in the case of *Watt*¹ is of course subject to the observation that it was pronounced in a case in England, where the conditions and rules relating to jury practice have been largely innovated by statute, while we have kept to the practice as it existed in the time of King George III., when jury trial in civil cases was introduced into this country. But in this case I cannot think that the differences between English and Scottish practice can prevent a decision of the House of Lords being binding on us in the Courts of Scotland. There may be cases where the defender might have good reason for refusing to consent to the assessment of damages by the Court. It might be that the verdict of the jury, in addition to being excessive in the amount of the damages awarded, was also unreasonable in the view taken of the evidence, though not so unreasonable as to warrant its being set aside as contrary to the evidence. In such a case the defender might be justified in saying,—“The verdict is so absurd that I prefer to have a new trial.” I may say that, if the point were open, my individual opinion would be in agreement with the judgment in the case of Watt.¹

Boal v. Scottish Catholic Printing Co., Limited.
Lord M'Laren.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. I am satisfied that the judgment of the House of Lords is binding upon us, because it proceeds upon principles which apply as much in this country as in England. I cannot doubt, after your Lordship's explanations, that the defenders in this case have exercised a wise discretion in agreeing to leave the assessment of damages to the Court, but I quite agree that we could not have compelled them to do so.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“The Lords (including the Lord President, who presided at the trial), having heard counsel for the parties, discharge the rule formerly granted, and refuse to grant a new trial: On the motion to apply the verdict of the jury, of consent of parties restrict the amount of damages assessed by the jury to the sum of £125; apply the verdict thus restricted, and in respect thereof decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £125, and decern: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses, except the expenses in connection with the motion for a new trial, as to which find no expenses due to or by either party: Remit,” &c.

Aberdeen
Master Masons'
Incorporation,
Limited, v.
Smith.

An action having been raised by the Incorporation against a member for payment of dues, the defender averred that the association, whose assets and liabilities were taken over by the pursuers, was a trade union, and that the pursuers were de facto acting as a trade union, and pleaded that the pursuers, being a trade union, were not validly registered as a company, and had no title to sue.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall) that as any act which would make the Incorporation a trade union would be null and void under the above quoted clauses of the memorandum of association, the Incorporation could not be a trade union, and plea of "no title to sue" repelled.

Company—Friendly Society—Incorporation of Masons—Membership—Qualifications—Objections to admission pleadable by company and not by member—Liability for dues.—At a meeting, on 8th July 1904, of the directors of the Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, S. was admitted as a member of the Incorporation. On account of his age and for other reasons, S. was, in accordance with the articles of association, ineligible for membership, but he accepted membership, and acted as a member till 20th March 1906, when he sent in a letter of resignation. On 4th June 1906 the Incorporation raised an action against S. for payment of dues incurred by him prior to the date of his resignation. S. pleaded that he never was a member of the Incorporation, and had consequently never incurred the dues.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Ardwall) that the defender was liable for the sum sued for on the ground that he was a member of the Incorporation, the objections to his admission being pleadable by the Company and by no one else; Lord Kinnear also holding that whether he was technically a member or not, he was bound by his agreement with the Incorporation.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Ardwall.

On 4th June 1906, the Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation, Limited, raised an action against Leslie Smith, master mason, Aberdeen, for payment of certain dues alleged to have become payable by him under the articles of association of the Incorporation, between 8th July 1904 and 20th March 1906, during which period he was said to have been a member of the Incorporation.

The action was defended on two grounds, (1) that the pursuers were a trade union, that their registration as a company was accordingly void, and that they had no title to sue; and (2) that the defender had never been a member of the Incorporation. Apart from these questions, the defender's liability for the sum sued for was not denied.

The parties, inter alia, averred as follows:—(Cond. 1) "The pursuers were incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900, on 15th October 1903, as a company limited by guarantee, and have their registered office in Aberdeen." (Ans. 1) "Admitted that the pursuers registered themselves under the Companies Acts. The pursuers are, however, a trades union in the sense of the Trade Union Acts, 1871 and 1876. By section 5 of the Trade Union Act of 1871 their registration is therefore void." (Cond. 2) "The objects for which the Incorporation was formed are set forth in the memorandum of association." * (Ans. 2) "The masters and men, and between masters and masters. The Incorporation is the successor of a trade union known as 'The Aberdeen Aberdeen the assets and liabilities' of said trade union or unincorporated association, which, under bye-laws agreed to by it and the United Operative Masons' and Granite Cutters' Union, imposed restrictive conditions on the conduct of the building trade in Aberdeen with regard, inter alia, to working hours, subcontracting, rate of wages, and employment of apprentices. Said bye-laws further provided that members of said Union should not work for employers who were not members of the Association, and that members of the Association should not employ operatives who were not members of the Union. In pursuance of the policy embodied in said bye-laws the pursuers entered into an agreement with said Union, whereby they regulate the employment of workmen and their wages. In particular, it is provided by said agreement that the operatives' Union should not, without consent of pursuers, allow any member of that Union to work for any master who is not a member of the pursuers' Association. The pursuers are thus a trade union." (Cond. 5) "The defender was admitted a member of the Incorporation on 8th July 1904, and he was duly furnished with a certificate of membership in terms of the rules. . . . The defender retained possession of said certificate, and he continued as a member until 20th March 1906, when he resigned his membership. . . ." (Ans. 5) "Admitted that defender in 1904 received a certificate in terms stated. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that defender was never eligible for membership. Reference is made to defender's statement of facts."

In his statement of facts the defender averred:—"The defender on 8th July 1904, when he is alleged to have been admitted a member, was sixty-eight years of age, or eighteen years beyond the prescribed age limit for admission to membership; he never made any formal application for membership, never was medically certified to the directors, nor proposed, seconded, or balloted for; he made no payment of entry-money, and accordingly could not, under the articles, be admitted, and was never legally admitted, a member of the Incorporation." *

 conducive to the attainment of the above objects, or any of them, provided that the Incorporation shall not impose on its members or support with its funds any regulation which, if an object of the Incorporation, would make it a trade union. . . . (25) To do all such other lawful things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects, or any of them."

It is unnecessary to refer in detail to the other objects, which were ostensibly to promote the study of the science of building and provide allowances to members and their widows, and which were not prima facie in restraint of trade.

Aberdeen
Master Masons'
Incorporation,
Limited, v.
Smith.

The following narrative of the facts regarding the defender's admission to the Incorporation, as disclosed in the averments of parties, is taken from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Ardwall):—

"The pursuers were incorporated on 15th October 1903 for the purpose, inter alia, of superseding and taking over the assets and liabilities of an unincorporated association known as the Aberdeen Master Masons' Association. The defender was an active member of this association, and apparently took a great interest in the arrangements that went on for adjusting the constitution of the incorporated association which it was proposed to form. This history is set forth in detail in answers 2 and 3 to the defender's Statement of Facts, but whether it is quite correct or not, it is certain that, owing to the defender's disapproval of some of the proposals for the formation of the new association, he declined to join the pursuers' incorporation at the date of its being incorporated on 15th October 1903. It seems, however, that afterwards he became desirous of joining the incorporation, and at a meeting of the pursuers' directors, on 8th July 1904, he was, in accordance with his own desire, formally admitted a member of the incorporation on the same terms as if he had been a person whose name had been mentioned in Article 42 of the articles of association. These persons were held to be the first members of the incorporation, and were, as the defender was, members of the former unincorporated association already referred to. All those persons were admitted as original members, without payment of entry-money and under exemption from the conditions applicable to new members under Article 44. It must be assumed that at, or at all events immediately after, his admission, the defender was aware of this, and in law he must be presumed to have been acquainted with the articles and memorandum of association on becoming a member of the incorporation. He never, however, attempted to get rid of his obligations, nor did he forego his privileges as a member; on the contrary, he took an active part in the business of the incorporation, was elected and acted as a director, and in every way conducted himself as a member till 20th March 1906, when he wrote a letter in these terms,—'I hereby resign membership of the Aberdeen Master Masons' Incorporation as at this date.'"

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender, having been a member of the pursuers' Incorporation during the period condescended on, decree ought to be pronounced against him, in terms of the conclusions of the summons. (7) The defender, having agreed to become a member of the pursuers' Incorporation on the footing that the conditions contained in article 44 of the articles of association were waived

The above-named members . . . shall be entitled to all benefits of the Incorporation, including right to participate in the funds of the Incorporation, as hereinafter provided, without payment of entry-money. . . .
"44. The directors shall have the power of admitting new members of good character, not exceeding fifty years of age, such members being proposed by one of the directors and seconded by another, and thereafter balloted for. No new member . . . shall be admitted unless, at the date of his being proposed, his life be certified by a duly qualified medical man as a good average insurable life. Every new member . . . shall, upon his admission, pay £50 of entry-money to the secretary and treasurer of the Incorporation."

in his favour, is barred personali exceptione from maintaining that his admission was ultra vires. Feb. 27, 1908.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuers, being a trade union, are not validly registered, and have no title to sue. (4) The defender never having been eligible for admission to membership under pursuers' articles of association, his alleged admission was ultra vires of the incorporation and the directors. (5) The defender, never having become a member of the incorporation, is entitled to absolvitor.

The case was heard before Lord Ardwall, Ordinary, who, on 2d February 1907 repelled the defences, and continued the cause.*

Aberdeen

Masons'
Incorporation,
Limited, v.
Smith.

* "OPINION.—This is an action brought against the defender, who is alleged to be a member of the pursuers' Incorporation, and it is practically an action of accounting, with the view of determining what sum is due by him as a contribution to the funds of the Incorporation, and the defender resists the action mainly on three grounds.

"(First) That the Incorporation is a trade union, and that accordingly, in terms of the Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 31), sec. 5, and the Trade Union Amendment Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. cap. 22), sec. 16, the registration of the pursuers under the Companies Acts is void, and that therefore they have no title to sue, as was decided in the case of the Edinburgh and District Aerated Water Manufacturers Defence Association v. Jenkinson, 5 F. 1159. I am of opinion that this argument is ill founded. This question, I think, must be judged of by the constituting documents of the company. Now, by article 13 of the memorandum of association, No. 18 of process, the purposes of incorporation are set forth as follows:—

"'To establish, subsidise, promote, co-operate with, receive into union, become a member of, act as or appoint trustees, agents, or delegates to control, manage, superintend, lend monetary assistance to or otherwise assist any association and institutions, incorporated or not incorporated, with objects altogether or in part similar to those of the trade, and not being a trades union.' Further, by article 22 of the said memorandum, it is provided that the following shall be among the objects for which the Incorporation is founded:—'To do all such other lawful things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects, or any of them, provided that the Incorporation shall not impose on its members, or support with its funds, any regulation which, if an object of the Incorporation, would make it a trade union.'

"In face of these provisions, it seems to me that it is vain to argue that this is a combination 'for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or between workmen and workmen, or between masters and masters, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business,' because, if the directors or members of the Incorporation were to make any regulation, or perform any act which would make the Incorporation a trade union, such act would be wholly void and null under the above recited clause of the memorandum of association.

"(Second) The defender maintains that, even assuming the Incorporation to be a properly constituted company, the defender never was a member of it, and never could lawfully become so in respect of the provisions of article 44 of the pursuers' articles of association, which are to the effect that the directors have only power to admit as members persons not exceeding fifty years of age, and that only on their lives being certified by a duly qualified medical man as good average insurable lives. Now, it is admitted that at the date when the defender was admitted a member of the Incorporation he possessed neither of these qualifications, being at the date of his alleged admission sixty-eight years of age, and never having been medically certified. The important facts regarding the defender's admission to the society, and his subsequent conduct as a member, are as follows:—(His

The case was argued before the First Division on 22d January 1908.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The articles of association shewed that the Incorporation was a trade union. Its primary object was to take over the assets and liabilities of the Aberdeen Master Masons' Association, which was a trade union. In any event, in spite of its ostensibly innocent objects, the Incorporation was acting as a trade union, and the defender was entitled to a proof of his averments to that effect.¹ Being a trade union, it was not validly registered under the Companies Acts, and had no title to sue.² (2) The admission of the defender to the Incorporation was ultra vires of the directors, and he never was a member.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) There was nothing in the constituting documents of the Incorporation to shew that they were a trade union, and any acts which would make them a trade union would be ultra vires and not the acts of the Incorporation. (2) The admission of the defender was ratified at a general meeting of the company, and was quite regular; and in any event, the objections alleged were not statable by him, especially in view of the fact that he had acted as a member for two years.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and really have nothing to add to what his Lordship says. It seems to me that, first of all, looking at the constituting documents of the association it is impossible to find that this is a trades union. Secondly, as regards the other question of liability, it seems to me that the only objections to receiving the defender as a member of the association were objections which were pleadable by the company and by no one else, and that he cannot take advantage of them on his own behalf. In other words, I think this class of question has been decided again and again in liquidation cases, and if the matter had been tested by the company being wound up, there is no doubt Lordship's narrative is quoted supra)—But it is said that it was ultra vires of the directors to admit the defender as a member, and that no actings of his can make him one. I do not agree with this view. If the defender's admission as a member was contrary to the constitution of the Incorporation, it was only so because it was contrary to the articles of association, and not to the memorandum. It was in the power of the Incorporation to alter the articles of association, or to homologate anything done in violation of them, and this they did by resolution of 29th October 1906. But the point is, in my view, a simple one. The defender's agreement to become a member was a contract between him and the Incorporation, and he is barred by his actings from resiling from that agreement, and the Incorporation having all along impliedly, and afterwards expressly, homologated that agreement, it therefore must be held to be valid. . . ."

whatsoever in my mind that this gentleman would have been put upon the list as a contributor. That really ends the matter, because whether there could or could not have been a question as to whether he could get out of the company by the simple act of resignation, that question is not raised in this proceeding, as the sum for which he is sued is a sum entirely due before the date of his resignation. Stagg & Robson,
Limited, v.
Stirling.

By a written agreement two parties stipulated that payment of certain goods, sold but not delivered, should be made by bills, which were to be guaranteed. Certain of the bills not having been met, the holders raised an action against the guarantors for payment of the balance. In defence a verbal agreement between the parties was alleged to the effect that the bills were to be renewed at maturity if the goods had not been delivered, and it was averred that delivery of all the goods had not been accepted.

The pursuers having reclaimed, held (rev. the judgment) that the defence was irrelevant, in respect that the bills were granted in implement of the written agreement, and that the terms of this agreement could not be modified by parole evidence.

IN January 1907 Stagg & Robson, Limited, van and wagon makers, Selby, Yorkshire, raised an action against Scott, Stirling, & Company, Limited, carriage builders at Hamilton and Twickenham, for payment of the price of certain carriage bodies which had been sold by the former to the latter, but had not been delivered. On 16th May 1907 the action was taken out of Court on terms which were embodied in the following document, which was regularly signed before witnesses on behalf of each of the parties:—

"By £250 cash forthwith.
£500 bill at one month.
£500 bill at three months.
£500 bill at four months.
£500 bill at five months.

"Scott, Stirling, & Co., Ltd., to pay the usual bank rate discount, and each of the bills are to be guaranteed personally, jointly, and severally by James Scott of Burnbank, Carluke, N.B., John Stirling of Twickenham, and Laurence Miles of Twickenham.

"On payment of the £250 cash three of the bodies are to be delivered; the remainder of the bodies undelivered are to be delivered, if required, to Scott, Stirling, & Co., Ltd., when the first bill for £500 is met."

On 27th July 1907 John Stirling, Laurence Miles, and James Scott signed a guarantee for payment of the bills, in accordance with the agreement.

On 30th September 1907 Stagg & Robson raised the present action against the guarantors for payment of the contents of the bills as far as the same had not been met.

In defence the defenders stated :—(Stat. 2) "On or about 16th May 1907 an arrangement was come to between the defender John Stirling, on behalf of the said Scott, Stirling & Company, and the pursuers' managing director, Mr Stagg, on behalf of the pursuers, in pursuance of which the said action was taken out of Court. It was agreed that the said Scott, Stirling, & Company should pay the sum of £250 to the pursuers. It was also agreed that the said Scott, Stirling, & Company should accept and pay for said goods as they required them in the ordinary course of business. It was further agreed that the said Scott, Stirling, & Company should grant four bills for £500 each in favour of the pursuers at one month, three months, four months, and five months respectively. It was agreed that the said bills should be renewed at maturity in the event of the said Scott, Stirling, & Company not having taken delivery of goods to the amount of the cash paid by them and of the bills which had fallen due. It was on the faith of this agreement that the defenders granted the guarantee." (Stat. 3) "The said Scott, Stirling, & Company duly paid the sum of £250 to the pursuers, and on 17th May 1907 they granted the said bills. The said bills thus matured on 20th June, 20th August, 20th September, and 20th October 1907 respectively." (Stat. 4) "The said Scott, Stirling, & Company duly paid to the pursuers the sum of £500 contained in the bill which fell due on the 20th June 1907. They have also paid the sum of £100 in respect of the bill which fell due on 20th August 1907. In terms of the agreement of 17th May 1907, the said Scott, Stirling, & Company have accepted delivery of certain of said goods. The said payments of £250, £500, and £100 are more than sufficient to cover the price of all goods of which the said Scott, Stirling, & Company have accepted delivery from the pursuers. In terms of the agreement of 17th May 1907 the pursuers are bound to renew the said bill which fell due on 20th August 1907 to the extent of £400, and to renew the bills which fell due on 20th September and 20th October 1907 to their full amount. They are not entitled to demand payment of the said sums of £400 and £500 Feb. 28, 1908. and £500 from the said Scott, Stirling, & Company, and in refusing to pay said sums the said Scott, Stirling, & Company have not failed to fulfil their obligations under said bills. The said Scott, Stirling, & Company have paid all sums which are due by them to the pursuers under said bills, and the defenders are not liable to pay any sums to the pursuers under said guarantee." Stagg & Robson, Limited, v. Stirling.

The pursuers denied that there was any agreement as to the renewal of the bills.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having under the guarantee condoned on undertaken liability to the pursuers for the due payment by Scott, Stirling, & Company of the amounts sued for, and the said Scott, Stirling, & Company having failed to pay the same, the pursuers are entitled to decree against them as concluded for. (2) The defences are irrelevant, and should be repelled.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The pursuers being bound to renew said bills, are not entitled to decree for the sums sued for.

On 22d November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) allowed a proof before answer.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The defenders moved for a proof of their averments. They claimed that they are entitled to prove by parole evidence the verbal terms of agreement which they allege, in virtue of section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 61). That section provides that 'in any judicial proceedings in Scotland any fact relating to a bill of exchange . . . which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence.' Now, this action is a 'judicial proceeding in Scotland,' and the facts which the defenders allege appear prima facie to be quite relevant to the question of their liability under the bills mentioned in the summons. I may refer to two recent decisions as illustrating the wide scope and effect which section 100 has been held to possess. The first of these (Drybrough & Company, Limited, 1903, 5 F. 665) has features strongly resembling the present case. The defender there was allowed parole proof of an alleged verbal agreement to the effect that the bill on which he was being sued would be renewed from time to time by the pursuers, subject to certain conditions which the defender said he had fulfilled. This decision was approved and followed in Viani & Company, 1904, 6 F. 989, where the defender was allowed a proof that the pursuer (indorsee and holder of the bill) had verbally agreed that if the bill was in his hands at maturity he would not call upon the defender (the acceptor) to retire it. At the discussion in the Procedure-roll, I heard a forcible argument by the pursuers' counsel to the effect that, while he fully accepted the authority of the decisions, the proof sought by the defenders should not be allowed, because the language of the written 'Heads of Settlement' is unambiguous, and absolutely inconsistent with the terms of agreement which the defenders allege to have been verbally adjected; that the defenders' averments, therefore, were in face of the written agreement, palpably irrelevant, and that nothing in the Bills of Exchange Act warranted an attempt to contradict by parole proof the written agreement of parties as evidenced not by the bills themselves but by the 'Heads of Settlement.' I do not think these contentions are sound. I do not consider that the language of the 'Heads of Settlement' is such as necessarily to exclude or negative the defenders' statement of the agreement as a whole. It certainly seems singular, if the latter is true, that no allusion to renewal is made either in the 'Heads' themselves or in the separate guarantee which was granted in pursuance thereof. But the idea of renewal is not expressly negatived, and the fourth paragraph of the 'Heads of Settlement' seems to

Feb. 28, 1908.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Stagg &
Robson,
Limited, v.
Stirling.

The case was argued before the First Division on 29th January 1908.

Argued for the reclaimers;—There was no room here for the application of section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.¹ The defence put forward was not “relevant to any question of liability” on the bills, but was an attempt to vary by parole evidence the agreement contained in the Heads of Settlement, in implement of which the bills were granted. That agreement was in writing, and its terms were unambiguous and final, and could not be altered by parole evidence.

Argued for the respondents;—Under section 100 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882,¹ it was always competent for the granter of a bill to prove a parole agreement contradicting his liability on the face of the bill.² In the present case the agreement was partly written and partly verbal, and the defenders were entitled to prove it by parole evidence so far as that was necessary for their case. As guarantors of the bills, the defenders were entitled to plead any defence which would have been competent in an action against the granters.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof, and it is against that interlocutor that the reclaiming note has been taken. The pursuers had raised an action against the defenders for the price of goods supplied, and that action was settled upon terms which were embodied in a written document, regularly signed before witnesses, and called “Heads of Settlement.” These heads of settlement settled that the action in the Scottish Courts was “to be withdrawn on the following terms,” and then it was provided that Scott, Stirling, & Company were to pay Stagg & Robson, Limited, the pursuers, the sum of £2250 in the following manner:—£250 in cash, £500 by bill at one month, and three other bills for a like sum of £500 at three, four, and five months respectively. Then there was a further stipulation that the bills were to be guaranteed personally, jointly and severally, by three persons mentioned, and after that there were certain stipulations as to the time within which the goods were to be delivered. Now, the square in some measure with the defenders’ averment about taking delivery of the goods only as they required them. It is also to be observed that the written agreement does not provide that the pursuers are to receive certain payments at stipulated times, and that bills are to be granted for these, but only that the defender shall ‘pay’ the pursuers ‘in the following manner,’ viz., by a payment in cash (which was duly made), and granting four bills at such and such dates (which were duly granted). It seems, therefore, that the pursuers’ action must rest, not on the ‘Heads of Settlement,’ but on the bills themselves, and it is in fact so laid. Upon the whole matter, I think I must allow a proof before answer, the defenders to lead.”

bills as they became due were not all honoured. The first was paid, but Feb. 28, 1908. the second only partly, and the others not at all, and the present action is raised to recover the amount. The Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof of an averment which really comes to this, that there was a verbal agreement at the same time that these bills should be renewed when they fell due, and he has felt himself bound to do that because of the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, which provides that "in any judicial proceedings in Scotland any fact relating to a bill of exchange, which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence." I am bound to say that I do not think that that provision of the statute has any application to the matter in hand. It does not mean that there is a sort of magic in the word "bill," and that the moment you allege anything with regard to a bill you at once upset the whole law of evidence. The meaning of the provision, I think, was clear enough to allow you to prove by parole, what the rules of law might not allow to be proved by parole, namely, the true relations to each other of the parties upon the bill; that is to say, that the indebtedness which, prima facie on the bill, is upon the acceptor, might be shewn to be not really upon the acceptor; or, in other words, that the true position of the names on the bill might be proved. But I do not think that that section has anything to do with the general rule of law, which is that you cannot alter a written agreement by parole evidence. The result, I think, would be almost fantastic, because the provision in the agreement that these bills were to be guaranteed by certain persons would be practically swept out of existence. They would only, of course, be bound to guarantee the particular bills which are there mentioned, and if these bills were renewed and represented by other bills, then the guarantee would fly off. I am therefore of opinion that there is no relevant defence to the action, and that decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Ld. President.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is settled that the time-honoured defence that a bill was merely a matter of form and was not intended to impose liability on anyone, is not admissible under the Bills of Exchange Act any more than it was at common law. In one of the first cases that came before this Court under the Bills of Exchange Act (The National Bank of Australasia v. Turnbull & Company,¹) we found that there was no relevant allegation of any contract of which the bills formed a term, but only a general statement that the acceptor was not intended to be liable, and it was held that the Legislature could not have intended that the question whether a bill was an obligatory document or not was to be tried upon parole evidence. In the present case the allegation is not very different. It is in substance that there was an express or implied obligation to renew the bills when they fell due. Now, my opinion is, that wherever it can be shewn that a bill is one ingredient of a contract, then you are entitled to prove the contract, and it may be that under some condition of the contract the bill is not enforceable. Again, as a bill is in form a unilateral document although it is always stated to be for value received, any question relative

Feb. 28, 1908. to the consideration of the bill may under the statute be proved by parole evidence, and we have examples in our practice at common law of allowing a proof on a question of no value, although that was not invariably done, and in fact was only done in exceptional cases. But what makes it clear in the present case that the defence is impossible is this, that the drawer of the bill stipulated that he should have the personal guarantee, jointly and severally, of the directors of the Company for payment of the bill, and there is no stipulation that that guarantee should be renewed or made applicable to any substituted bill that might afterwards be granted. Now, can anything be more absurd than to suppose that while stipulating for a personal guarantee for the payment of these bills, it was at the same time agreed that the bills should be renewable and that the guarantee should then cease to be binding? It is evident here that the guarantee would be altogether futile if this defence could be received, and if proof were admissible to shew that the bills were renewable. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The old rule of our law, which has been displaced by the 100th section of the Bills of Exchange Act, created a presumption of onerosity so strong that, although it might be contradicted, it was not allowed to be disproved except by the writ of the party seeking to enforce liability on the bill, or else by a reference to his deposition on oath. That rule was supposed to be supported by favour to trade, but in comparatively recent times it was seen that it might operate very unjustly, and yet the rule was so well settled that the Court could not disregard it. Now, I apprehend that the main purpose of the section in question was to remedy that injustice, but I think it is extremely probable that the language of the clause went somewhat beyond what was required to remedy the particular mischief to which I have referred, and it may be that it would allow parole evidence being admitted with reference to other questions of liability than those which depend on mere presumption of onerosity. However that may be, I am certainly of opinion that it can only apply to cases where the alleged liability is rested exclusively upon a bill and not upon a bill as the mere method of carrying into effect a written contract. Now, in the present case the bills were granted for the purpose of working out a contract which is expressed in writing, and the terms upon which the bills were to be drawn and accepted are not therefore to be gathered from the mere terms of the bill itself, but from the agreement which was carried into execution by their being accepted. I think it is contrary to perfectly well-settled rules of evidence to allow the terms of that agreement to be altered or enlarged by parole evidence, and I therefore agree with your Lordships that there is no relevant case to be sent to proof.

Process—Res Judicata—Competent and Omitted—Expenses—Decree for Expenses in name of Agent-disburser—Objections not stated timely.—Rennie v. James.
A party to an action in the Sheriff Court who had allowed the agent of his opponent to obtain decree for expenses in his own name, held (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) to be barred by the exception of competent and omitted from suspending a charge on the allegation (1) that the agent had not, at the time when the motion for expenses was made, paid his dues as law-agent, and (2) that de facto he was not the agent-disburser.

Ewing v. Wallace, Aug. 13, 1832, 6 W. & S. 222, followed.

IN July 1905 Robert Aitken Rennie, writer, Glasgow, raised an action of declarator and removing in the Sheriff Court at Dunoon against E. S. Duncan, Glasgow, who instructed his agents, M'Ilwraiths & Steel, solicitors, Greenock, to defend the same. The defence was conducted by William James, writer, who was in the employment of M'Ilwraiths & Steel, as their procurator. The action was ultimately decided in favour of the defender, and the pursuer was found liable in expenses. An account of the defender's expenses was lodged and taxed by the Auditor, and by interlocutor of 19th July 1906, which bore that parties had been heard " . . . on the motion for the defender to allow the decree for expenses to go out and be extracted in name of Mr William James, solicitor, Greenock, the agent-disburser thereof," the Sheriff-substitute (Penney) made avizandum, and on 21st July he granted decree against the pursuer for the taxed amount, and allowed the decree "to go out in name of the defender's agent (Mr James) as agent-disburser." No objections were stated at the time by the pursuer to the Sheriff.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

Thereafter Mr James extracted the decree, and charged Mr Rennie to make payment to him of the sums contained therein. A note was then presented by Mr Rennie against Mr James praying the Court to suspend the charge.

The nature of the complainer's averments sufficiently appears from his pleas.

The complainer pleaded;—2. The said pretended decree is incompetent and ultra vires of the Sheriff-substitute, and the charge following thereon is inept, in respect—(1) That there was no motion made to the Sheriff asking for decree in name of the respondent as agent-disburser; (4) that the respondent was not agent-disburser in the said action; (5) that the respondent was not at the time the said motion was made entitled under the Law-Agents Act, 1873, and the Stamp Act, 1891, to act as agent in the cause or to recover costs therein.

The respondent pleaded that the first ground of suspension stated by the complainer was unfounded in fact, and that he was barred by the exception of competent and omitted from pleading the other grounds of suspension above stated.

A proof was taken, into the details of which it is unnecessary to enter. It was held on the evidence that the complainer had failed to prove that no motion was made to the Sheriff asking for decree in name of the respondent as agent-disburser.

Feb. 28, 1908. On 1st June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) repelled the reasons of suspension and refused the prayer of the note.*

Rennie v.
James.

The complainer reclaimed.

The case was argued before the First Division on 31st January 1908.

Argued for the complainer;—The Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in giving decree in name of the agent-disburser, for no motion to that effect had ever, in point of fact, been made before him. In any event, the party in whose name the decree had gone out was not the agent-disburser, he was only the procurator in the employment of the agents by whom the disbursements were made, and who alone were entitled to the benefit of the decree.¹ The Act of Sederunt, 10th July 1839, which by section 106 empowered the Sheriff to grant decree in the name of "the procurator who conducted the suit," applied only to the agents acting on behalf of the party. Further, the respondent had not paid the law-agent's duty imposed by the Stamp Act,² and was not entitled to sue for his fees. The plea of competent and omitted was not pleadable in an appeal against the decree of an inferior Court.

Argued for the respondent;—The interlocutor of the Sheriff bore that a motion had been duly made for expenses in the name of the agent-disburser, and the complainer had failed to prove the contrary. As to the other grounds of suspension, the complainer was barred from pleading them by the exception of competent and omitted.³ They had not been stated before the Sheriff—as they might have been—and they could not be stated now. The complainer should have appealed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff. In any event the objections were not well founded. In a question of this kind stamp-duty was not exigible,⁴ and if it were, the respondent

* "OPINION.— . . . I have left to the end two points which were strongly urged on behalf of the complainer. The first is that Mr James was not 'the procurator who conducted the suit' within the meaning of section 106 of the Act of Sederunt of 1839. It was maintained that the 'procurator who conducted the suit' meant the same thing as the agent-disburser, and that it was Mr Walker [the sole partner of M'Ilwraiths & Steel], and not Mr James, who disbursed all the expenses in connection with the case. The second point is contained in the amendment to statement 9, viz., that the respondent is not, and was not at the time he obtained the decree, a certificated enrolled law-agent, or at least that he had not paid the duties for the period then current entitling him to act as a law-agent; and that accordingly he was not entitled under the Law-Agents Act, 1873, and the Stamp Act, 1891, to act as agent in the cause or to recover costs therein. I do not consider it necessary to express an opinion upon the merits of either of these pleas. I consider that the complainer is barred by the exception of competent and omitted from maintaining either of them as a reason for the present suspension. The decision in the case of Ewing v. Wallace, 6 W. & S. 222, seems to me a sufficient authority to cover both pleas.

"I am accordingly of opinion that the reasons for suspension should be repelled and the note refused, with expenses."

At advising,—

Rennie v.
James.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case where a gentleman being in possession of a decree, proceeds to make it good by charging, and this is a suspension of the charge on that decree. Now, I need scarcely say that a decree cannot be opened up unless there is something clearly wrong about it. What is said to be wrong with this decree is this: It is a decree which was issued for a sum of expenses in the name of an agent-disburser. The party against whom the decree is sought to be enforced says that the decree is truly a mistake, because no motion was ever properly made in the case to allow the decree to go out in the name of the agent-disburser; and then he says it is bad for two other reasons—(firstly) that the gentleman who holds it was not, in fact, the agent-disburser; and (secondly) that he could not enforce it because he had not paid certain stamp-duties which he ought to have paid in order to have a licence to practise as an agent. I do not say that it would be impossible to suspend a decree upon averments that it had never been moved for, and that no decree had ever been in truth pronounced. If you could suppose a case where it could be clearly proved that the Judge had never really pronounced any decree at all, and that the so-called decree was what might be called a figment of the clerk's imagination, and not authorised by any pronouncement of the Judge, I think in such a case the decree could be suspended. But certainly, if ever there is a case where the maxim omnia præsumuntur rite et solenniter acta esse should apply, the proceedings of a Court of law supply such a case, and it would require, to my mind, the most clear evidence to allow your Lordships to set aside a decree on such grounds. I do not propose to go through the evidence in detail, but I say without any hesitation that so far from it being clear that the motion for expenses was not made, there is, on the contrary, a great deal of evidence to the opposite effect. The complainer may be in good faith in saying that he did not hear the motion made, but that does not shew that a motion was not made; and at anyrate I think it is quite enough for the purposes of this case to hold, as the Lord Ordinary has held after proof, that the complainer has failed to prove his case. So much for the first objection.

As regards the other two points, it seems to me that the objection comes too late. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the case of Ewing v. Wallace,¹ really covers both points here. It directly covers the point about the gentleman not having paid his proper dues. I think it covers the other point pari ratione. It was quite apparent when this decree was pronounced that the person who was asking for it as agent-disburser was the procurator who had conducted the case, as he was the only person who had been in Court. Well, we are told, and I will assume truly, that that procurator, although he conducted the case, really only conducted it as the hand of another agent and was not a licensed procurator, and we are told that the actual disbursements came out of the pocket of this other gentleman, and not out of that

Feb. 28, 1908. of the procurator. That is as it may be; but I am quite sure that if the objection was to be taken that the man who was conducting the case was not the agent-disburser, that is an objection which ought to have been taken at once, and it is far too late to take it afterwards by way of suspension. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has decided the matter rightly, and that we should adhere to his judgment.

Right in Security—Disposition ex facie absolute to Bondholder—Unrecorded back-letter—Extinction—Confusio.—The holder of a bond and disposition in security obtained from the debtor, in security of an additional loan, a disposition ex facie absolute which was recorded, and granted a back-letter which was not recorded. In a question between the bondholder and the holder of a postponed bond granted prior to the ex facie absolute disposition, held that the radical right remaining with the granter prevented the first bond from being extinguished confusione when the absolute disposition was granted.

Ground-annual — Extinction — Confusio.—Opinion, per Lord Guthrie, Ordinary, that a ground-annual may be extinguished confusione.

2D DIVISION. BY feu-disposition, dated 11th, and recorded 13th December 1901, Lord Guthrie. James Aitken, writer, Glasgow, proprietor of certain subjects in Bell Street, Airdrie, having divided the subjects into six plots for building purposes, disposed plot 1 to Robert Riddagh, builder, Airdrie, under burden of the feu-duty of £2, 5s. 4d.

Thereafter, by five contracts of ground-annual, dated and recorded in 1901 and 1902, Aitken disposed to Riddagh the five remaining plots under burden of ground-annuals amounting in all to £22, 10s.

Upon acquiring the property of these plots Riddagh proceeded to raise money on the security thereof, and, inter alia, granted two bonds and dispositions in security for £350 each dated 11th, and recorded 13th June 1902, in favour of Aitken over plots 3 and 4 respectively.

By bond and disposition in security dated 14th, and recorded 17th March 1903, Riddagh disposed the six plots of ground to Mr and Mrs King, 5 Burnbank Road, Hamilton, in security of the sum of £1070.

Thereafter, by disposition ex facie absolute, dated 8th, and recorded 9th May 1903, Riddagh disposed the six plots to Aitken; and Aitken granted a back-letter in which he acknowledged that he held the subjects in security of advances made and to be made by him to Riddagh and bound himself to reconvey on repayment of said advances. Feb. 28, 1908.

The back-letter was not recorded.

By assignation, dated 1st and recorded 3d October 1904, Aitken King v.
Johnston. assigned to Readman the two bonds above mentioned for £350 each over plots 3 and 4 respectively, and by assignation, dated 9th and recorded 15th November 1905, Readman assigned these bonds to the Rev. William Johnston, minister of Uphall, and Mrs Eliza Arbuckle or Johnston, his wife.

In March 1907 Mr and Mrs King, the creditors in the bond for £1070, dated and recorded in March 1903, brought an action against, inter alios, Mr and Mrs Johnston, the assignees to the two bonds for £350 each dated and recorded in June 1902, and also against Robert A. M. Reid, the trustee on Aitken's sequestrated estates, who was in right of the five ground-annuals constituted over plots 2 to 6.

The summons concluded for declarator (1) that the real burdens of £350 each, created by the two bonds and dispositions in security for £350 each, dated 11th and recorded 13th June 1902, over the subjects therein specified, were both and each as of 9th May 1903 extinguished, and that the said subjects were not affected by any assignations of said two bonds, granted subsequent to 9th May 1903, and that the bond and disposition in security, in favour of the pursuers for £1070, dated 14th and recorded 17th March 1903, created a real burden over the said subjects preferable to the real burden created by said two bonds; and for declarator (2) that the five ground-annuals created by the five contracts of ground-annual, dated and recorded on various dates in 1901 and 1902, were so far as real burdens on the subjects therein contained extinguished as at 9th May 1903.

The pursuers averred:—(Cond. 5) “By disposition, dated the 8th, and recorded 9th May 1903, the said Robert Riddagh disposed to the said James Aitken the said six plots of ground. On said last-mentioned date the said James Aitken was, as shewn by the record (1) the holder of said five ground-annuals . . . ; (2) the creditor in the two bonds granted in his favour over plots 3 and 4, as above mentioned, and holder and in right of the security thereby created; and (3) the owner of said six plots of ground. . . . The said disposition of date 8th May 1903 had ipso jure the effect . . . of extinguishing the real burden created in his favour by said two bonds and dispositions in security, and of making the pursuers' said bond and disposition in security a first charge on the subjects thus unburdened. Further, the said last-mentioned disposition in favour of James Aitken had the effect . . . of extinguishing, as at its date, the said five ground-annuals, . . . and thereby increasing the value of the security subjects contained in the pursuers' said bond and disposition in security.”

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The real burden for the two sums of £350 constituted by the two bonds and dispositions in security first set forth in the summons having been ipso jure extinguished confusione, decree of declarator should be pronounced as first concluded for. (3) The five ground-annuals set forth in the summons having to the extent foresaid been ipso jure extinguished confusione, decree of declarator should be pronounced as second concluded for.

The defenders Mr and Mrs Johnston pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The

Feb. 28, 1908. bonds and dispositions in security, now held by these defenders not having been extinguished, the decree of declarator sought in respect of them should be refused.

King v.
Johnston.

The defender Reid pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The five ground-annuals libelled in the summons not having been to any extent extinguished, the decree of declarator sought in respect of them should be refused.

On 30th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—“(1) With respect to the two bonds for £350 each mentioned in the summons, finds that the said bonds did not become extinguished confusione in the person of James Aitken on the subjects and others embraced in said bonds being conveyed to him in absolute terms by Robert Riddagh, the disposition thereof being qualified by back-letters to the effect that the said James Aitken held the subjects merely in security of advances: Therefore finds that the pursuers’ bond for £1070 is not a preferable security over the subjects contained in the foresaid two bonds for £350 each, and assoilzies the defenders the Reverend William Johnston and Mrs Eliza Arbuckle or Johnston, his wife, from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns; . . . (2) With respect to the five ground-annuals mentioned in the summons, finds that the same were similarly not extinguished confusione in the person of the said James Aitken on his acquisition in absolute terms of the subjects over which these ground-annuals were created: Quoad ultra allows” a proof on a branch of the case not now reported.*

* “OPINION.—The pursuers are heritable creditors for £1070 over certain subjects in Airdrie. If these subjects are burdened by the two bonds and the ground-annuals mentioned in the summons, the pursuers’ bond, looking to the value of the subjects, is believed to be valueless. The pursuers seek declarator that the defenders’ bonds and ground-annuals were extinguished confusione.

“The pursuers’ bond for £1070 is dated 17th March 1903. At that date Robert Riddagh was proprietor of the subjects, and the bond was granted by him.

“Prior to 17th March 1903 the bonds for £350 were granted by Riddagh in favour of James Aitken. Subsequently to 17th March 1903, namely, on 9th May 1903, Aitken acquired the subjects over which both sets of bonds were placed in security by an ex facie absolute disposition under back-letters. The pursuers say that the £350 bonds were extinguished confusione in Aitken’s person on 9th May 1903. These bonds were assigned between 1904 and 1906 to Mr George Readman, who assigned them to the defenders Mr and Mrs Johnston.

“The ground-annuals mentioned in the summons were created for Aitken by Riddagh in 1901 and 1902. The pursuers say that they were also extinguished confusione in Aitken’s person when he acquired the subjects, although only in security, on 9th May 1903. These ground-annuals are held by the defender Aitken’s trustee. . . .

“The defenders deny confusion, because—(1) Aitken did not acquire the subjects on 9th May 1903 as absolute proprietor, but as a trustee for Riddagh; (2) so far as the ground-annuals are concerned, because ground-annuals cannot, like bonds, be extinguished confusione. . . .

“I. The pursuers admit that if, as in a question with them, the back-letters must be recognised, then their case fails. To operate confusion, one and the same person must become both debtor and creditor. But if the back-letters receive effect, while Aitken, at the date of the conveyance, was absolute creditor under the bonds, he did not become absolute debtor under the bonds in respect of the conveyance, but only trustee for the debtor.

The pursuers reclaimed, and at the hearing intimated that they brought under review the first portion only of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Feb. 28, 1908.
King v.
Johnston.

Argued for the pursuers;—If the disposition of 9th May 1903 had been in fact as well as in form absolute and irredeemable, the two bonds and dispositions in security would have been extinguished confusione as at that date, for Aitken in the case supposed would have come to be both creditor and debtor in the bonds.¹ Where a recorded disposition was ex facie absolute, although qualified by a back-letter, the ex facie absolute donee was feudal proprietor of the subjects if the back-letter was unrecorded, at all events, quoad any person in ignorance of the existence of the back-letter.² Ex facie of the records, therefore, Aitken was both debtor and creditor in the bonds, which consequently were extinguished confusione. The pursuers were entitled to rely on the records; the intention of the parties was immaterial.³ [LORD ARDWALL referred to Mackenzie v. Gordon.⁴] In that case the person who pleaded confusio had private knowledge of the real facts, and therefore the records did not avail him.⁵ Further, in *Mackenzie v. Gordon*⁴ a trustee was interposed.

Argued for the defenders;—In order that confusio might operate, the same person must be absolute creditor and absolute debtor in the

That this was in fact his position is admitted. If so, it does not matter whether the back-letters were recorded or not. The pursuers' rights were fixed on 17th March 1903. At that date the bonds for £350 each and the ground-annuals existed as prior rights, coming before the pursuers' security. . . . It must be held to have been their own fault if the pursuers did not know about the bonds which were recorded, and about the ground-annuals which were mentioned in their bond. The pursuers' security might have been improved at any time by Aitken becoming absolute proprietor of the subjects. But he never did become absolute proprietor, but, by a transaction with which the pursuers had nothing to do, he came into the position of a heritable creditor, with an ex facie absolute disposition, qualified by back-letters. I therefore sustain the defenders' contention.

“II. The defenders say that so far as the ground-annuals are concerned there could be no confusion, because confusio does not operate to extinguish ground-annuals. On this matter, in the case of Murray v. Parlane's Trustee, 1890, 18 R. 287, opposite opinions were expressed by Lord Rutherford Clark, who thought that confusio might operate extinction of a ground-annual, which is, ‘nothing more than an obligation for payment of an annuity secured over the heritable estate,’ and by Lord Kinnear and Lord Trayner, who thought that ground-annuals, being ex facie irredeemable rights in land, completed by infestment, cannot be extinguished confusione. I take the same view as that expressed by Lord Rutherford Clark. In a question of extinction, it is significant that, in ground-annuals as distinguished from feu-duties, the real security is destroyed by the negative prescription if the ground-annual is omitted from the title for forty years. . . .”

same capacity.¹ Here, no doubt, Aitken was, on 9th May 1903, absolute creditor in the two bonds for £350, but the disposition of that date conveying the security subjects to him, while it was ex facie absolute, was truly in security—he held the security subjects as trustee for Riddagh. Even if the same person came to be both creditor and debtor, confusio did not operate if that person had an interest to keep up the security² which Aitken had, for he had given cash for the bonds, and it was not suggested that Riddagh's personal obligation to repay was extinguished on 9th May 1903. It was nothing to the purpose that the back-letter was not recorded; defenders' bond was dated March 1903, two months before the date of the ex facie absolute disposition; the doctrine as to the faith of the records was therefore out of the case.

LORD LOW.—The question which we have to determine in this case is whether the two bonds and dispositions in security granted by Riddagh in Aitken's favour have been extinguished confusiones? It appears that Riddagh, who is a builder, acquired certain ground which had been divided into six lots for building purposes. Aitken lent him two sums of £350 each, and in security of each loan he disposed to Aitken one lot of ground. Subsequently Aitken made further advances to Riddagh, in security of which Riddagh granted to him an ex facie absolute disposition of the whole ground, which was qualified by a back-letter from Aitken acknowledging that the disposition was in security only. The disposition was duly registered, but the back-letter remained unrecorded.

It is not disputed that if this disposition had been in fact as well as in form absolute, the rights of security which Aitken had in the two lots would have been extinguished. But in fact the disposition was only in security, and if Riddagh had paid his debt Aitken would have been bound to reconvey the ground to him. If that had been done it is plain that Riddagh would have got back the two lots under burden of Aitken's securities. Now, if the securities were not extinguished in a question with Riddagh, why should they be so in a question with the pursuers, who derived their right from Riddagh prior to the date of the ex facie absolute disposition to Aitken? The pursuers say that they were entitled to rely upon the records, and that as nothing appeared upon the register except the absolute disposition it must be assumed that the property of the ground had been conveyed to Aitken. That would have been a good argument if the pursuers had acquired their title from Aitken after the registration of the absolute disposition in his favour, or even, it may be, if they had done something, or refrained from doing something, in reliance upon the register. But no considerations of that kind are present. The position of the pursuers simply is that prior to the date of the absolute disposition they obtained a bond and disposition in security for £1070 from Riddagh, postponed to the two bonds in favour of Aitken.

In these circumstances it appears to me that no question arises involving the faith of the records. The question is really one of fact, namely, whether reasons which I have given, I think that it is clear that he did not do so, and accordingly the pursuers' case fails. King v.

Johnston.

I am therefore of opinion that we must adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ARDWALL.—I am of opinion that the course proposed by Lord Low is the right one and should be followed. I think the case a clear one, and I am somewhat surprised that this plea of confusio was ever put forward. It is, however, the only question that has been argued. It is said that the two bonds for £350 have been extinguished confusione, with the result that the pursuers' bond for £1070 is now a first security over the subjects in question. Now, at the time when the pursuers obtained this bond the state of the record was that in front of the bond which they were getting there stood these two bonds for £350 each on the record, and they therefore took their bond as a security postponed to the debts represented by these two other bonds. They say that they are now entitled to stand in the position of first security holders, because owing to a subsequent transaction, with which admittedly they had nothing to do, and to which they were in no way parties—these two bonds have been extinguished confusione. It appears to me to be settled law that confusio only takes place in a case where the full and absolute right of the creditor and the full and absolute debt of the debtor merge in one and the same person, and in no other circumstances.

Now, what was the case here? We have not the bonds before us, but it has not been alleged that the personal obligations in the bonds have ever been discharged—certainly the debt never was discharged—and therefore Riddagh remained the debtor to Aitken in these sums throughout, and it is vain to say that Aitken ever became the debtor to himself. This is sufficient, I think, to dispose of the plea of confusio, so far as the mere debt is concerned, because, as I understand the pursuers' case, they nowhere allege that Riddagh did not remain throughout the debtor in these sums to James Aitken.

But a plea which is not in so many words stated on the record was argued upon the reclaiming note to the effect that the security title under the two bonds in which Aitken was vested at the time when the pursuers' bond was granted became merged in and extinguished by the absolute title to the subjects which he subsequently obtained from Riddagh, with the result of leaving the pursuers' bond the first security on the subjects. Now, I do not think it has been decided that if "A" holds a recorded bond and disposition in security for a certain sum over a property, and "B" subsequently obtains another bond and disposition in security over the same property, and thereafter "A" obtains an absolute disposition of the said property, the result necessarily is that A's security for his debt is postponed to B's security, or, to express it otherwise, is extinguished in consequence of "A" having acquired the property in fee. But this general question was not argued, the defenders being content to rest their case on the ground that Aitken was never truly, as matter of fact or law, absolute proprietor of the subjects in question, because although he held them under an ex facie absolute disposition granted by Riddagh, that disposition was

Feb. 28, 1908. qualified by a back-letter. I am of opinion that that argument is well founded.

King v.
Johnston.

Lord Ardwall.

Aitken was really holding as a quasi trustee for behoof of Riddagh, under the obligation, if the debts in respect of which he had obtained the absolute disposition were paid off, to reconvey the property to Riddagh, or if the property were sold under the bonds, to account for the reversion of the price. And it was Riddagh who still remained the true proprietor of the subjects, because it was he who had the radical right thereto, and who had the interest in the reversion. That being so, it appears to me that confusio cannot be held to have taken place, because Aitken was never truly the absolute proprietor of the subjects over which the bonds were granted, but only an encumbrancer. But it was argued very strenuously by Mr MacRobert that it did not matter what the nature of the transaction was so long as on the face of the records it appeared that these two bonds had been extinguished in the person of James Aitken by the disposition in his favour. Upon that point I have only to say this, that in my opinion this is not a question depending merely on the records; it is the true state of the facts that has to be looked to. The case of Mackenzie,¹ referred to in the debate, seems to me almost a direct authority for this proposition, that notwithstanding that it may appear on the face of the records that the character of creditor in a heritable bond and that of proprietor of the subjects over which the bond was granted have become united in the same person, yet if it be the fact that the person is not truly absolute proprietor, but holds them on some lesser title, confusio will not take place. None of the cases quoted for the pursuers seem to me to be authorities to the contrary. I accordingly think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment ought to be affirmed.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I agree with both your Lordships.

Company—Liquidation—Liquidator—Expenses of Petitioning Creditors.—In the voluntary winding-up of a company with a nominal capital of £5000, and a paid-up capital of £42, 4s. A was appointed liquidator. In a petition by a creditor for a supervision order, the company and the creditors concurred in asking the Court to grant the order, and to appoint B joint liquidator. The Court granted the order, but in respect of the smallness of the sum involved refused to appoint a joint liquidator, superseded A as liquidator, and appointed C sole liquidator.

The Court intimated that in such cases they would not in future grant expenses to petitioners as a matter of course, but would leave it for the decision of the Lord Ordinary to whom the liquidation was remitted.

Observations on the expenses in liquidation proceedings.

At a general meeting of the West Regent Investment Company, Limited, on 31st December 1907, a special resolution was passed that the Company be wound up voluntarily, and that John Meikle, accountant, Glasgow, be appointed liquidator, which resolution was duly confirmed. Mar. 4, 1908.

1st Division.

On 19th February 1908 Matthew Wishart, a creditor, presented a petition praying the Court to order that the Company be wound up by the Court, and to appoint Joseph Patrick, C.A., Glasgow, as liquidator, or alternatively, to order the voluntary winding-up of said Company to be continued under the supervision of the Court, for the removal of the liquidator appointed by the shareholders, and for the appointment of Joseph Patrick, C.A., Glasgow, as liquidator.

The petition set forth that the nominal capital of the Company was £5000, and the subscribed capital £42, 4s., and that the petitioner was a creditor of the Company for the sum of £70. No answers were lodged to the petition.

On 4th March 1908 the petitioner presented a note stating that at a meeting of the creditors on 21st February it had been resolved that the voluntary winding-up should be continued under the supervision of the Court, and that Joseph Patrick should be associated with John Meikle as joint liquidator, and craving the Court to confirm this arrangement.

There was no opposition to the note.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I will take this opportunity of intimating for the information of counsel that we are going to alter the practice of granting expenses to petitioners in such cases as a matter of course, and to leave that to the Lord Ordinary to whom the liquidation is remitted, and who has a knowledge of the facts. In this case it is all very well to say that two liquidators are required, but I see no reason why there should be two horses in this one-horse concern. This is a company of which we are told the capital is £5000, and the total capital subscribed £42, 4s. The Company passed a resolution for voluntary winding-up and the appointing of a liquidator, and then there was a creditor's petition. The parties seem to have come together and agreed that the liquidation should be continued under the supervision of the Court, and that a liquidator nominated by the creditors should be conjoined with the liquidator appointed by the Company. It has been brought under the notice of the Court that in a great many liquidations there is really almost a scandalous amount spent in expenses, and the Court are resolved to do what they can to prevent this abuse. It seems to me that the proposition made here is an abuse on the face of it, and although in ordinary cases the wishes of the creditors will be consulted as to who should be appointed as liquidator, it seems that the arrangement here is so objectionable that the only course for your Lordships to take, and the one I propose, is to pronounce a supervision order, remove the present liquidator, and appoint an entirely new liquidator who is not proposed by any of the parties.

Company — Liquidation — Liquidator — Director — Foreign. — Circumstances in which the Court appointed as joint liquidator in the winding-up of a company a person who was a director of the company, and who was resident in London.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 14th February 1908 a petition was presented by Bruce Peebles & Company, Limited, electrical engineers, incorporated under the Companies Acts, and having its registered office in Edinburgh, craving (1) the appointment of a provisional liquidator, and (2) an order for the Company to be wound up by the Court under the provisions of the Companies Acts, and for the appointment of Mr Andrew Wilson Tait, C.A., a director of the Company, and residing in London, as official liquidator. The capital of the Company consisted of 58,381 shares, preference and ordinary, of £5 each, fully paid up, representing a capital of £291,905. The Company had also issued debentures to the amount of £75,900. It was stated that the Company was unable to continue business through its inability to pay its debts, which amounted to £201,117. It was further stated that the Company's works were situated in Edinburgh, but that the procuring and negotiating of the contracts carried out by the Company was almost entirely conducted from its office in London.

On 14th February 1908 intimation and advertisement of the petition was ordered, and Mr A. W. Tait was appointed provisional liquidator.

On 24th February 1908 an extraordinary general meeting of the Company was held at Edinburgh, when it was resolved, inter alia, (1) that the Company should be wound up voluntarily; (2) that the above-mentioned Mr A. W. Tait, C.A., London, and Mr J. A. Robertson-Durham, C.A., Edinburgh, be appointed joint liquidators; and (3) that the winding-up be placed under the supervision of the Court.

On 26th February 1908 a note in the petition was accordingly presented by Mr Tait and Mr Robertson-Durham, as liquidators of the Company, craving, inter alia, for a supervision order, and for confirmation of their appointment as joint liquidators. Mar. 5, 1908.

Appearance was made in support of the application in the note by S. E. Bastow and others, who were shareholders representing £140,000 of the capital, debenture-holders representing £41,000, and creditors representing £124,551. In addition the Royal Bank of Scotland, who were creditors to the amount of £43,390, intimated that they left the matter to the determination of the trade creditors. Liquidators of Bruce Peebles & Co., Limited, v. Shiells.

The application was opposed by C. J. Shiells, C.A., Edinburgh, and others, who were shareholders representing £8000 of capital, debenture-holders representing £1000, and creditors representing £6600. The opposition was directed principally against the appointment of Mr Tait as one of the liquidators, in respect (1) that he was resident in England and outwith the jurisdiction of the Court; and (2) that questions would arise for the determination of the liquidators in the course of the liquidation regarding the past management of the Company which would make it inexpedient to have a director of the Company acting as liquidator.

Parties were heard on 5th March 1908.

Argued for the petitioners and concurring comparears;—Mr Tait's appointment was approved of by the vast majority of those concerned, and in particular by the creditors, to whose wishes the Court was always ready to give effect.¹ There was no absolute rule against the appointment as liquidator of an official of the Company,² or of a person residing outwith the jurisdiction of the Court. In the present case there were circumstances connected with the carrying on of the Company's business which made it highly expedient to appoint Mr Tait as one of the liquidators.*

Argued for the respondents;—Neither an official of the Company³ nor a person residing outwith the jurisdiction of the Court⁴ were eligible for the post of liquidator, except in special circumstances, and no such circumstances had been shewn to exist in the present case,

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the application that is before us we have first of all to decide whether this should be a compulsory winding-up, or whether the voluntary winding-up which has already been started by the Company should be continued under the supervision of the Court. There has been scarcely any argument upon that point, and at anyrate it is sufficient to say that there is no reason why we should disturb the liquidation at present going on. The Court will accordingly pronounce an interlocutor in the ordinary form continuing the winding-up under the supervision of the Court.

The real question, however, which has been argued before your Lordships is the question who the liquidators are to be. The provisional liquidator, who was appointed only the other day, is Mr Tait, who is a chartered accountant resident in London, and also was a director of the Company. The application of the Company, who are the presenters of the petition,

Mar. 5, 1908. was originally intended to be an application for an order to have the Liquidators of Company wound up by the Court, and for the appointment of Mr Tait as Bruce Peebles official liquidator ; but after the prayer had actually been framed they were & Co., approached by several of the creditors who said that they objected to having Limited, v. a director of the Company appointed as sole liquidator, but indicated that Shiells. they would be perfectly contented if an independent liquidator was Ld. President. appointed in conjunction with Mr Tait, and the name suggested was that of Mr Robertson-Durham. Accordingly, before your Lordships to-day, the position taken up by the Company has been that the liquidators ought to be Mr Tait, and associated with him Mr Robertson-Durham. The application is opposed by certain parties who, through the counsel who appeared, represent in all £7000 worth of creditors, 1600 shares, and £1000 worth of debenture debt. The total figures which might be represented under these three heads are, for creditors—I give the figures of course, roughly—£200,000 ; for debentures, £75,000 ; and for shareholders £290,000—58,000 odd shares. Now, the objections that have been made by the compearing parties are really reduced to two heads alone. They objected to Mr Tait, first, in respect that he is domiciled in England, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court ; and secondly, that he has been, and was at the moment of the liquidation, a director of the Company. On the other hand, the Company have given special reasons as they say, why Mr Tait's appointment should be confirmed. These special reasons are as follows :—They explain that the Company has been brought into the difficulties which necessitate its liquidation because of the tightness of money in the money market, and that, assuming its business may go on, it is not certain that it will eventually become insolvent. Whether that is the case or not, it is true that the Company at this moment, in the course of its business, is engaged in carrying out a great many important and lucrative contracts. Therefore it is in the interests of all concerned that the benefit of these contracts should not be lost, because even apart from the question of the relinquishment of profit from these contracts there would be a very severe loss to the Company in respect that under the forfeiture clauses which are common enough in such contracts, they would lose a great deal of their plant in various parts of the world by that plant being seized by the persons with whom they had contracted. They further explained that there are in several of these contracts clauses of what we call in Scots law irritancy, by which the contracts may be brought to an end by the liquidation of the Company, and they go on to say that the continued presence of Mr Tait in the active management of the business as a going concern is really a sine qua non in the negotiations which must necessarily ensue with the various parties with whom they have these contracts. That is a story which, upon the face of it, appears to have quite the impress of truth and probability. It is not admitted to the full by all the parties who are here compearing, and of course it is impossible for your Lordships sitting here to have an inquiry in order to get at the absolute truth of the state of facts. In regard to these matters your Lordships are bound to deal in a case of this sort with the prima facie view, and all I say is that the story as told seems to me to bear the impress of truth. But your Lordships, I think, in such a case, where it is found that averments made on one side are not admitted on the other, have pointed out to you by the terms of the statute what is the proper method of solution. You are in all these matters, the statute says, to have regard to the wishes of the creditors and of the contributors. I have already given the figures of the compearing and objecting persons, and I have given the figures of the total compearers. In every such case, of course, it is not to be expected that we should have everybody here ; but for the petitioners we have here, so far as the creditors are concerned, about £124,000 out of £200,000, and we have to notice that one very large creditor, the Royal Bank, which has a claim for over £43,000, is neutral, but neutral in such a way as practically to belong to the petitioners, because the Royal Bank, following its usual practice, did not take any part in determining the course to be taken by the creditors, but intimated that it would leave the decision to the trade creditors, which is tantamount to voting with the majority. Accordingly, you have here a sum of something like 160 odd thousand pounds, and you have besides practically about £140,000 worth out of the whole shareholding, and the petitioners have through a separate appearance practically the whole of the debenture-holders. I need scarcely say when these figures are compared with the figures of the compearing objectors, that there is absolutely an overwhelming majority in favour of the demand by the petitioners. Therefore I think your Lordships should have little hesitation in supposing that the particular reasons which have been given for appointing this gentleman are true, seeing that the belief that these reasons are true is a belief that commends itself to the enormous majority of the shareholders, and still more of the creditors, who are of course the persons most to be thought of. Accordingly, it seems to me that everything points to granting the prayer of the petition in this matter, unless there is some real objection in law. Now, it is no objection in law to the appointment of the gentleman that he is not at this moment subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. It seems to me that he subjects himself most clearly by consenting to become an officer of this Court ; and subject to the difficulty of arresting him in England, I cannot help thinking we should have every power against him, if such a thing were necessary—a contingency which is, I am glad to think, most improbable—that we would have against a Scotch liquidator. Nor do I find it has been ever laid down that it is impossible for the Court to appoint liquidators not subject to its jurisdiction. On the contrary, Lord President Robertson, in the case of The Barberton Development Syndicate, Limited,¹ seems to me to have been particularly careful to bar the idea that such a course was incompetent, although it goes without saying that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it is much more convenient in practice for the Court to appoint a gentleman in their own jurisdiction, for this reason, that it is better to have the man who conducts it there also. And the considerations which guided the Court in the well-known case of the City of Glasgow Bank,² are really too obvious to require stating. In that case there was nothing to be done but to distribute the assets of the City of Glasgow Bank. There were four men, capable gentle-

Here the reason for asking that Mr Tait should be a liquidator is not really connected with the distribution of the assets of the Company, but is connected with the weighty consideration of being able to continue this business as a going business at present, and consequently making the most money out of it for both creditors and shareholders.

Then it is said that Mr Tait was a director, and it is hinted or said that questions may arise as to the conduct of the directors in the past. That may be so, and I think it would be a very weighty consideration against the appointment of Mr Tait as the sole liquidator. But it is not now proposed that Mr Tait should be sole liquidator. I do not wish to say anything peculiarly personal, but it is only fair to Mr Robertson-Durham to say that he, the gentleman selected and put before us, is a gentleman well known to this Court, and one at the head of his profession, and one in whom the Court has every confidence. It is perfectly absurd to think that Mr Robertson-Durham, knowing his duties as an officer of this Court, would ever allow to remain uninvestigated any transaction in the past, because he thought it might eventually go against the interests of Mr Tait. If such things are unfortunately discovered, I conceive it would be a duty which he would perform, to call attention to the matter, to say to Mr Tait that the time had now come in which his interests became conflicting, and to call upon him to resign; and if he did not do so, it would be Mr Robertson-Durham's duty to bring the matter before the Court; and in such circumstances as I have put I do not think it is doubtful what the Court would do. All that is speculation as to the future, and all that does not touch the real crucial point of the matter, viz., the extreme desirability of keeping these contracts running. Accordingly, I am of opinion here—it is a peculiar, and in many respects a unique case—that the petitioners have really made out the position they have put before us. Upon this matter of conflicting interests there again, it seems to me, your Lordships' action is really backed up by the action of the persons to be considered, the creditors. As soon as it was known that Mr Tait was to lodge a petition to appoint him liquidator, the creditors said "No," and the moment it was proposed to have Mr Robertson-Durham along with him the creditors said "Yes," and they are saying "Yes" before your Lordships to-day. I am therefore of opinion that the prayer of the note should be granted.

Ramsay v.
Howison.

Lease—Damages—Claim by tenant for breach of condition of the lease—Failure to burn heather—Personal Objection—Waiver—Mora—Payment of rent without reservation.—The tenant of a farm, under a lease which contained an obligation by the landlord to burn one year with another a certain quantity of heather per annum, possessed under the lease for nine years, during which period, although he repeatedly complained of the landlord's failure to burn sufficient heather, he paid the rent each half year without deduction or reservation of any claim for damages, and took clean receipts therefor. In the tenth year he brought an action against the landlord for damages suffered in that and the preceding year, in consequence of the failure to burn sufficient heather. The landlord pleaded in defence that the tenant, by paying the rent up to the ninth year without reservation, was barred from claiming damages for default committed prior to that date.

Held, in the circumstances, that as the damage from failure to burn heather was cumulative, and as it was impossible to determine by what year the damage would declare itself, the tenant could not be assumed by his actings to have waived his claim.

Lease—Constitution—Verbal lease followed by written lease—Obligation inserted in written lease—Date from which obligation takes effect.—In 1895 a moorland farm was let verbally for nineteen years, and the tenant entered into possession. The parties were at variance as to the amount of heather-burning per annum that was to be undertaken by the landlord, and that question remained unsettled till 1902, when a lease was signed by the parties, in which the landlord undertook to burn, one year with another, one-twelfth part of the heather annually. The lease also bore that the farm was let "for the period of nineteen years from and after the term of Martinmas 1895, which, notwithstanding the date hereof, is declared to be the term of entry hereunder."

Held that the obligation to burn one-twelfth part of the heather annually ran from Martinmas 1895, and not from the date of the lease in 1902.

IN 1895 Sir James Henry Ramsay, Baronet, of Bamff, let the farm and grazings of Craighead and Watershiel on the estate of Bamff, to John Howison, farmer, Fingask, on a nineteen years' lease, at a rent of £315 per annum. Howison entered into possession at Martinmas 1895, and thereafter paid his rent regularly each half year until Whitsunday 1905, when he declined to pay the rent due at that term, amounting to £157, 10s., on the ground that he had a counter claim against his landlord for damages arising, inter alia, out of insufficient heather-burning.

On 7th July 1905 Sir James Ramsay brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire, at Perth, against John Howison, concluding for payment of the rent due by Howison, viz., £157, 10s.

On 21st September 1905 John Howison brought a counter action in the Sheriff Court at Perth against Sir James Ramsay, in which he concluded, inter alia, for payment of £200, being his estimate of the damage suffered by him from insufficient heather-burning in the years 1904 and 1905, at the rate of £100 for each year. These actions were conjoined on 3d April 1906.

The lease already referred to, out of which these questions arose, had been entered into by verbal bargain between Howison and Mr John Panton, Blairgowrie, then factor for Sir James Ramsay, but since deceased. The farm consisted to a large extent of moorland, on which the heather-burning had been neglected for some years, and the parties were not agreed as to the amount of heather which the landlord should undertake to burn annually to put the grazing into proper condition. In July 1902, however, a draft lease was adjusted and signed by both the parties. The lease contained this provision:—"And with regard to heather-burning on the moorland of the farm hereby let, it is agreed upon, and the proprietor hereby undertakes to burn, weather permitting (except during the statutory close time from the eleventh day of April to the first day of November), one year with another, one-twelfth part more or less thereof during each year of the lease, the said heather-burning to be carried out under the supervision of the proprietor's head gamekeeper, the tenant giving the assistance of his shepherds in connection therewith. Declaring that no heather shall be burned on the lands hereby let except as herein provided for, under the penalty of two pounds sterling per imperial acre, and at that rate for any part of an acre of additional rent." The lease also bore that the let was "for the period of nineteen years from and after the term of Martinmas Eighteen hundred and ninety-five, which, notwithstanding the date hereof, is declared to be the term of entry hereunder."

In the action at the instance of Howison, the defender, Sir James Ramsay, pleaded, inter alia,:—(7) In any event, pursuer having paid his rent for the period of his possession up to Martinmas 1904 without specific reservation of any claim for compensation, cannot now maintain such claim, so far as arising prior to the said term of Martinmas 1904.

A proof was allowed and led. At the proof it was established that Howison constantly complained, particularly when paying his rent, of the failure to burn the heather in sufficient quantity, but he never made any specific claim or intimation that he would make a claim for damages resulting therefrom, and, until Whitsunday 1905, he had paid his rent each half year without reservation or deduction, and taken clean receipts therefor. It was further established that the years 1903 and 1904 were so wet that heather-burning was impossible, and consequently that no effort was, or could have been, made to burn the heather in these two years.* Mar. 5, 1908.

On 26th December 1906 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym), pronounced an interlocutor in which, besides findings embodying the facts set forth above, he found in fact:—“(17) Finds with regard to heather-burning that, in the season 1896, a considerable amount of heather-burning was done, and the moor was partially broken up, and that in 1906, after the present dispute was going on, a considerable amount of heather-burning was done, but that in the intervening years, notwithstanding complaint and objection on the part of the tenant Howison, the landlord failed to perform, taking these years together, the obligation of burning, one year with another, one-twelfth of the heather each heather-burning season: (18) That the seasons of 1903 and 1904, and to a considerable extent that of 1905, were wet and unsuitable for heather-burning, but the other seasons between 1897 and 1902 were more suitable, and the obligation, making proper allowance for the bad years, was capable of fulfilment.” He also found in law:—“(1) With regard to heather-burning, that the tenant is not disentitled—having regard to the nature of the obligation, the uncertainty for some years of its position owing to the landlord’s action, and the manner in which it is to be fulfilled on an average of years—from seeking damages for its breach; assesses the damages at £100.”

Ramsay v.
Howison.

Sir James Ramsay appealed to the Sheriff (Johnston), who, on 16th February 1907, recalled the portions of the Sheriff-substitute’s interlocutor quoted above, and in place thereof found:—“(16) That having regard to the state of the weather in the years 1903, 1904, and 1905, and the amount of heather burned in 1906, no failure upon the part of the landlord to burn heather, in accordance with the provisions of the lease, is proved to have occurred subsequent to the spring of 1902: (17) That the tenant claims damages in respect of the failure of the landlord to burn sufficient heather in each of the years from 1897 to 1902 inclusive: (18) That the tenant paid his rent in full, without demanding any reservation in the receipt or intimating any claim for any neglect of heather-burning, down to the term of Whitsunday 1905, when he consigned the half year’s rent then due: Recalls the first finding in law in the said interlocutor and the relative decerniture, and, in place thereof, finds that the tenant is barred by delay in intimating his claim from any claim of damages in respect of failure to burn sufficient heather: Assoilzies the landlord from the conclusions for damages in respect of insufficient heather-burning: Recalls the award of expenses.”

Howison appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard on the 7th, 8th, and 12th November 1907.

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff had decided against the pursuer here on the ground either of mora or of waiver. Neither of

* After the action at the instance of Sir James Ramsay had been brought, Howison consigned in Court the amount of rent sued for in that action, and at the time when the two actions were conjoined the Sheriff granted decree for payment of the consigned sum to Sir James Ramsay, reserving all questions of expenses until the determination of the conjoined actions. Consequently the interlocutors pronounced in the conjoined actions treated the action at the instance of Howison as the principal action before the Court.

Mar. 5, 1908. these pleas in law was made out. It was always a question of circumstances whether payment of rent by a tenant must be held as a waiver of all his claims against the landlord up to that date, and in the circumstances here no such rule could apply. The damage done by failure to burn heather was cumulative, it did not have its full effect, or indeed any effect, in the year in which the failure occurred, and therefore, no damage having occurred, no damages could be claimed for the year in which the breach took place. Cases such as Broadwood v. Hunter,¹ where the damage was apparent year by year, were therefore inapplicable. The rule in *Broadwood*¹ had been departed from in other cases where the circumstances were different.² The tenant had here done all he could in giving the landlord warning by constant protests. He could not define his claim for damages until the damage had actually emerged, and in the particular circumstances here he was further prevented from doing so by the delay until 1902 in fixing the precise extent of the landlord's obligation. There was no question here of prejudice to the landlord by loss of evidence as in the case of Emslie,³ where the claim was for damages emerging during a period of years ending three years before the date of the action, for here the damages claimed were only for the last two years, and the amount of heather-burning done in previous years could easily be ascertained from an inspection of the ground. Nor was there any force in the argument that the failure could only be held to commence in 1902, either on the ground that the obligation to burn one-twelfth only began then, or that the tenant by signing the draft lease had waived all claims up to that date. The date of entry under the lease was the date from which all the conditions of the lease must be held to run.⁴ Indeed, this draft lease was really a defining of what were the conditions of the lease from its inception. That was borne out by the terms of the document itself, for it stated that Martinmas 1895 was to be taken as the date of its commencement. It was admitted that from the start the parties were agreed that the landlord should burn the heather, though the extent of that obligation remained a matter of controversy for some time. The signing of the draft lease was merely an acknowledgment by the landlord of what the original obligation really was. If the appellant was successful in displacing this plea in law, the fact that he had suffered damage and was entitled to reparation was amply made out by the evidence.

Argued for the respondent;—Where actings or omissions were taking place from which cumulative damages would arise, the person intending to claim damages must give timely intimation of the damage, or, on the ground of prejudice, he would lose his right of action. Such intimation must be specific, and could not be conveyed by mere grumbings,⁵ which were all that the appellant had proved here. Further, the payment of rent and the taking of clean receipts were in themselves proof of waiver of any claim for damages.¹ In Mar. 5, 1908. the circumstances of this case, therefore, the Sheriff was right in sustaining the plea in bar. Further, it was proved that in 1903 and 1904 heather-burning was impossible, therefore all the damage alleged here had arisen from the failure to burn a larger quantity of heather in the years up to 1902, and the appellant could found no claim on failure to burn heather in these years. Up to 1902 there was no agreement between the parties as to the amount of heather to be burnt, therefore there was no breach by the landlord. The agreement as to heather-burning was only arrived at in 1902, and it was absurd to say it acted retrospectively. It was itself in de presenti terms, and being only in an improbative document it could not override a previous existing arrangement, and did not fall under the same rules of interpretation as a formally executed lease. The intention of parties was clearly in support of this, for the landlord would never have signed a document that was to subject him retrospectively to a claim which at that time was non-existent. Further, the appellant had made no claim up to the signing of the lease, and therefore by signing it he had made a complete waiver of all claims, if he had any, up to that date. The case of *Foulis v. M^r Whirter*² did not apply to the present circumstances, for there there was a formal lease, it did not differ in any respect from the previous writings of the parties, and the judgment was not based on the lease alone, but also on the previous missives. Even if the Sheriff was wrong in sustaining the plea in bar, the evidence adduced at the proof had failed to substantiate the appellant's claim.

At advising on 5th March 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This case comes before us on an appeal from the Sheriff Court of Perthshire in conjoined actions. In the first action Sir James Ramsay sued the appellant for £157, 10s., being half-yearly rent due at Whitsunday 1905, and was met by a claim to retain the rent against a larger sum of damages which was said to be incurred in the year 1904, chiefly in respect of insufficient heather-burning.

The second action was instituted by the appellant, and in it he claims damages incurred in the year 1905. There is also a claim for repairs to the house and fences, but this part of the case was not brought under review in the Court of Session. The actions were conjoined in the Sheriff Court.

The Sheriff-substitute awarded £100 of damages in respect of insufficient heather-burning, stating in his note that his award was made on the consideration that the tenant might have kept additional stock, and that prices of late had been good.

The Sheriff found "that the tenant is barred by delay in intimating his claim from any claim of damages in respect of failure to burn sufficient heather," and therefore assoilzied Sir James Ramsay from the conclusions under this head. In the note to his interlocutor the learned Sheriff states

Mar. 5, 1908. that in his view it is unnecessary for him to determine the question whether there was default on the part of the landlord.

Ramsay v.
Howison.

Lord M'Laren.

It appears to me, however, that we cannot with advantage consider whether there was such delay in making a definite claim as would amount to a legal bar, until we have mastered the facts of the case, including such elements as the amount of heather burned from year to year, the state of the weather in the spring months in so far as it has interfered with burning of heather, and the condition of the moor at the time when the claim was made as compared with its condition when the tenant first entered on the possession of the farm.

The omission to burn the proper quantity for two or three years might not sensibly affect the value of the farm for grazing, and again, the inability to burn heather during, say, two consecutive seasons, even if it did affect the value of the farm, would not give the tenant a claim for damage.

But the effect of the heather being allowed to grow unchecked for a series of years is cumulative, and, prima facie, it is only when the tenant begins to suffer from the abnormal growth of the heather that his claim arises. In any view, it is only then that the attention of the tenant is directed to the subject, and that he is in a position to estimate the damage and to formulate a claim. For this reason I think we shall best get at the justice of the case if we begin by considering whether there was, in fact, a failure on the part of the respondent to keep down the heather to the proper extent.

The case is further complicated by reason of the parties being at variance as to the extent of the landlord's obligation to burn the moor. There is a concurrence of testimony that in 1895, when the appellant got possession of the farm of Craighead, the moor was not in good order, and the appellant would not have taken the farm except on the condition that it was to be made suitable for pasture by yearly heather-burning. But the terms of the lease, as often happens, were not arranged when the tenant got possession, and, as matter of fact, the lease was not executed until July 1902, the chief cause of the delay being the difference of view between landlord and tenant as to the extent to which the burning of the heather was to be carried. The appellant claimed that one-tenth of the moorland should be burned in each year. The respondent would only undertake to burn one-fourteenth—(see the evidence of Mr Ralston, factor in the intermediate years of the tenancy). Eventually the figure of one-twelfth was agreed on, and that figure was inserted in the lease executed in 1902.

It is maintained for the proprietor that this figure ought not to be applied retrospectively in estimating the damage under the present claim, but, in my opinion, there is not much substance in the argument. If the terms of the lease had been varied, if, for example, the original agreement had been to burn to the extent of one-fourteenth, and if, after the lapse of say seven years, the proprietor had agreed to the proportion of one-twelfth, plainly there would be no breach of contract in past years if the burning had been carried out in terms of the original agreement. But in the actual case there was no variation of the original contract. The contract was (by legal implication) that the moor should be burned annually to a reasonable extent. The parties were not at first agreed as to what should be considered a reasonable proportion, but eventually they agreed that one-twelfth Mar. 5, 1908. of the whole moor should be taken as a reasonable amount of burning in Ramsay v. fulfilment of the proprietor's obligation, and this quantity was inserted in a Howison. lease which, although only executed in 1902, gave entry as at Martinmas Lord M'Laren. 1895. I think this must be taken to be an estimate on which the parties were agreed and meant to be bound, of what they considered a fair fulfilment of the proprietor's obligation to burn reasonably. When, two years after the execution of the lease, it was found that the pasturage had deteriorated, I think the measure of damage is the loss the tenant proves that he has suffered from the neglect to burn to the extent of one-twelfth from the beginning. In that sense I see no difficulty in giving a retrospective effect to the clause in the lease, because it was not a variation, but an interpretation by joint consent of the original obligation.

[After reviewing the evidence as to insufficient heather-burning, his Lordship proceeded]:—I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that the respondent or his gamekeeper, for whom he is, of course, responsible, has not fairly carried out the agreement with the appellant as to burning, and that the damage for the two years to which the actions relate is proved to amount to £100.

There remains for consideration the ground of the Sheriff's judgment, which is that the appellant by paying his rent for a series of years before making a specific claim has departed from his claim of damage for future years.

Now, I think that in applying the principle of decision in such cases as *Broadwood v. Hunter*¹ to a case in which the uses of the land are different, and the conditions which determine liability are different, some caution is requisite; and it is proper to consider the principle which underlies the decisions, and to apply it, with the necessary reserve, to the altered conditions. There are two principles to be considered. The first is that where a proprietor is in breach of the contract of location, the tenant, and no other person, is the party entitled to sue for reparation, a principle which has lately been called in question, but may now, I hope, be held to be established. The other is, that a tenant may waive his claim, and that such a waiver may be inferred from his acts, even when he has not granted an express discharge. Whether in any particular case the tenant has waived his claim is a question of fact in which all the circumstances have to be considered. In this case, and according to the agreement, the tenant entered upon the occupation of a farm which was in very bad condition, with a legal expectation that in the course of his tenure the sheep-carrying capacity of the farm would be improved. But it was quite impossible to forecast the time when the expected improvement would be realised, because this depended partly on the weather conditions being favourable for burning, and partly on the system of burning, which to some extent was in the proprietor's discretion. If the burning was done in considerable tracts at a time, there would be a sensible improvement as soon as the grass began to grow, but if it were done in small patches scattered over the moor, the benefit might be eventually the same, but it would be longer in coming into

Mar. 5, 1908. operation. In any case, as the tenant entered upon an improving lease, he could not reasonably make a claim of damage until after the lapse of such a period of years as would be necessary to give the system a fair trial. The most he could do would be to insist on the agreement as to burning being carried out. In consequence of the death of Mr Panton, the first factor, we have not the advantage of his evidence, but I see no reason for doubting the accuracy of the appellant's statement that he complained to Mr Panton, year by year, of the inefficient way in which the burning was carried out, and pressed for a more speedy fulfilment of the landlord's undertaking in this respect. In the year after Panton's death, the parties were negotiating as to the terms of the written lease, and it was not until 1902, when the lease had been executed, and when there had been a six years' trial of the proprietor's system of burning, that the tenant can be said to be in a condition to judge for himself whether he had the materials for a specific claim. Up to this time the utmost effect that could be given to his omission to make a claim would be that he could not claim damage for any inconvenience he had suffered in the years that were past.

Ramsay v.
Howison.

Lord M'Laren.

Then, after 1902, the case was further complicated by the occurrence of two unfavourable years for burning; but in 1904 the appellant had satisfied himself that the respondent did not mean, unless compelled by legal means, to carry out fully his undertaking as to heather-burning. In this conclusion I think he is justified by the attitude taken up by the respondent's advisers at the proof, and also by the circumstance that in the year following the action the heather-burning was, for the first time, carried out in an efficient way.

Now, if the appellant had brought his action at an earlier period, he would very likely have been met by the defence that the heather-burning had not had a sufficient trial, and that he could not expect in so short a time to have the farm in good condition. There is really no criterion for determining at what particular year the damage had declared itself so as to put the tenant to an election either to waive his claim altogether or to enforce it. In all the circumstances I see no sufficient evidence of waiver, and I cannot think it would be a just or equitable result that the tenant must submit during the remaining years of his lease (for this is the Sheriff's judgment) to an actual refusal on the part of the landlord to fulfil his contract because he has not enforced his rights with the utmost strictness in the past. I am therefore of opinion that we should sustain the appeal and restore the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, that the appellant is entitled to £100 as damage sustained during the years 1904 and 1905 through the negligent performance of the respondent's obligation to burn a fair proportion of the heather year by year in terms of the lease.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD PEARSON was absent at the advising.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 16th February 1907, affirmed that of the Sheriff-substitute dated 26th December 1906, repeated the findings therein, and decerned.

Brown & Co.,

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1, and Second Sched., pars. (8) and (14)—Recorded Memorandum of Agreement—Action of damages for breach of Agreement—Competency.—A memorandum of agreement, recorded under par. (8) of the Second Schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, bore to be "in the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation 1897," between L. and B. & Co., and set forth that L. had claimed compensation under the Act from B. & Co.; that the parties were agreed that the maximum compensation to which L. was entitled was 17s. 6d.; and that B. & Co. "agree in lieu of such compensation to give" B "regular employment as a foreman," and "to pay him the fixed weekly wage of 23s. . . . and also to pay him on the date hereof the sum of £90 sterling, and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act."

B. & Co. paid £90 to L., and they also employed him on the agreed-on terms for about three years. They then dismissed him.

L. brought an action of damages for breach of contract against B. & Co., pleading that the memorandum of agreement embodied two agreements—(a) an agreement to pay £90 as compensation under the Act, and (b) a common law agreement to give the pursuer employment.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Guthrie, Lord Ardwall reserving his opinion), that the action was incompetent in respect that the agreement being indivisible and being recorded, only the remedies provided by the Workmen's Compensation Act were available to L.

Master and Servant—Constitution of Contract—Agreement by master to give "regular employment" to servant.—By an agreement in settlement of a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the master, in addition to agreeing to make immediate payment of a lump sum to the claimant, agreed to give the claimant "regular employment at a fixed weekly wage of 23s." After three years the master dismissed him.

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Guthrie) that the agreement did not give the claimant a right to permanent employment so long as he was willing and able to do the work.

ON 3d December 1903 an agreement in the following terms was recorded in the Sheriff Court Books at Edinburgh:—

2D DIVISION.
Lord Guthrie.

"To the Sheriff-clerk of the County of Midlothian.

"In the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, between Thomas Lawrie, head fireman, Esk Mills Row, Penicuik,—Applicant; and James Brown & Company, Ltd., paper-makers, Esk Mills, Penicuik,—Respondents.

"Take notice that in the foresaid matter in which the applicant claimed compensation from the respondents in respect of the loss of an eye by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a workman in the service of the respondents at Esk Mills aforesaid on the 5th day of September 1903, the following agreement has been made between the parties, that is to say:—

"The said parties agree that the maximum compensation to which the applicant is entitled under the Act is 17s. 6d. per week, being one-half of his average weekly earnings, consisting of 30s. of regular wages and an average sum of 5s. of extra work at overtime wages, but subject to deduction, in terms of the second paragraph of the First Schedule of the said Act, of the average amount which he is now able to earn as regular and extra wages, and the respondents agree in lieu of such compensation to give the applicant regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills, and to pay him the fixed weekly wage of 23s., with the usual additional pay for extra work, and also to pay him on the date hereof the sum of £90 sterling, and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act in respect of the said injury.

"You are requested to record this memorandum pursuant to paragraph 8 of the Second Schedule of the above-mentioned Act." Then followed the date of the agreement and the signatures.

The pursuer set forth the circumstances of the accident which resulted in the injury to his eye, and averred:—(Cond. 3) "The defenders, recognising that the pursuer had a serious claim both at common law and under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, at once began to negotiate a settlement with him. They were well aware that he had a wife and family dependent upon him. . . . Accordingly, they proposed that the pursuer should make an agreement with them under the Workmen's Compensation Act, in order that the pursuer might be enabled to earn substantial wages, and promised that they would receive into their employment one of the pursuer's children who was then of an age ready for work, and the younger ones as they came to be of an age for working. The defenders further . . . agreed to give the pursuer regular employment as a foreman over their workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills, paying him a fixed wage of 23s. per week, with the usual additional pay for extra work, which they promised would be equal to one day per week or 3s. 10d. of additional wages. . . . In respect of the outlay, loss, &c., consequent on the injury to the pursuer's eye, the defenders further agreed to pay the pursuer £90 sterling. In so far as the said agreement related to the matters contemplated by the Workmen's Compensation Act, a memorandum of agreement was entered into between the pursuer and defenders (a copy of which is herewith produced), and was duly recorded in the Sheriff Court Books at Edinburgh on 3d December 1903." (Cond. 4) "Acting under the said arrangement the defenders paid the said £90, and took the pursuer back temporarily into their service, but in all other respects they have grossly failed to fulfil their said agreement, and have acted in direct violation of its terms. . . . In particular, the pursuer requested that two of his younger children should be given work as promised, but this the defenders refused. The defenders, in place of giving the pursuer the position of foreman at the settling ponds, compelled him to work as a general labourer. . . . The defenders also refused to give the pursuer any opportunity of earning wages for overtime. . . . In consequence of the pursuer's attempting to hold the defenders to the said agreement, he was dismissed by them without notice or reason assigned on 3d July 1906."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders never having implemented the obligation incumbent upon them to provide the pursuer with regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds, and having, by dismissing the pursuer from their service, caused him much loss, injury, and damage, they are liable in reparation. (2) The defenders having wrongfully dismissed the pursuer from their service, are liable in reparation. Mar. 6, 1908.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent as laid, in respect, inter alia, that although the claim arises out of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it seeks to add a remedy which the Act does not give. (2) The averments for the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and the action should therefore be dismissed, with expenses. Lawrie v.
Brown & Co.,
Limited.

On 15th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerned.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The action was competent. No doubt the memorandum of agreement bore to be "in the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897," and if the document had embodied nothing else than an agreement under the Act the pursuer did not dispute that the action would have been incompetent;¹ but when the document was analysed it would be found that it embodied not one but two agreements, namely (a) a statutory agreement by which the defenders agreed to pay, and the

* "OPINION.—The defenders plead incompetency and irrelevancy.

"They say that the action is incompetent because the only claim stated by the pursuer against them arises out of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That agreement, they admit, can be enforced in all its terms under the Act, but, according to them, no part of it can be made the ground for a claim for damages at common law, such as is made in this action. The pursuer has foreseen the difficulty, and has endeavoured in cond. 3 to avoid it by representing the statutory agreement as one contract and the agreement for regular employment, which is the basis of his present claim, as another and distinct contract. But this is not so, either in fact or in law. The whole stipulations are contained in one agreement. It is headed, 'In the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,' &c., and, after detailing the terms of the agreement, including the undertaking by the defenders to give the pursuer 'regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds,' ends with these words, 'and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act in respect of the said injury.' In these circumstances, it is unsound to maintain, as the pursuer does, that the case is the same as if the stipulation as to regular employment was in a separate document containing no reference to the Act. If the contract founded on by the pursuer is part of an agreement under the Act, as I hold it is, it is not disputed that it cannot be enforced in this action.

"I also sustain the plea to the relevancy. It is not necessary to consider the pursuer's averments as to the defenders' breach of a verbal contract to employ his children, and to afford him extra work, because it was explained that these are not matter of substantive claim. Nor is any case made of want of reasonable notice, if the pursuer was truly employed by the defenders, as alleged by them, at will. The pursuer's complaint is that, while the defenders undertook to give him 'regular employment,' they only did so for nearly three years and then dismissed him. I see no breach of contract by the defenders in thus acting, unless there be read into the agreement an obligation on them to give the pursuer regular employment for life, or at least, as the pursuer contended, so long as he is able and willing to serve them and does his work properly. I see no warrant for reading any such terms into the agreement, and I therefore hold the pursuer's averments of breach of contract irrelevant."

to earn as regular and extra wages, and the respondents agree in lieu of such compensation to give the applicant regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills, and to pay him the fixed weekly wage of 23s., with the usual additional pay for extra work, and also to pay him on the date hereof the sum of £90 sterling, and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act in respect of the said injury.

"You are requested to record this memorandum pursuant to paragraph 8 of the Second Schedule of the above-mentioned Act." Then followed the date of the agreement and the signatures.

The pursuer set forth the circumstances of the accident which resulted in the injury to his eye, and averred:—(Cond. 3) "The defenders, recognising that the pursuer had a serious claim both at common law and under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, at once began to negotiate a settlement with him. They were well aware that he had a wife and family dependent upon him. . . . Accordingly, they proposed that the pursuer should make an agreement with them under the Workmen's Compensation Act, in order that the pursuer might be enabled to earn substantial wages, and promised that they would receive into their employment one of the pursuer's children who was then of an age ready for work, and the younger ones as they came to be of an age for working. The defenders further . . . agreed to give the pursuer regular employment as a foreman over their workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills, paying him a fixed wage of 23s. per week, with the usual additional pay for extra work, which they promised would be equal to one day per week or 3s. 10d. of additional wages. . . . In respect of the outlay, loss, &c., consequent on the injury to the pursuer's eye, the defenders further agreed to pay the pursuer £90 sterling. In so far as the said agreement related to the matters contemplated by the Workmen's Compensation Act, a memorandum of agreement was entered into between the pursuer and defenders (a copy of which is herewith produced), and was duly recorded in the Sheriff Court Books at Edinburgh on 3d December 1903." (Cond. 4) "Acting under the said arrangement the defenders paid the said £90, and took the pursuer back temporarily into their service, but in all other respects they have grossly failed to fulfil their said agreement, and have acted in direct violation of its terms. . . . In particular, the pursuer requested that two of his younger children should be given work as promised, but this the defenders refused. The defenders, in place of giving the pursuer the position of foreman at the settling ponds, compelled him to work as a general labourer. . . . The defenders also refused to give the pursuer any opportunity of earning wages for overtime. . . . In consequence of the pursuer's attempting to hold the defenders to the said agreement, he was dismissed by them without notice or reason assigned on 3d July 1906."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders never having implemented the obligation incumbent upon them to provide the pursuer with regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds, and having, by dismissing the pursuer from their service, caused him much loss, injury, and damage, they are liable in

reparation. (2) The defenders having wrongfully dismissed the pursuer from their service, are liable in reparation. Mar. 6, 1908.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The action is incompetent as laid, in respect, inter alia, that although the claim arises out of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it seeks to add a remedy which the Act does not give. (2) The averments for the pursuer are not relevant or sufficient to support the conclusions of the summons, and the action should therefore be dismissed, with expenses. Lawrie v. Brown & Co., Limited.

On 15th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) assoltized the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerned.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The action was competent. No doubt the memorandum of agreement bore to be "in the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897," and if the document had embodied nothing else than an agreement under the Act the pursuer did not dispute that the action would have been incompetent;¹ but when the document was analysed it would be found that it embodied not one but two agreements, namely (a) a statutory agreement by which the defenders agreed to pay, and the

* "OPINION.—The defenders plead incompetency and irrelevancy.

"They say that the action is incompetent because the only claim stated by the pursuer against them arises out of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That agreement, they admit, can be enforced in all its terms under the Act, but, according to them, no part of it can be made the ground for a claim for damages at common law, such as is made in this action. The pursuer has foreseen the difficulty, and has endeavoured in cond. 3 to avoid it by representing the statutory agreement as one contract and the agreement for regular employment, which is the basis of his present claim, as another and distinct contract. But this is not so, either in fact or in law. The whole stipulations are contained in one agreement. It is headed, 'In the matter of an agreement under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,' &c., and, after detailing the terms of the agreement, including the undertaking by the defenders to give the pursuer 'regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds,' ends with these words, 'and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act in respect of the said injury.' In these circumstances, it is unsound to maintain, as the pursuer does, that the case is the same as if the stipulation as to regular employment was in a separate document containing no reference to the Act. If the contract founded on by the pursuer is part of an agreement under the Act, as I hold it is, it is not disputed that it cannot be enforced in this action.

"I also sustain the plea to the relevancy. It is not necessary to consider the pursuer's averments as to the defenders' breach of a verbal contract to employ his children, and to afford him extra work, because it was explained that these are not matter of substantive claim. Nor is any case made of want of reasonable notice, if the pursuer was truly employed by the defenders, as alleged by them, at will. The pursuer's complaint is that, while the defenders undertook to give him 'regular employment,' they only did so for nearly three years and then dismissed him. I see no breach of contract by the defenders in thus acting, unless there be read into the agreement an obligation on them to give the pursuer regular employment for life, or at least, as the pursuer contended, so long as he is able and willing to serve them and does his work properly. I see no warrant for reading any such terms into the agreement, and I therefore hold the pursuer's averments of breach of contract irrelevant."

pursuer agreed to accept, the sum of £90 as compensation under the Act; and (b) a common law agreement by which the defenders agreed to give the pursuer "regular employment." If the two agreements had been embodied in separate documents, the competency of an action laid on the common law agreement could hardly have been doubted. An agreement to give employment to a workman was obviously legal at common law; and the Act did not prohibit an employer and a workman from entering into such an agreement—the contracting-out clause of the Act¹ did not apply. The question, therefore, came to be—Did the circumstances that the two agreements were embodied in the same document, and that the document had been recorded under the Act, make the present action incompetent? The circumstance that the two agreements were in the same document was obviously in itself of no importance, and besides the £90 had been paid to the pursuer before the date of recording, so that the document had come to embody the common law agreement only. Then as to recording, the Act provided for payment of compensation in money and for nothing else,² and no amount of recording could convert an agreement to give employment into an agreement to pay money by way of compensation under the Act. If the pursuer could enforce the agreement only by way of proceedings under the Act, he could not enforce it at all, for the only way of enforcing such an agreement was by an action of damages for breach of contract, and the Act did not know of such a thing. In the first branch of Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited,³ it was held that a common law action for reduction of an agreement on the ground of minority and lesion was competent, which shewed that where there were rights which could not be enforced by proceedings under the Act, the common law was available. The second branch of Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited,⁴ had no bearing on the present case. No question was there raised as to enforcing an agreement to give employment; on the contrary the pursuer there argued that the promise of future employment in that case was according to its terms a mere promise which was not enforceable in any way, and consequently that he had suffered enorm lesion. Here on the other hand the document according to its terms embodied a contract—a contract by which the defenders "agreed" to give the pursuer "regular employment." That meant employment for life, or at all events for so long as the defenders' works existed and the pursuer was willing and able to do his duties. The defenders said that "regular" employment was opposed to "casual" employment. That distinction was illusory, since the defenders' real contention was that they were entitled to dismiss the pursuer at pleasure or at least on a short notice. If the pursuer had gone to arbitration under the Act he would have been entitled to 17s. 6d. for life. It was difficult to read the agreement as meaning that the pursuer gave up that right for £90 down and the chance of employment by the defenders.

Argued for the defenders;—(1) An injured workman had a choice of remedies; he might proceed by way of ordinary action, or he might proceed under the Workmen's Compensation Act; but if he elected to proceed under the Act he could not go back on that election—his only remedies were those provided by the Act.¹ All that the first branch of Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited,² decided was that an agreement as to compensation might be reduced on the ground of minority and lesion—obviously a very different kind of case from the present. Here the agreement bore to be an agreement under the Act; it had been recorded; and the effect of recording was that it became enforceable “in like manner as a recorded decree-arbitral.”³ That was the only remedy under the Act, and consequently the pursuer’s only remedy. To say, as the pursuer said, that there were here really two agreements, one statutory and the other at common law, and that he was entitled to enforce the common law agreement by an ordinary action of damages, was just another way of saying that, having begun proceedings under the Act he was entitled to stop these proceedings and begin proceedings at common law. There was plainly only one agreement here, and being in terms an agreement under the Act, it could be enforced, in so far as it was enforceable, only by the statutory remedy, which was to charge upon the recorded memorandum of agreement. Possibly such a charge might be inept and ineffectual in so far as the employment clauses of the agreement were concerned, but the second branch of Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited,⁴ shewed that clauses of that sort, although not in themselves enforceable, might be a valuable consideration, and therefore part of the compensation under the agreement. However (2) it was not necessary to go into the question as to what remedy, if any, would have been available to the pursuer if he had averred a proper obligation on the part of the defenders to give him employment, for he had not relevantly averred such an obligation. “Regular employment” did not mean “permanent employment”; it meant what it said,—“regular employment” and not casual employment, i.e., on odd jobs. If the agreement had specified the period for which the future employment was to endure, the case would have been very different, but the agreement did not specify such a period, and the policy of the law was against contracts which had not a definite end, and the Court would not define what the parties themselves had left undefined.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary upon both points. He has decided the case by finding that the action is bad both as being incompetent and irrelevant. Now, nothing is better settled than that you cannot proceed both under the Workmen’s Compensation Act and also independently of it, and the Workmen’s Compensation Act provides for workmen, where there has been an agreement between the parties, a short and simple remedy for working out that agreement, first, by registering the agreement, and then by making it enforceable as a Sheriff Court decree to all effects. The agreement here was signed by both parties, and from the first it seems to have been determined that it should be registered under the Act. Now, when that is so I think that all other remedy is excluded. I quite agree that the judgment in the case of Robertson v. S. Henderson & Sons, Limited,² settles that in certain circumstances there may be an action at common law. There, an agreement had been made between a minor and his employers, and it was held that it was reducible

Mar. 6, 1908. by the workman on the ground of minority and lesion, but the ground of that decision on the competency was stated by Lord Kinnear in these words:—"The Act of Parliament gives compensation in certain circumstances, and allows it to be fixed either by agreement or by arbitration. But when it allows the compensation to be fixed by agreement it assumes that the agreement is valid and binding according to law." Now of course an agreement can only be reduced under the head of minority and lesion by an action at common law. Now, what is the agreement here, and what are the circumstances of this case? The agreement was a mixed one. In the first place, it provided what the compensation to which the applicant was entitled under the Act would have been, and as to that the parties are agreed. It said that the average weekly earnings were 30s., and that the maximum compensation would therefore have been 17s. 6d., being the half thereof and of an added sum of 5s. for average overtime. And then it went on to agree that in lieu of such compensation the respondents were to give the applicant regular employment as a foreman over the workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills, and to pay him the fixed weekly wage of 23s. with the usual additional pay for extra work, "and also to pay him on the date hereof the sum of £90 sterling, and these in full of all his claims for compensation under the said Act in respect of the said injury."

Well, now, the compensation which is here referred to covers all the stipulations in his favour—that is to say, those stipulations which the respondents agreed to pay in lieu of compensation are, the £90 down and the undertaking to give regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds in connection with their works at Esk Mills at a weekly wage, with certain additional pay for extra work. It was these things which he agreed to accept as compensation under the Act, and that agreement was, as I have said, duly signed and recorded. It seems to me that the Lord Ordinary is quite right in saying that you cannot split an agreement of that kind into two. The compensation for the accident was a composite thing, part of which, I quite agree, would not have been enforceable at all, and so the Lord Ordinary held on the question of relevancy. But still I do not see how it was competent to split it into two as the workman proposes to do. He says, "I have got my £90—and that is all that was, strictly speaking, money compensation for the injury I received—but I propose to treat that separately altogether from the obligation to give regular employment in a certain capacity, which I see is not enforceable under the agreement, because it was open to a number of objections, and I can only enforce it at common law." Now, I think that is an illegitimate way of dealing with the agreement, and it was so held, as I read the agreement, in the subsequent case of Robertson v. Henderson & Sons,¹ because there the Court undoubtedly viewed the compensation as consisting partly of the promise or undertaking by the employers to give employment, although they admitted it was not enforceable at all.

Well, then, here the workman agreed to that, and it was a term of the agreement which he made under the Act, and the Lord Ordinary has held that you cannot split it into two parts and treat the one part as compensation and the other as not compensation. I think it was all compensation, Mar. 6, 1908.

and the workman took it for what it was worth, and was bound to pro- Lawrie v.
ceed as the Act directed, namely, by registering the agreement, which he Brown & Co., did, and by charging upon it as a Sheriff Court decree. I agree with Mr Limited.
Lees that it is impossible to treat a Sheriff Court decree as a thing which is LdStormonthto be split into its parts and treated differently according as one part was Darling.
and the other was not, strictly speaking, enforceable.

That concludes the Lord Ordinary's mode of dealing with the plea of incompetency, and then he goes on to deal with the relevancy, and there again he holds that the pursuer's averments are objectionable as being not relevant, because his complaint is merely that the employers failed to give him regular employment as he considers it. Now, what is the fact? They took him on as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds and kept him there for two years and a half. However, there arose a dispute between them owing to his failure to obey the orders of the foreman over the whole workers, which undoubtedly he was bound to obey. It is not said that he was not put as foreman over the workers at the settling ponds, and it cannot be contended that he was not bound to obey the foreman over the whole workers. There also I think the Lord Ordinary was perfectly right, and therefore what I propose to your Lordships is to adhere to the interlocutor which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced in both branches.

LORD LOW.—I concur. I think that when the parties recorded the agreement under section 8 of the second schedule of the Act, they elected to abide by the Act, because the effect of recording the agreement was that, as it is put in the eighth section, they obtained what was equivalent to a County Court judgment in terms of the agreement; or if we take the words of subsection (b) of the 14th section of the schedule, what was equivalent to a recorded decree-arbitral in terms of the agreement. The pursuer having therefore chosen to take a decree which he can enforce, it seems to me that he must abide by the remedy which he has chosen, and cannot throw over the registration and appeal to this Court on the ground that this is a contract having nothing to do with the Workmen's Compensation Act at all.

But even if that view were not maintainable, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the action falls to be thrown out on the ground that no relevant averment has been made. Under the agreement no doubt the employers bound themselves to give the workman regular employment as foreman over the workers at the settling pond, but no term of endurance of the employment is fixed. It was argued that the use of the word "regular" implied a term of endurance, but I do not think that is so, because I think that the word "regular" is used as distinguished from "occasional" or "intermittent," regular employment being employment which will enable the workman to earn wages regularly week by week. But as no term of endurance is fixed, I take it that the employment was necessarily employment at pleasure, and that is a contract which, in my judgment, cannot be enforced, because I do not think that the Court will ordain that to be done which may immediately be undone.

But I do not think it is necessary to go as far as that, because, assuming Mar. 6, 1908. that the employers were bound at all events to give the workman employment for some time, they have done so. They have given him the stipulated employment and paid him regularly the stipulated wages for two and a half years, and it is perfectly plain that the reason why they dismissed him in the end was that there was a dispute about the kind of work he was to perform. In these circumstances I think that it is plain that the claim of damages for breach of contract is untenable. On both branches of the case, therefore, I agree with your Lordship in the chair and with the Lord Ordinary.

Lawrie v.
Brown & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Low.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree with the result at which your Lordships have arrived, that we should affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, but I do so only on the question of relevancy, and that for the reasons stated by my brother Lord Low.

There was no duration here, and where this is so in a contract of service it is well settled that the duration of such contracts is what is customary in the employment. In the case of gamekeepers and gardeners, &c. it is usually held that the engagement is for six months or a year according to the custom of the country. With regard to workmen in a work of this kind, they usually are employed for the term of a single pay, which is generally a fortnight. I think, therefore, it is absurd to say that where, after the pursuer has been three years or so in the defenders' service, the parties having fallen out about the nature of the employment, the defenders have dismissed the pursuer, there is any relevant averment entitling him to damages, and accordingly on that ground I think the action is irrelevant, and that the defenders must be assolizied.

But I must say that I am not, without much further consideration, prepared to agree in holding that this action is incompetent. I am not convinced that it is illegal to insert an undertaking to give employment as part of a contract for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If it is not illegal to do so the question comes to be, How is such an agreement to be enforced? It is said, "Just register your memorandum, and go on and charge upon it." Now, that is all very well, but a contract of service, as is pretty well settled, is not a contract of which a Court of law will decern specific implement. But the service has come to an end, and the man has been discharged. What, then, does the pursuer's claim resolve into? If a relevant case had been stated, it would resolve into a claim of damages; but there is no procedure prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act for enforcing such a claim, and therefore I must say I am disposed to think that, if there had been a relevant case here, it was not incompetent to ask in an ordinary Court of law a remedy which could not be worked out under the Workmen's Compensation Act. We, however, have not a relevant action here, and accordingly I refrain from expressing a definite opinion on the question of competency.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was sitting in the Court of Justiciary.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), secs. 3 and 15—Contracting-out—Scheme certified under Act of 1897—Re-certification.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, came into operation on 1st July 1907. A workman entered an employment on 9th August 1907, and agreed to accept a scale of compensation provided by a scheme certified under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897,—the certificate bearing that the scheme was to expire on 31st December 1908. On 15th August 1907, when the scheme had not been re-certified under sec. 15 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the workman was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

Held, on a construction of secs. 3 and 15 of the Act of 1906, that the workman having entered on his employment after 1st July 1907, he was not barred from obtaining compensation under the Act by having agreed to accept the provisions of a scheme certified under the Act of 1897, but which had not been re-certified under the Act of 1906.

JOHN WALLACE, 9 Tobago Street, Greenock, claimed compensation in an arbitration in the Sheriff Court at Greenock under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* from R. & W. Hawthorne, Leslie, & Wallace v. Hawthorne, Leslie, & Co., Limited. 2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), enacts :—

Sec. 3. “(1) If the Registrar of Friendly Societies, after taking steps to ascertain the views of the employer and workmen, certifies that any scheme of compensation, benefit, or insurance for the workmen of an employer in any employment, whether or not such scheme includes other employers and their workmen, provides scales of compensation not less favourable to the workmen and their dependants than the corresponding scales contained in this Act, and that, where the scheme provides for contributions by the workmen, the scheme confers benefits at least equivalent to those contributions in addition to the benefits to which the workmen would have been entitled under this Act, and that a majority (to be ascertained by ballot) of the workmen to whom the scheme is applicable are in favour of such scheme, the employer may, whilst the certificate is in force, contract with any of his workmen that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of this Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme; but, save as aforesaid, this Act shall apply notwithstanding any contract to the contrary made after the commencement of this Act.”

Sec. 15. “(1) Any contract (other than a contract substituting the provisions of a scheme certified under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for the provisions of that Act) existing at the commencement of this Act, whereby a workman relinquishes any right to compensation from the employer for personal injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, shall not, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to continue after the time at which the workman's contract of service would determine if notice of the determination thereof were given at the commencement of this Act.

“(2) Every scheme under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in force at the commencement of this Act shall, if re-certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, have effect as if it were a scheme under this Act.

“(3) The Registrar shall re-certify any such scheme if it is proved to his satisfaction that the scheme conforms, or has been so modified as to conform, with the provisions of this Act as to schemes.

Limited.

The Sheriff-substitute (Neish) refused the application, and stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth as follows :—

"This is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

"The appellant applied for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, or, alternatively, under the Re-certified Scheme No. 107, which is marked B.

"The respondents maintained that the appellant is only entitled to compensation under the Certified Scheme No. 7, which is marked A.

"Parties' agents were heard by me on the 16th December 1907. No proof was led.

"The following facts were admitted :—

"On 15th August 1907 the appellant was employed by the respondents on board H.M.S. 'Agamemnon,' which was then lying at the Tail of the Bank opposite Greenock, for the purpose of undergoing official trials.

"On said date the appellant was injured on board said ship by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

"The appellant entered the respondents' employment on 9th August 1907, and agreed to accept the scale of compensation provided by the St Peter's Works, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Accident Compensation Fund Scheme, which is marked A.

"The said scheme was certified as Scheme No. 7 by the Registrar of Friendly Societies on 10th December 1903, and the certificate did not expire till 31st December 1908.

"On 18th October 1907 the said Scheme No. 7 was re-certified as Scheme No. 107 by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, in accordance with the provisions of section 15 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The said Scheme No. 107 is marked B.

"I held (1) that the appellant's claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, was excluded by his having agreed to accept the scale of compensation provided by the Scheme No. 7, marked A; and (2) that the appellant was not entitled to the increased compensation provided by the Scheme No. 107, marked B. I therefore refused the application."

The questions of law were :—"(1) Is the appellant entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? (2) Is the appellant entitled to compensation under the Scheme No. 107, marked B?"

The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears from the opinions of Lord Low and Lord Ardwall.

At advising,—

LORD LOW.—The appellant entered the employment of the respondents on 9th August 1907, and he agreed to accept the scale of compensation

tion of six months from the commencement of this Act, the certificate thereof shall be revoked.

Sec. 16. "(1) This Act shall come into operation on the first day of July 1907, but . . . shall not apply in any case where the accident happened before the commencement of this Act."

provided by a scheme which had been certified under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, as Scheme No. 7, on 10th December 1903. The certificate bore that the scheme was to expire on 31st December 1908, and accordingly it had not expired when the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, came into operation on 1st July 1907. On 18th October 1907 scheme No. 7 was, with certain modifications, re-certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies in accordance with the provisions of sec. 15 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, as scheme No. 107.

Mar. 7, 1908.
Wallace v.
Hawthorne,
Leslie, & Co.,
Limited.
Lord Low.

The appellant was injured on 15th August 1907 by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and the question is, Whether he is entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, or only under Scheme No. 7? The answer to that question depends upon the construction of secs. 3 and 15 of the Act of 1906.

By section 3 it is provided that "if the Registrar of Friendly Societies, after taking steps to ascertain the views of the employer and workmen, certifies that any scheme of compensation" satisfies certain requirements, "the employer may, whilst the certificate is in force, contract with any of his workmen that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of this Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme, but, save as aforesaid, this Act shall apply notwithstanding any contract to the contrary made after the commencement of this Act."

Now, the initial words of that section providing for certification of a scheme by the Registrar of Friendly Societies plainly refer to what may be done after the commencement of the Act, and accordingly under the final clause in the section a workman cannot be deprived after the commencement of the Act of his right to compensation under the Act by entering into a contract to the contrary, unless it be a contract to substitute for the provisions of the Act the provisions of a scheme of compensation certified by the Registrar after the commencement of the Act.

Now, the scheme of compensation which the appellant agreed to accept was not a scheme which had at the time when the agreement was made been certified by the Registrar after the commencement of the Act, and accordingly if the question raised depended only upon the third section it is clear that the appellant would not be barred by the agreement from claiming compensation under the Act.

The 15th section, however, which deals with contracts and schemes existing at the commencement of the Act, requires to be considered.

Subsection (1) provides that any contract, whereby a workman relinquishes any right to compensation, existing at the commencement of the Act, "other than a contract substituting the provisions of a scheme certified under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for the provisions of that Act," shall not, for the purposes of the Act (of 1906), be deemed to continue after the time at which the workman's contract of service would determine if notice were given at the commencement of the Act.

Then by subsection (4) it is provided that any scheme under the Act of 1897 in force at the commencement of the Act of 1906, which has not been re-certified before the expiration of six months from the commencement of

Mar. 7, 1908. that Act shall be revoked. Accordingly if a workman had before 1st July 1907, the date of the commencement of the Act of 1906, agreed to accept the provisions of a scheme certified under the Act of 1897, and if the scheme was still in force at the commencement of the new Act it would regulate the right of the workman to compensation for a period of six months after the commencement of the Act.

Wallace v.
Hawthorne,
Leslie, & Co.,

Lord Low.-

That of course does not precisely meet the present case, because the appellant agreed to accept the provisions of a scheme (namely, Scheme No. 7), certified under the Act of 1897 after the commencement of the Act of 1906, but it to some extent aids the respondents' contention that the appellant is bound to accept compensation under that scheme.

The respondents' argument was that subsections (1) and (4) of section 15 when read together shewed that a scheme certified under the Act of 1897, the period of which had not expired at the commencement of the Act of 1906, continued, at all events for the period of six months, to be an operative scheme under the latter Act, and that such a scheme continued to regulate the rights of a workman who had agreed to it before the commencement of the new Act. That being so, there was, it was contended, no reason why the scheme should not have the same effect in regard to a workman who had agreed to it while it was still in operation although after the commencement of the new Act.

I recognise the force of that argument, but I do not think that it can be sustained in face of the provisions of subsection 2 of section 15. That subsection provides that "Every scheme under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in force at the commencement of this Act shall, if re-certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, have effect as if it were a scheme under this Act."

Now, at the time when the appellant agreed to accept the provisions of Scheme No. 7 it had not been re-certified by the Registrar, and therefore could not receive effect as if it had been a scheme under the Act. What is meant by a scheme under the Act is plainly a scheme certified by the Registrar in terms of section 3 after the commencement of the Act, and, as I have already pointed out, that section declares in unequivocal terms that no contract except a contract to accept the provisions of such a scheme shall bar a workman from claiming the compensation provided by the Act. No doubt if the construction which I put upon subsections (1) and (4) of section 15 be sound, an exception from the rule laid down in the third section is made in the case of a workman who at the commencement of the Act was under contract to accept the provisions of a scheme certified under the Act of 1897, but that is the only exception which I can find.

I have therefore arrived at a different conclusion from that of the learned Sheriff-substitute, and am of opinion that the appellant is not restricted by having agreed to accept the provisions of Scheme No. 7 from claiming compensation under the Act. I accordingly think that the first question should be answered in the affirmative, and that being so, the second question does not arise.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur in the course which is proposed by Lord Low. I am of opinion that the appellant is entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and that the Sheriff's decision ought to be recalled. I do not think that the appellant's claim for compensation under the Act is excluded by his having agreed to accept the scale of compensation provided by the Scheme No. 7, marked "A." That scheme had been certified in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, on 10th December 1903, but at the time the appellant signed it it had not been re-certified after the passing of the Act of 1906, as provided by section 15, subsections 2 and 3, of that Act, and although subsequently the scheme is said to have been re-certified, yet that re-certification only took place after material alterations had been made upon it. The question is whether by signing the said Scheme "A" after the Act of 1906 had come into operation the appellant has contracted himself out of the operation of that statute. I am of opinion that he has not. Section 3 of the said Act of 1906 deals with the question of contracting out, and provides that that can only be done if the Registrar of Friendly Societies, after taking steps to ascertain the views of the employers and workmen, certifies that any scheme of compensation provides certain benefits therein specified, and if that shall have been done, the Act goes on to provide as follows:—"The employer may, while the certificate is in force, contract with any of his workmen that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of this Act, and thereupon the employer shall be liable only in accordance with the scheme, but saving as aforesaid, the Act shall apply notwithstanding any contract to the contrary made after the commencement of this Act." Now, upon the facts stated in the case, it appears that the contract signed by the appellant had not been certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies in terms of this section. Accordingly, as provided by the clause above quoted, the Act of 1906 applies notwithstanding the contract in question, which was made after the commencement of the Act. This matter is, in my opinion, quite clear so far as section 3 is concerned.

But it is said that the provisions of section 15 have the effect of rendering the scheme under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897 in force at the commencement of the Act of 1906 a valid scheme under the Act of 1906 if it is re-certified at any time before the expiration of six months from the commencement of the said Act, and in the present case this has been done. I cannot accept this reasoning. I think the result of subsection 2 of section 15 is, that until what one may call an old scheme is re-certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies it has not effect as if it were a new scheme under the Act of 1906, so far as regards workmen signing it after the commencement of the Act are concerned. Accordingly the scheme signed by the appellant was not at the time he signed it equivalent to a new scheme under section 3 of the Act of 1906. It was argued that if this be so, the Act of 1906 makes it impossible for workmen or employers to enter into a contract taking themselves out of the Act during the period elapsing between the commencement of the Act and the adjustment of a scheme under section 3, or the re-certifying of an existing scheme under the Act of 1897. It is, I think, possible that this is the effect of the Act of 1906, but this defect is not of much moment, for it only affects workmen who are entering employment for the first time between the commencement of the Act and the certification or re-certification of a scheme,

Jack's
Executor v.
Downie.

Succession—Testament—Words importing gift of heritage—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), sec. 20.—A testator by his will, dated in 1905, appointed an executor whom he directed to realise "all my estate," and to pay certain legacies. He further directed that "the residue of my estate," after payment of the legacies, should be divided among his family. The testator died possessed of both heritable and moveable property.

Held that the heritable property had been validly conveyed by the will to the executor, and that he had power to sell the same.

1ST DIVISION.

DAVID JACK died on 22d October 1906, leaving a will in the following terms:—"I, David Jack, Christmas Card Publisher, residing at Fairview Strand, in the City of Dublin, hereby revoke all Wills and Testaments heretofore made by me: I appoint Archibald Hunter, of Roselea Drive, Dennistoun, in the City of Glasgow, to be the sole executor of this my last Will and Testament. I direct my said executor immediately after my death to realise all my estate and pay all my just debts and testamentary expenses. I give and bequeath" [certain legacies]. "I direct that the residue of my estate, after the payment of the aforesaid legacies, shall be divided equally between my wife, Lucy Annie Jack, my son, James Jack, and my son, David Jack."

In addition to certain moveable estate, the testator owned a heritable property situated in Glasgow. His executor, being desirous of realising this property, exposed it for sale, when it was purchased by Robert Downie.

Questions having arisen as to the executor's title to the heritable property, and his power to sell it, a special case was presented, to which the parties were (1) Jack's executor, and (2) Robert Downie.

The first party contended that the whole estate, heritable and moveable, which belonged to the testator was validly and effectually conveyed to him by the will, and that there was an implied power of Mar. 7, 1908. sale therein.

The second party contended that the first party had no title to said heritable property, as it was not conveyed to him by the will; that the will dealt only with moveable estate, and that there were no words of direction or conveyance therein applicable to heritage in virtue of which a notarial instrument could be expedited thereon in terms of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868.* He further contended that even if the property were effectively conveyed to the first party under the will, there was no power of sale given to him therein.

Jack's
Executor v.
Downie.

The questions of law were:—"1. Has the said heritable property which belonged to the deceased been validly conveyed under said will and testament to his said executor, the first party hereto? (3) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, has the first party, as executor foresaid, power to sell said heritable property?"

Argued for the first party;—No special words were required in a will to convey heritage.¹ An executor had the same powers as a trustee.² The testator's intention to deal with his heritage appeared from the terms of the will, which was universal in form, and in particular, from the direction to realise "all" his estate. There was a presumption against partial intestacy. Wills in similar terms had been held to convey heritage.¹

Argued for the second party;—The appointment of an executor indicated the intention of the testator to deal only with his moveable estate. The word "estate" did not necessarily include heritage.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question before us is whether the executor of the late Mr Jack is in a position to give a good title to certain heritable property sold by him as executor, and that depends, in the first place, on whether the executor had right to the subjects in question, and secondly, whether he had power to sell them.

The first of these questions depends on the terms of the will and on the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 101). I need not quote the section, for your Lordships are familiar with its terms. The whole point of the section turns on the question whether the words used by the testator shew an intention to deal with heritable estate. If they do so, then the section provides that the mere absence of technical terms will not matter.

I think, looking to the terms of the will before us, there is no doubt that Mr Jack meant to dispose of his heritable estate, for he says,—“I direct my said executor . . . to realise all my estate,” and then after leaving various legacies, he goes on to direct him to divide the residue of the estate between his wife, Lucy Jack, and his sons, James and David Jack.

Now, whether the use of the word "estate" would or would not in itself be sufficient to indicate that the will was meant to apply to heritable property, I think it is perfectly clear that, when the words used are "all my estate," the whole estate, both real and personal, was meant to be conveyed. If that is so, it is obvious that the executor has right to the heritable estate, and that he has power to sell it. It would be absurd to suppose that the testator meant that the heritage was not to be realised, but to be conveyed pro indiviso to the beneficiaries under the will. If the executor has power to sell, it follows that he can give a good title to the purchaser.

I propose accordingly that we should answer the first and third questions in the affirmative. The second question is not one which should have been put to the Court.

LORD M'LAREN.—The 20th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, deals with the language necessary to pass estates from the dead to the living, and for the purpose of abolishing the peculiarity which existed in the old law with reference to heritable estate, the statute made the provision that the language used to pass moveable estate should now be sufficient to pass heritable estate if it is used with reference to heritable estate. But the 20th section does not profess to solve the question what actual words will suffice to shew that the testator intended to dispose of his heritable estate by will. Now, I think the decisions upon the latter point are on the Mar. 7, 1908. whole consistent, and they proceed upon the principle of ascertaining ^{Jack's} whether the testator had heritage in view when he made his will. In one Executor v. Downie. case the word "property" was held to be sufficient to pass heritage, and the word "estate" seems to me to be quite as general and as sufficient to pass ^{Lord M'Laren.} heritage unless where it is used in a more limited sense. I observe that in the case of Grant v. Morren,¹ where it was held that the will was not habile to convey heritage, I expressed the view that the "estate" there conveyed was confined in meaning to such estate as an executor might administer. But that case is distinguished in two important elements from the case before us. First, there was in Grant's case¹ no formal gift or direction, but only a bare appointment of an executor to perform the duties of an executor; while here, after appointing an executor, the testator goes on to bequeath legacies and to direct that his estate shall be realised and divided. But I also agree with your Lordships in holding that the word "all" is important. In cases like that of *Grant*¹ the words "my estate" may be controlled by subsequent expressions and by the terms of directions given to the executor, but that is only if the words themselves are ambiguous; and where, as in the present case, the word "estate" is joined with the word "all" there is no ambiguity, and there is no necessity of drawing inferences from other parts of the deed to explain what is already clear, and still less to limit the generality of a clause which on the face of it is a universal bequest of the testator's estate.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think that the first question in this case is solved by a consideration of two propositions, both of which have been stated by Lord President Inglis in two different cases, viz., (1) that the first question in cases of this kind is whether words importing a gift have been used in a will or testament with reference to land, and (2) that that question must be answered in the affirmative if the words employed describe either heritable estate in particular, or the testator's whole estate without distinguishing between heritable and moveable. If this is sound, the application is easy, because the testator here directs that "all" his "estate" is to be realised, and then, after certain legacies have been paid, that the residue of "my estate" is to be divided between his wife and his sons. I do not think it can be disputed that if he had said in terms, "all my estate, heritable and moveable," his intention would have been quite plain, in spite of the appointment only of an executor. It is just as plain in the will as it stands, because if a man has heritable as well as moveable estate, the direction to realise "all my estate," is not carried out if only his moveable estate is realised.

Upon the question of the power to sell, I think that follows as a matter of course, for the reasons stated by your Lordship.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 1 (3)—Arbitration proceedings—Competency—Unrecorded agreement not acted on for seven years.—In March 1899 a miner sustained injuries, by which he was totally incapacitated for his work, and by agreement with his employers he was paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from March 1899 till May 1900, at the rate of 14s. 4d. per week, being half his previous wages (the statutory maximum). No memorandum of the agreement was ever recorded, and it was never formally varied or ended under the Act. In May 1900 the employers ceased the weekly payments, and the workman returned to their service, in which he remained working and earning wages, when he was able, as a pit bottomer, till April 1907, when, as the result of his injuries in 1899, he became totally incapacitated for work. No compensation was paid to the workman between May 1900 and April 1907.

In 1907 the workman claimed compensation as from May 1900, and the employers having refused to pay compensation as claimed, he instituted arbitration proceedings under the Act. The employers maintained that in respect of the agreement arbitration was incompetent.

Held that there was no subsisting agreement between the parties, and that consequently arbitration proceedings were competent.

Expenses—Stated Case—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37)—Expenses of adjusting stated case.—Where the appellant in a stated case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, had been allowed the expenses of the stated case, the Court, following the practice adopted in the case of London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown, 1905, 7 F. 488, modified the expenses to be allowed for adjusting the stated case at the sum of £3, 3s., including the fee of £1 paid to the Sheriff-clerk.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Ayrshire.

ALEXANDER DEMPSTER, miner, Muirkirk, in 1907 instituted arbitration proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in the Sheriff Court at Ayr, against William Baird & Company, Limited, carrying on business at Muirkirk. The Sheriff-substitute (Shairp) having dismissed the application as incompetent, Dempster appealed.

The stated case for appeal was as follows:—

"This is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in which the said Alexander Dempster (who, on or about the 1st day of March 1899, whilst in the employment of the said William Baird & Company, Limited, in Lightshaw No. 1 Pit, Muirkirk, was struck by a fall of rock from the roof of said pit, and sustained severe injuries to his back, and also severe internal injuries) in an ordinary application or petition, and not by a minute, craves the Court to ascertain and fix such weekly payments as may be found to be due and payable to him under and in terms of the said Act, and to grant an award against the said William Baird & Company, Limited, in his favour, finding him entitled to such weekly payments, beginning the first payment as on the 28th day of May 1900 for the week preceding that date, and so on weekly thereafter until he is again able to earn his full wages, or such weekly payment is varied, with interest on each weekly payment at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date when the same became and becomes payable till payment, with expenses.

"The following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) That, as the result of the said injuries received by him, the said Alexander

Dempster was totally incapacitated for his work as a miner from the ^{Mar. 7, 1908.} said 1st day of March 1899—the date of the said accident—until the 21st day of May 1900. (2) That his average weekly earnings in the ^{Dempster v. Baird & Co., Limited.} employment of the said William Baird & Company, Limited, during the twelve months previous to the date of said accident were 28s. 8d. (3) That in the fourth article of the applicant's condescendence it is averred that 'the applicant, by agreement with the respondents, received compensation, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from the 15th day of March 1899 until the 21st day of May 1900, at the rate of 14s. 4d. per week'; and the answer of the said William Baird & Company, Limited, to this averment is, 'Admitted.' That, accordingly, under an agreement entered into between the applicant and the said William Baird & Company, Limited, they agreed to pay to him, and he agreed to accept and receive from them as compensation, under said Act, for his said injuries, the sum of 14s. 4d. weekly from the 15th day of March 1899. That it was not averred or proved that such agreement had been ended or varied, and that no memorandum of said agreement was sent to the Sheriff-clerk, or recorded by him in the special register. (4) That, on or about the 21st day of May 1900, the said William Baird & Company, Limited, ceased to pay to the said Alexander Dempster the said weekly payments, but gave him employment as a pit bottomer, and that the said Alexander Dempster worked when he was able for the said William Baird & Company, Limited, as a pit bottomer from about the said 21st day of May 1900 till about the 1st day of April 1907, when, as the result of his said injuries, he became totally incapacitated for even light work, and ceased working altogether. And (5) that the said William Baird & Company, Limited, refused to pay him compensation from and after the said 21st day of May 1900.

"On these admitted or proved facts I sustained pleas in law stated for the said William Baird & Company, Limited, to the effect that their liability to pay compensation under the said Act to the said Alexander Dempster having been settled by agreement between him and them (a memorandum of which agreement might have been recorded by the said Alexander Dempster, in terms of section 8 of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and upon an extract of which recorded memorandum the said William Baird & Company, Limited, might have been charged to pay to the said Alexander Dempster the weekly payments agreed upon), his application for arbitration was incompetent; and I accordingly dismissed the application, and found the said Alexander Dempster liable to the said William Baird & Company, Limited, in their expenses of process."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court is:—"Was the Sheriff-substitute right in holding that, the compensation due to the applicant having been settled by agreement between him and the respondents, the proper course for the applicant to have adopted was to have recorded a memorandum of said agreement, and charged the respondents thereunder; and that the present application for arbitration is incompetent, because an agreement as to the compensation to be paid to the applicant by the respondents has been entered into between the parties?"*

Mar. 7, 1908.

Dempster v.
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

The case was heard before the Second Division on 21st and 22d January 1908.

Argued for the claimant and appellant;—There was no subsisting agreement between the parties. The original agreement had been brought to an end by the termination of the workman's incapacity, and his return to work. No compensation had been paid or demanded under it for seven years. In these circumstances it must be held that the parties had agreed to terminate the agreement. No memorandum had been recorded. There was therefore nothing here equivalent to a decree which could be held to remain in force till formally abrogated. The workman could not have recorded the original agreement at the date when his incapacity recurred. As there was no subsisting and enforceable agreement, arbitration proceedings were competent.¹ The parties were at issue as to the amount and duration of the compensation.² The case of *Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore*³ proceeded on the view that there was there a subsisting agreement.

Argued for the respondents;—Where there was an agreement arbitration was excluded.⁴ The Sheriff as arbiter had jurisdiction to determine whether he had jurisdiction, and for that purpose to determine whether or not there was a subsisting agreement.⁵ Here he had determined that there was a subsisting agreement. That was a question of fact on which his decision was final and not subject to review. But apart from that there was here a subsisting agreement. The only ground of the workman's claim was the agreement. An agreement subsisted until it was reviewed or modified, or ended under the Act. At least it continued in force as long as there was incapacity on the part of the workman, as there was here. The fact that payments had been discontinued for a time was irrelevant. The workman might waive his right to payments under an agreement in whole or in part for any particular period, but that did not terminate the agreement. The workman's proper course was to record a memorandum of the agreement.⁶ Once there was an agreement, parties could proceed only as on agreement, and could not resort to arbitration as if there had never been an agreement. This was so even if the parties had come to disagree. The only competent course in that case was to apply for alteration of the agreement in the way provided this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act (including any question as to whether the employment is one to which this Act applies) or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the Second Schedule to this Act."

Dempster v.
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

At advising on 7th February 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very exceptional and peculiar case. The workman, whose injury occurred in the early part of 1899, agreed with his employers to accept a certain weekly payment in respect of incapacity, and this was paid down to May 1900. At that time payments as for compensation were stopped, and the workman was taken back into the employment as a bottomer, and paid by wages for his work. He neither asked for nor received any money in name of compensation for the injury. No agreement was registered, and for seven years the work was continued to him, and the wages for the work given to him. Then a new state of matters arose. The injury he had received had not been cured, for he again became incapacitated by reason of the injury, and now remains incapacitated.

Such being the facts, the question arises whether the workman, being now incapacitated by the injury incurred seven years ago, is entitled to ask for compensation in an arbitration. The Sheriff-substitute has held that he cannot competently do so—that as there was an agreement for compensation in 1899, the workman's course was to register a memorandum of that agreement in terms of the Act, and insist on his compensation being paid to him under it. I am of opinion that the view of the Sheriff-substitute is erroneous.

The agreement of 1899 was one on the footing of total incapacity, and when in 1900 total incapacity ceased, the agreement must have been modified if the master so required, either by a new agreement or, if the agreement was put on the register, by the Sheriff being called upon to reduce the amount payable. No such proceedings took place. The master simply refused to pay any more, in respect he was employing the workman and paying him wages, and the workman was accepting the wages and claiming no compensation. The course of things, therefore, during the seven years was not regulated by the agreement—there was no agreement which applied to the circumstances, for an agreement based on ascertained total incapacity, and implemented by payments applicable only to total incapacity, could not apply to a case where a workman was earning the full wages of the employment which he was offered and accepted, and was receiving nothing else.

The workman now comes forward demanding to be paid compensation for all the past seven years, and to this end brings a petition in ordinary form for an arbitration under the statute. I cannot hold that he is debarred from instituting such a proceeding, he being now incapacitated. I say nothing as to whether he can succeed in his demand for compensation during the seven years when he was in employment on wages. The only question before the Court now is whether his present proceeding is bad from incompetency. The question put raises that question only, and I

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—If the facts stated by the Sheriff had admitted of it, there would have been a great deal to be said for his view in law that the proper course for the workman to have adopted was to have registered a memorandum of agreement, and that the course which he actually did adopt, viz., to bring an application for arbitration, was incompetent. The argument in support of the Sheriff's view comes somewhat strangely from the employers, because it is to all appearance very much against their interest.

But I do not think that the facts, viewed as a whole, warrant that conclusion, and I think we are bound to take the facts as they are stated, without regard to the pleadings of parties.

The agreement admittedly made, and for fourteen months acted on, viz., from 15th March 1899 to 21st May 1900, was not a recent agreement, and a good deal has happened since then. First, on 21st May 1900, the employers ceased to make the weekly payments which they had agreed upon, and gave the workman employment as a pit bottomer. It is not said at what wage; but whatever it was it was wage and not compensation which the workman presumably accepted, for it is expressly found that the original agreement of 15th March 1899 was never ended or varied under paragraph 12 of Schedule I. of the Act. Then a period of seven years elapsed; and it is further found that on 1st April 1907 the workman became totally incapacitated for even light work "as the result of his said injuries," and that he ceased working altogether. Finally, it is found that the employers "refused to pay him compensation from and after the said 21st day of May 1900."

I do not understand how that is consistent with there being a continuing and subsisting agreement during all that period of more than seven years that the employers should pay him compensation at the full rate of 14s. 4d. weekly. In other words, I do not understand how it can be said that there was an agreement, when both parties shewed by their conduct that there was no agreement. If there was no such subsisting agreement, how can the Sheriff's finding in law be justified? It is suggested that the Sheriff must have been satisfied on that head, or he would not have pronounced his finding in law. I admit that Lord Kyllachy at one point of his opinion in *Colville v. Tigus*¹ (p. 183) said that the statutory tribunal "might have to decide incidentally whether some agreement submitted to it as excluding its jurisdiction is a real agreement and a subsisting agreement." But he also said (p. 184) that "if the Sheriff thought (as perhaps he might) that there was no subsisting agreement—that on its just construction the alleged agreement came to an end when the incapacity in fact ceased—his duty was to proceed to arbitrate (under section 1, subsection 3); but, doing so, to reject the applicant's claim as wholly unfounded. There was no third course open to him." In my own opinion in Colville v. Tigus,¹ I see I expressed the view (at p. 187) that the application for arbitration in that case was "competently brought," and Lord Low's opinion was distinct (p. 190), that "there was nothing in the Act which, when there is only an unrecorded agreement to pay compensation during incapacity, compels the employer to continue payment after the incapacity has in fact ceased." The actual decision in Colville v. Tighe,¹ in the course of which *Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore*² was cited, was that the employers "were not liable to pay compensation to the respondent from the date at which his incapacity ceased to the date of the arbitrator's award." The facts of that case were that the accident happened on 24th August 1903, that the employers agreed with the workman to pay him compensation at a certain rate during the period of his incapacity; that this agreement was not recorded; that the employers made payments to him in terms of the agreement down to 14th December 1903; that they then ceased to make payments, alleging that the workman's incapacity had ceased and offering him work at full wages, which he declined; that in March 1905 the workman instituted proceedings by way of arbitration before the Sheriff; that the Sheriff found that incapacity had ceased by 14th December 1903, but ordained the employers to make payment to the workman at the agreed-on rate from 14th December 1903 to 12th July 1905, being the date of his award; and he assoilzied the employers from any claim for future compensation.

Dempster v.
Baird & Co.,

LdN Stormonth-
Darling.

Now, these facts are not precisely similar to those in the present case, but they resemble them very closely. In particular, they resemble them in respect that years had elapsed since the original agreement had been made—in Colville's case¹ two, in this case more than seven years—and that a different kind of contract, viz, an agreement for wages, had been substituted for an agreement to pay compensation. In *Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore*² I admit there was the same feature as in the present case of a refusal by the employers to continue payments under the original agreement, and yet the Court seems to have held that the workman was still entitled to have the agreement recorded, and they remitted to the Sheriff to dismiss the application for arbitration. But the agreement in that case was de recenti, i.e., within a year from the date of the accident, and the sole reason for the application for arbitration would seem to have been to provide for the event of supervening incapacity. I do not therefore think that the case has any real application. The more recent case of Beath & Keay v. Ness,³ where a workman had returned to the same employment on wages, and the cases which have followed it, seem to be much more in point.

In short, I am of opinion that we are entitled and bound, as in every case of mixed fact and law, to take the facts of the case as a whole, in order to do justice between the parties, and, if we are satisfied that the agreement of 15th March 1899 has ceased to be since 21st May 1900, and is not now, a subsisting agreement, that we should so hold, and that we should answer the sole question of law—which is, whether the present application for arbitration is incompetent—in the negative, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed with it as may be just.

LORD LOW.—So long ago as 1st March 1899 the appellant was injured while in the employment of the respondents, and an agreement was entered into whereby the respondents agreed to pay to the appellant as compensation under the Act 14s. 4d. weekly, that being the statutory maximum amount. The respondents paid that amount to the appellant weekly from 15th March 1899 until the 21st May 1900. No memorandum of the agreement has been recorded, and the Sheriff-substitute states that "it was not averred or proved that such agreement had been ended or varied." The Sheriff-substitute then states that on 21st May 1900 the respondents ceased to pay the weekly payments to the appellant, but gave him employment as a pit-bottomer, and that he worked in that capacity from 21st May 1900 till 1st April 1907, when, as the result of his injuries, he became totally incapacitated. I assume, although it is not stated in the case, that during that period the appellant was paid wages.

In these circumstances the appellant instituted arbitration proceedings under sec. 1 (3) of the Act, in which he claims compensation from and after 21st May 1900.

The Sheriff-substitute has dismissed the application as incompetent, on the ground that the proper course for the appellant to follow was to record a memorandum of the agreement and charge the respondents thereon.

Now, the agreement entered into between the parties in 1899 being an agreement under the statute was of course only an agreement on the respondents' part to pay compensation to the appellant during incapacity. Further, the amount fixed by the agreement being the maximum amount allowed by the statute was payable only during total incapacity. Whenever the appellant ceased to be totally incapacitated the respondents were entitled to have the amount fixed by the agreement reduced, and it could have been reduced either by an arbiter in an application for review of the weekly payments, or by agreement. Now, from the 21st of May 1900 until the 1st of April 1907, a period of nearly seven years, the appellant was not totally incapacitated, because during that period he was working and receiving wages. We are not told what the amount of his wages was, but we are told that he received no compensation. In these circumstances it seems to me that during the seven years the rights and obligations of parties could not possibly be regulated by the original agreement. The natural inference from the facts which are stated is that during that period the respondents gave the appellant employment according to his capacity, and that in consideration thereof, and of the wages which he thereby earned, he made no claim for compensation. If, however, that was what happened, the parties were during these seven years proceeding upon an agreement, express or implied, which was different from, and for the time superseded, the original agreement. It is perhaps possible that all the time the appellant was claiming compensation as well as wages, but if so, then there was no agreement applicable to the circumstances, because as the appellant was earning wages he could not claim the maximum amount, which was all that the original agreement provided for.

The appellant is now claiming that he was entitled to some compensation during the whole of the seven years, and the question really is whether he has adopted a competent method of enforcing that claim. If I am right in thinking that in consequence of the change of circumstances—the partial recovery of the appellant, and his employment by and receipt of wages from Mar. 7, 1908. the respondents—the original agreement could not be appealed to as settling the rights and obligations of parties during the seven years, I think that the appellant was entitled to make an application under section 1 (3) of the Act, because his claim raises questions as to whether he is entitled to compensation at all during the seven years, and if so to what amount—questions in regard to which the parties are not agreed.

Dempster v. Baird & Co., Limited.

Lord Low.

No doubt it would have been competent for the appellant to register a memorandum of the original agreement, and to charge the respondents thereon, and if that had been done the question of the appellant's right to compensation during the seven years could have been raised by a suspension of the charge. But, although such a proceeding might be competent, I think that it would be less consonant with the intention of the Legislature than the course which the appellant has adopted, because it was evidently intended that such questions should, as far as possible, be kept out of the Courts of law, and determined by arbitration.

I have dealt solely with the question of the pursuer's claim for compensation during the seven years, because it appears that that is the only matter in controversy, the respondents' counsel having stated that they admitted the appellant's rights to, and are willing to pay to him, full compensation from the date when he again became totally incapacitated.

It was argued, however, that all inquiry is excluded, and that there is no room for arbitration, in respect that the Sheriff-substitute has stated as matter of fact that it was not averred or proved that the original agreement had "been ended or varied." That statement, however, must be read along with that which immediately follows in regard to what happened during the seven years. But when these two statements are read together it seems to me to be plain that all that the Sheriff-substitute means when he says that the original agreement has not been ended or varied is, that it has not been formally ended or varied, as, for example, by the determination of an arbiter under an application for review of the weekly payments.

I am therefore of opinion that the question in the case should be answered in the negative, and the case remitted back to the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD ARDWALL.—This stated case, both as regards the statement of facts and the question of law, is a far from satisfactory document.

The first part of the question of law is put on this assumption,—“The compensation due to the applicant having been settled by agreement between him and the respondents,” and the second part of the question is put upon this assumption, that “an agreement as to the compensation to be paid to the applicant by the respondents has been entered into between the parties.” These assumptions appear to amount to this, that at the date when the arbitration proceedings were initiated there was a subsisting agreement between the workman and the employers as to the rate of compensation to be paid to him at that and any future time until the weekly payment thereby provided should be ended, diminished, or increased in terms of section 12 of the First Schedule of the Act, or otherwise ended.

If this is so, it is surprising that the Sheriff-substitute or anyone else could consider it necessary to have a stated case at all, because under subsec-

Mar. 7, 1908. tion 3 of section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, arbitration is only competent if the question as to the amount of compensation is "not settled by agreement," and according to the question and statement of the case the compensation due to the appellant was and is "settled by agreement"; but I agree with your Lordships that we are not bound to answer the question as put, but must take the real facts of the case apart from the gloss put upon them by the Sheriff-substitute.

Dempster v.
Baird & Co.,
Limited.

Lord Ardwall.

It is, I think, apparent that at the date of the commencement of the arbitration proceedings the unrecorded agreement which was entered into, and which had no definite period of endurance, had by common consent been allowed to lapse, and further, that at the date of the arbitration the parties were in dispute as to what compensation should be paid for the present and the future. Accordingly I have no difficulty in holding that when the arbitration proceedings commenced, the agreement of 1899, such as it was, had lapsed, and that an entirely new state of matters had arisen, in which the parties were in dispute regarding the amount of compensation payable to the applicant, and regarding which compensation accordingly the arbitration was perfectly competent.

I accordingly agree that we should answer the question put in the case by finding that in the circumstances the appellant's application for arbitration was competent, and should remit to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the same.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the question of law . . . in the negative: Therefore sustain the appeal, recall the dismissal of the application, and remit to the arbitrator to proceed thereon as accords: Find and declare accordingly, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to his expenses of the stated case, and remit the same to the Auditor to tax and to report."

In his account of expenses the appellant's agent charged the sum of £5, 9s. for the preparation of the stated case prior to its presentation in Court. In this sum was included the fee of £1 payable to the Sheriff-clerk for preparing the case under the Act of Sederunt of 3d June 1898, sec. 9 (a). A large part of the amount charged, which was set forth in detailed items, was for correspondence and attendances with the Sheriff-clerk and the respondents' agents in connection with representations made by the appellant regarding the proposed statement of facts and question of law in the draft stated case as issued by the Sheriff-clerk. Of the sum so charged the Auditor allowed £5, 0s. 8d.

The respondents objected to the Auditor's report in respect that he had allowed the sum of £5, 0s. 8d. for the items charged in connection with the preparation of the stated case, which they maintained should not be charged at more than £2, 2s. At the discussion on the objection to the Auditor's report, which took place before the Second Division (Lord Stormonth-Darling, Lord Low, and Lord Ardwall) on 7th March 1908, counsel for the objectors (the respondents) in support of the objections cited *London and Edinburgh Shipping Co. v. Brown*¹ and *M'Govern v. Cooper & Co.*²

Counsel for the appellant contended :—The rule established by the case of *Brown*¹ was that a successful party who had been found entitled, as here, to the expenses of the stated case was entitled to the expenses fairly and reasonably incurred by him in connection with the preparation of the stated case. The successful party in *Brown*¹ was the respondent, and so there the fee of £1 to the Sheriff-clerk paid by the appellant was not included in the £2, 2s. allowed. It was plain that £2, 2s., including the fee of £1, was less than was fair and reasonable. What was disallowed in *Brown*¹ was a fee to counsel and charges for instructions to and attendance with counsel. There was no such fee or charges here.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—We shall adopt the practice in Brown's case¹ to the extent of modifying the fee to be allowed to the appellant at three guineas, which includes the £1 paid to the Sheriff-clerk.

The wife went to reside in Paisley, and in April 1902 received parochial relief from Paisley. Row reimbursed Paisley for the advances made. After doing so for two and a half years Row repudiated further liability, on the ground that the husband had lost his settlement in that parish by non-residence for the statutory period of three years, and that his wife's settlement, which was derived from him, had lapsed also.

In an action by the relieving parish against Row and against the Parish Council of Glasgow, held (by First Division with three consulted Judges) that the wife was the pauper; that her settlement remained unchanged during chargeability; and that Row was still liable for her support.

Observations per the Lord President as to the application of the presumption of life in poor-law cases.

Beattie v. Adamson, 5 Macph. 47, followed.

ON 28th October 1905 the Parish Council of the parish of Paisley raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against the Parish Council of the parish of Row and the Parish Council of the parish of Glasgow, for relief of advances made and to be made by the pursuers to or on account of Mrs Elizabeth Craig Logan or Wright, Paisley.

The pursuers subsequently, by minute, restricted their claim to the sums disbursed up to the end of October 1905.

The following narrative of the facts, which were not in dispute, is taken from the note of the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe):—

“Daniel Wright was born in Glasgow in 1859, but he resided at Shandon for thirteen years prior to October 1901, thereby acquiring a residential settlement in Row parish. In October 1901 he disappeared and has not since been heard of. He left his wife and family at Shandon. The deserted wife and three dependent children went to Paisley, where they seemed to have struggled along without parish aid till April 1902. The wife then applied to Paisley Parish, and she, being a proper subject for relief, Paisley, on 22d April 1902, granted her relief. Paisley Parish gave statutory relief notice to Row Parish on 14th May 1902, and Row recognised liability. Row reimbursed Paisley down to January 1905. Row then declined to pay upon the ground that the settlement of the wife in Row was only a derivative settlement following that of her husband, and that the husband's settlement in Row (which was only a residential settlement) had lapsed in October 1904, that is, when he had ceased to reside in the parish for three years, the wife's settlement lapsing with it.

"Paisley, then, in January 1905, gave statutory notice of chargeability to Glasgow, the parish of the husband's birth," which repudiated liability.

In October 1901, when he deserted his wife, Wright was admittedly an able-bodied man.

The defenders the Parish Council of Row pleaded;—(2) In respect that the said Daniel Wright, who was an able-bodied man not entitled to relief, has not resided in the parish of Row since October 1901, he lost his residential settlement in that parish in November 1904, and on intimation thereof to the pursuers as condescended upon, the liability of the said parish ceased, and the defenders the Parish Council of the parish of Row are therefore entitled to absolvitor.

The Parish Council of Glasgow pleaded that the wife was the pauper, and that her settlement could not change during chargeability.

On 18th December 1905 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that pursuers since 22d April 1902 have been affording relief to Elizabeth Craig Logan or Wright, a deserted wife with three dependent children, who is a proper subject of relief; (2) that pursuers disbursed said relief on behalf of the parish of Row; (3) that up till January 1905 these defenders reimbursed pursuers; (4) that these defenders have since failed to pay; (5) that the sums sued for are payments for which these defenders are bound to reimburse pursuers; (6) that no relevant case has been stated against the other defenders the parish of Glasgow: Therefore dismisses the action quoad the first defenders: Decerns as craved, qualified by minute of restriction, No. 10 of process, against the second defenders the Parish Council of the parish of Row," &c.*

* "NOTE.—(After the narrative above quoted)—It is clear that Paisley must be relieved, and the question is whether liability rests with Row or Glasgow.

"Row has been bearing the burden all along, for Paisley was only paying on behalf of Row. It is a circumstance of importance that the chargeability has been continuous since relief was first given in April 1902. Accordingly, Glasgow pleads the recognised principle that settlement cannot change during the currency of chargeability, and so that this action, so far as laid against Glasgow, is irrelevant, or at least premature. In other words, Glasgow pleads that Row cannot escape liability unless Row can either locate the deserting husband or prove that he is dead.

"The question in effect comes to be this: Which parish has the onus of proof as regards the whereabouts of the husband?

"It is important to note that the wife never was a pauper in her own right. Row relieved her only because at the time she became chargeable

On 14th March 1906 the Sheriff (Guthrie), on appeal, adhered.

The Parish Council of Row appealed to the Court of Session.

On 22d November 1907 the case was appointed to be heard before the First Division along with three Judges of the Second Division.

The case was heard on 4th February 1908 before the Lord President, the Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lords M'Laren, Kinnear, Stormonth-Darling, Ardwall, and Guthrie.

Parish Council
of Paisley v.
Parish Councils of Row and
Glasgow.

Argued for the appellants ;—In questions of parochial relief, desertion was not equivalent to death to the effect of giving a deserted wife the capacity to acquire a settlement different from that of her husband.¹ The settlement of a wife, even though deserted, was derived from that of her husband, and when his settlement changed, her settlement, and her consequent chargeability, changed also.² This appeared by contrast with the rule under the Lunacy Act, 1857, section 75.³ The principle that continuous chargeability prevented a change of settlement only applied in cases where the pauper had a settlement in his or her own right.⁴ The case of *Beattie v. Adamson*⁵ was distinguishable. In that case the judgment proceeded upon the admission of parties that the health of the pauper was such that its father could never be called upon to support it,⁶ and accordingly its settlement was wholly dissociated from that of its father. Applying these principles, the Parish Council of Row were relieved of liability if they succeeded in shewing that the deserting husband had lost his residential settlement in Row, and this they had done by proving his absence from Row for more than the statutory period.⁷ It was not necessary to prove that he had not died within the statutory period, for the presumption was in favour of life.⁸ Nor was it necessary to prove that he had acquired a settlement elsewhere, for the loss of his

the husband (not being absent three years) still had a residential settlement in Row, and it is urged for Row that the principle of no change of liability during continuity of relief applies only where a pauper has a claim of relief in her own right, and does not therefore apply to the present case.

"There is no definite authority upon the point raised, but I think the principle is the same upon whatever ground the relieving parish originally became liable. The parish which is saddled with the liability must go on bearing it until that parish can shift it—that is, in the present case, Row must go on paying till Row can do one of three things, (1) discover the husband in an able-bodied condition to support his wife ; or (2) prove that, if he is alive and not able-bodied, the husband had, subsequent to October 1901, acquired a residential settlement in some other parish ; or (3) prove that the husband is dead.

"Row's plea that Glasgow is liable is founded only upon the non-residence of the husband in Row parish for three years. But that negative fact is not, in my opinion, sufficient to interrupt the continuity of relief. Row must be able to plead something positive before Row can drop the burden on to another parish."

Parish Council
of Paisley v.
Parish Councils of Row and
Glasgow.

Argued for the respondents (Parish Council of Glasgow);—When a pauper in receipt of parochial relief was chargeable against a parish in virtue of a settlement there—either original or derivative—that parish remained liable until it could prove that the pauper had acquired a settlement elsewhere.¹ In the present case, even on the assumption that the settlement of the wife changed with that of her husband, the onus was not discharged by shewing that the husband had been absent from Row for more than the statutory period. He might have died within that period, for in this case there was no room for the presumption of life.² On the facts as ascertained, it was the wife and not the husband who was the pauper, and so long as she remained the pauper, and chargeable, her settlement could not be changed.³

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In October 1901 Daniel Wright, who was by trade a gardener, and was living in Row with his wife and three dependent children, deserted his family. His birth parish was Glasgow, where he was born on 11th July 1859. He had, however, acquired a settlement by residence in the parish of Row. In April 1902 his deserted family, who had gone to Paisley, obtained parochial relief from Paisley. In these circumstances Paisley sent notice to Row claiming relief from that parish in respect of the settlement by residence. Row admitted liability, and continued to maintain the wife and children down to January 1905. At that date Row notified Paisley that the deserting husband had lost his settlement in Row by non-residence, repudiated liability for further advances, and called upon Paisley to claim against Glasgow, the husband's birth parish. Paisley notified Glasgow accordingly, but was by them referred back to Row as the parish still liable. It is matter of admission that liability is upon one or other of the defenders. It is further admitted (1) that there has been no break in the chargeability of the wife since relief was first given by Paisley in 1902; and (2) that from the date of his leaving Row in October 1901 the husband has not been back in that parish. It is not admitted that no settlement has meantime been acquired by him in any other parish; and the case must be decided on the footing that he has simply not been heard of since he deserted his family in 1901.

Had this case come up for decision before the case of *Rutherglen*⁴ was decided in the House of Lords, the solution would have been easy. The deserted wife had no husband, for desertion was equivalent to death. Being therefore the pauper, there could obviously be no change in her settlement during the continuance of chargeability. But the Rutherglen case⁴ destroyed the doctrine of desertion being equivalent to death, and the real question argued in this case is whether the House of Lords judgment carries as a corollary the deciding of this case in favour of Row. Technically speaking, the House of Lords decided no more than this: that a deserted wife whose husband was still known to be alive could not Mar. 11, 1908. acquire an industrial settlement for herself, and that consequently on her relapse into pauperism her settlement was as it had always been, i.e., her husband's settlement. But I need scarcely say that if I thought the opinions of the noble and learned Lords, or the logical deduction to be drawn from these opinions, lead to a certain conclusion, I should hold myself bound to follow them. I am, however, of opinion that the House of Lords judgment in the Rutherglen case¹ does not really touch the considerations on which this case must be decided. The whole difficulty, I think, arises from not distinguishing between derivative pauperism (if I may coin an expression to make my meaning clear), which is one thing, and derivative settlement, which is another. It is necessary for me to press this point, because the learned Sheriff-substitute whose judgment, affirmed by the Sheriff, is under appeal, and whose conclusions I agree with, begins his opinion with a proposition which, if true, would, I think, entirely vitiate the conclusions which follow. He says,—“It is important to note that the wife never was a pauper in her own right.” If she was not, then the husband was the pauper at the moment she became chargeable. And just as by working elsewhere he can acquire a new residential settlement although his wife is getting relief (Wallace v. Turnbull),² so also by his absence merely, he can (the doctrine of desertion as equivalent to death being exploded) lose the residential settlement he acquired, and revert to his birth settlement. Indeed it would come to this, that unless you could presume him dead (for which upon the dates there is certainly no ground) he might have a settlement in any parish in Scotland except only Row, where alone it is positively known he has not been for the last three years. This argument, upon the assumption made, seems to me irresistible. But I think the assumption is clearly wrong. When a wife is found deserted and unable to support herself, it is she who is a proper object of parochial relief, and it is she who is the pauper. If this were not so, then *Wallace v. Turnbull*² would be bad law, because a man cannot be a pauper and at the same time acquire a residential settlement. Then comes the question, What is her settlement? Being a wife her settlement is necessarily derivative from her husband—it is a mere accident whether at the moment when the wife's settlement has to be sought for the husband's settlement is his birth settlement or a residential settlement. In either case it fixes the settlement of the pauper, the deserted wife. Nothing after that can, I think, happen until there is a change of circumstances. Putting out of view the possibility of some extraneous aid being given to the wife, which, of course, would put an end de facto to her chargeability, the only change of circumstances must consist in the discovery of the husband alive, for, if he is dead, it is clear that the settlement of the widow, as she now is, continues what it has been all through the period of chargeability. If the husband is discovered alive, then, if he is able-bodied, it is he who is bound to support his wife, and if he is not, then he becomes the pauper, and the wife a dependent on him, her relief being his relief, and the parish ultimately liable being the parish of the settlement of the

Mar. 11, 1908. pauper, the husband, as that settlement is then discovered to be. All this seems to me really decided in terms by the case of Beattie v. Adamson.¹

Parish Council of Paisley v. There a pupil child subject to fits was held in fact to be a proper object of relief in its own right. Its settlement was necessarily the settlement of its father, which happened at the time of the inception of relief to be a residential settlement. The father subsequently lost that residential settlement. The child received continuous relief. It was held that the parish of the residential settlement was still liable, notwithstanding that the father, from whom the settlement was originally derived, had admittedly lost his own settlement therein, and had either acquired a new residential settlement, or reverted to his birth settlement. I can see no difference in principle between that case and this. The effect of the discovery of the father alive is different, because, although able-bodied, he was poor and was not liable to support a child in the state of health that this one was, whereas, in this case, the husband, if able-bodied, however poor, is liable to support the wife. But in that case if the father had been in affluent circumstances, the child would have ceased to be in a position de jure to receive relief, the chargeability would have ended, and the settlement of the child would then have followed the settlement of the father, just as here the settlement of the wife would follow that of the husband if discovered.

Ld. President. ment. The child received continuous relief. It was held that the parish of the residential settlement was still liable, notwithstanding that the father, from whom the settlement was originally derived, had admittedly lost his own settlement therein, and had either acquired a new residential settlement, or reverted to his birth settlement. I can see no difference in principle between that case and this. The effect of the discovery of the father alive is different, because, although able-bodied, he was poor and was not liable to support a child in the state of health that this one was, whereas, in this case, the husband, if able-bodied, however poor, is liable to support the wife. But in that case if the father had been in affluent circumstances, the child would have ceased to be in a position de jure to receive relief, the chargeability would have ended, and the settlement of the child would then have followed the settlement of the father, just as here the settlement of the wife would follow that of the husband if discovered.

The fallacy of the opposite argument may, I think, be tested in another way. It is said that the husband has certainly lost his settlement in Row. Now, that is necessarily based on the assumption that he lived for three years after he disappeared, for, if he died within the three years, then his settlement in Row remains a historic fact unaltered, and the case comes to be the ordinary one of a widow who, at the moment of pauperism, still retains the derivative residential settlement of her husband, and it is well settled that so long as she remains a pauper no change takes place. Now, while I agree that there is no presumption that the disappeared man is dead, yet, if Erskine's view be the true one (see Inst. iv. 2, 36), the presumption of life would not be available where the person pleading it did not do so in defence, but needed it to found his plea. In one of the cases Lord Deas, although he does not express it in the same words, seems to have held the same opinion, because he said he did not think the presumption of life was applicable to poor-law cases.²

For these reasons I am of opinion, though on grounds differently expressed, that the decision of the Sheriffs is right, and should be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in your Lordship's opinion. I will only add that the first principle to be applied to cases of this kind is that every pauper who has a claim for relief must continue to be supported by the parish of settlement until that parish can establish a claim against some other parish. If the husband of this woman could be traced, it would either be found that he had acquired a settlement in some other parish, or that he had not. If he had another settlement, then, of course, the woman would be entitled to relief from that quarter, and the new settlement would be liable on exactly the same ground as Row is at present liable, viz., the ground of derivative settlement. But the case is, that nothing whatever is known about the deserting husband, and it cannot be assumed that he has acquired a new settlement, or that he has reverted to his birth settlement, or that he has any settlement in this world at all. He may be dead for anything we know to the contrary.

Lord M'Laren.

While I agree with your Lordship that this is a case of a pauper receiving relief in her own right, because her husband is not a pauper—has never applied for relief—that does not seem to me really to be decisive of the question, which I think depends upon the principle that Row must continue to be liable until the Parish Council is able to shew that there is another parish against whom a preferable claim can be made.

Feb. 27, 1908.

Minor and Pupil—Custody and Access—Access to child by divorced wife—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. cap. 27).—Circumstances in which the Court refused to ordain the father of a boy seven years of age to allow the mother (who had been divorced from the father for adultery) access to the boy, on the ground that it might be prejudicial to the boy.

C. D. v. A. B.

IN December 1907 Mrs C. D., wife of E. D., and at one time the wife of A. B., presented a petition in which she prayed the Court to find that she was entitled to access at all reasonable times to the only son of her marriage with A. B.

A. B. lodged answers.

The petitioner averred:—(2) In April 1898 the petitioner, then a domiciled American, was married to the respondent, a domiciled Scotsman, in New York. Two children were born of the marriage, viz.:—the son, who was born in November 1900, and a daughter, born in October 1903. On 8th June 1905 the Superior Court of the State of Indiana, U.S.A., pronounced a decree, at the instance of the petitioner, dissolving the marriage on the ground of the respondent's cruelty, and giving the custody of the boy to the respondent and of the girl to the petitioner. In September 1905 the petitioner was married to E. D. and resided with him in New York. The respondent "being advised that, in view of his Scots domicile, said decree of divorce was ineffectual, obtained decree of divorce from the petitioner on the ground of adul-

Feb. 27, 1908. and kept by him from" her mother "until February 1906. In August 1906 the petitioner came to London in the hope of seeing her son, but was unable to do so. In April 1907" her mother "offered, on condition of being allowed a limited custody of the boy, to maintain, clothe, and educate him, and to make an inter vivos settlement in trust for his behoof of a sum sufficient to yield £150 to £200 per annum. . . ." Her mother "resided in England, with the exception of one or two short absences, from February 1906 until 1st August 1907, since which date she has resided in Scotland, and she is willing to make a home in this country where the boy could be received by the petitioner." The petitioner then (Reply 6) made averments of specific acts of cruelty by the respondent to the boy.

Argued for the petitioner;—The petitioner asked for access merely, and not for custody. The fact that a mother had been divorced for adultery was not per se necessarily a ground for refusing to allow her reasonable access to her child; it was a question depending on the circumstances of the particular case,¹ especially since the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886,² sec. 5 of which directed that the wishes of the mother were to be taken into account equally with those of the father,³ and under which the leading consideration was the interest of the child.⁴ Prima facie it was not in the interest of a child that it should be wholly separated from its mother. Here, the only allegation against the petitioner was the adultery, which took place several years ago, and it was present character and conduct that was the important consideration.⁵ The averments of the respondent were not sufficiently specific to justify the inference that it would be to the danger of the child's moral or physical welfare that his mother should see him. Handley v. Handley,⁶ on which the respondent founded, went upon a consideration of the English Divorce Act, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal was simply a refusal to interfere with the discretion of the Judge who tried the action for divorce. *Bowman v. Graham*⁷ was decided before the Act of 1886. The statement that the petition was really presented in the interest of the petitioner's mother was without foundation. It was nothing to the purpose that the petitioner's usual place of residence was in America, for she proposed to come to Scotland in order to see the child.⁸

Argued for the respondent;—Where a woman had been divorced on the ground of adultery, the Court would not, against the wish of the father, give her a right of access to a child unless in very exceptional circumstances⁹; that rule had not been altered by the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.¹⁰ Sec. 5 of the Act did not apply to cases of divorce for adultery, but sec. 7 did so apply, and left the common law unaltered. There was nothing in the circumstances of the present case to take it out of the ordinary rule; on the contrary, Feb. 27, 1908. the circumstances shewed that it would probably not be for the interest of the child that the petitioner should be allowed a right of access to him. C. D. v. A. B.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—In this case the one thing that is perfectly clear is that the interest of the child is the main question for the Court to consider. The next circumstance of importance is that the parents of this child have already agreed as to its custody; what the mother now asks for is that she should be allowed to have access. Now, I quite admit that in the ordinary case access is a thing which would not be denied to a mother—that is to say, where she has been innocent of any conjugal transgression. But the law is the same, as I understand it, both in England and in Scotland where the mother has not been innocent in her conjugal relations. In Scotland the law is settled by the case of *Bowman*¹ (which had reference to a case of access alone), that where the wife has been divorced for adultery the matter of access to the children ought in general to be left in the husband's hands. The law is the same in England, as is established by the case of Handley,² and it is important to notice that that was after the passing of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. A strong Court there held practically the same as the Court here did in Bowman's case,¹ that there was not a sufficient ground for interfering with the arrangements made for a child by the husband in the case of an erring mother, even where only access was asked for, and that was after taking into account the passing of the Guardianship of Infants Act, which was referred to in the argument. Now, here we have indications in the shape of letters that at the time when these proceedings first had their origin in America the grandmother of this boy was strongly of opinion that it was not in his interest that his mother (who was her own daughter) should have access to him. I do not say that that is by any means conclusive, though I must say that the evidence so far as it goes is very clear that, whoever was fond of the boy, the grandmother certainly was, and therefore any expression of opinion that came from her was deserving of the highest consideration.

It is true, and she admits it in her petition, that if she is to have such access, it will be necessary for her to come over from America to this country, for it is only here that she asks for or could obtain access to him. From the nature of the situation, however, it follows that access by a mother resident in America and coming over to this country for the purpose of seeing her child would almost necessarily take the form of a temporary custody. The child is at present residing in Glasgow in the house of his paternal grandmother, and is attending the Glasgow Academy. What future arrangements shall be made for his education it lies with his father to make, and he has indicated that he may ultimately send him to an English public school, but that is of course entirely in the future. The child is at present only seven years old. I am ready to decide this case upon the footing simply that it is not for the interest of the child at present that the mother's petition for access should be granted, and that she has

Feb. 27, 1908. averred no circumstances, she being the guilty spouse, to warrant us in
C. D. v. A. B. interfering with the husband's arrangements and with the clear rule of the Scots law.

LORD LOW.—I am of the same opinion. When on the 8th June 1905 the decree of divorce was pronounced by the Supreme Court of the State of Indiana (which appears to have been really an arranged divorce) the order of the Court was that the husband (the present respondent) should have the custody of the son of the marriage and the petitioner the custody of the daughter of the marriage, and neither party seeks now to alter that order. The petitioner, however, now says that she has a great affection for her son, and that it is a great grief for her never to see him, and she comes to this Court to be allowed access to him in this country. Now a good deal has happened since the proceedings in the American Court. In 1907 the respondent brought in this Court an action of divorce on the ground of adultery against the petitioner, and it was proved that about the same time as the proceedings were going on in America the petitioner was living in adultery with a Mr E. D., and the learned Judge who tried the case found that there was no evidence that the present respondent was aware that that was going on. The pursuer subsequently married Mr E. D., and now she is living with him in America.

I think that the natural desire of a mother to see her child is by no means to be left out of consideration in a case of this sort; and the fact that she has been divorced for adultery is not in itself a sufficient reason for refusing access. But the main consideration is the welfare of the child, and in this case I have come to the conclusion that there would be serious risk that it would be contrary to the welfare of the son that access should be granted. I do not for a moment suggest that the petitioner would intentionally, or even consciously, say or do anything which might have a demoralising effect upon the boy, although I doubt very much if he would in any case actually benefit by intercourse with her. What I chiefly fear, however, is the effect which she might have on his relations with his father. The upbringing, education, and settlement in life of the boy is a duty which the father has to perform, and it is of the utmost importance that he should have the respect and confidence of his son. I greatly fear that the petitioner's influence would almost inevitably be in an opposite direction, because it is evident that she has very bitter, perhaps vindictive, feelings against the respondent; and her history, and what may be gleaned of her character from the correspondence, suggest that she would not be likely to exercise a wise self-control. These considerations, especially in view of the law laid down in the cases of *Bowman*¹ and Handley,² satisfy me that the petition should be refused.

LORD ARDWALL.—I agree with what has been said by your Lordships. I think there is nothing in these proceedings to shew that it is for the welfare of the child that the relations between him and his mother, which several years ago were broken off with her full consent, should now be resumed. On the contrary, I think that it is better that he should see and know as little as possible of her in the circumstances. In the next place, with regard Feb. 27, 1908.

to the law of the matter, it is quite settled that a father is entitled to the C. D. v. A. B. custody of his child—it is for him to direct what shall be done with the child, and that his wishes are paramount unless it can be shewn that they Lord Ardwall.
are unreasonable, or that there is some good and just cause for running counter to them.

The only doubt I have in this case has been raised by the conduct of the father as shewn in his letters; they seem to me to shew that he has treated most unfairly the grandmother of this child, who has behaved in a most proper and ladylike manner throughout, and who has a strong affection for the child; but this is not sufficient to affect our judgment, as the father, being responsible for the education and upbringing of the child, must just take his own course.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If I thought that the decision of your Lordships was to be taken as meaning that a decision at a particular time on a question such as this was final, and could never be reviewed or modified by the Court at a later date, I should have great difficulty in concurring in what is proposed to be done. The question whether a parent is to be suffered to have access to a child is one which, although decided to-day, may be varied or altered at a later date if ground can be shewn for it. What may be unfavourable to the interests of the child at one time may not be so at a later date. Therefore the judgment your Lordships propose is upon the present state of matters, and as your Lordships all hold that the present petition must be refused I do not dissent from that judgment. If cause can be shewn at any later date why what is now done should be recalled or modified, the Court will be bound to consider the application. That being so, I am not placed in the position of holding that the mother can never, whatever the change of circumstances, be allowed to see her child during childhood, which would be a thing I could not assent to.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the prayer of the petition; and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

Succession—Special Legacy—Specific Bequest of Heritage—Sale of Subject—Suspensive Condition—Ademption.—A testator by his will bequeathed to his daughter, as a special legacy, a hotel of which he was the proprietor. Shortly before his death the testator sold the hotel to William Steven, and signed a minute of sale which bore that "it shall be a condition of this agreement being binding on both parties that Mr Steven applies for and obtains a transfer of the licence certificate of the said hotel." The transfer

Mar. 11, 1908. was not obtained until after the death of the testator, and thereafter a formal conveyance was executed in favour of the purchaser, and the price paid.

M'Arthur's Executors v.
Guild.

In a special case the question was put whether the bequest of the hotel had been adeemed. Held (by the First Division with three consulted Judges) that the contract of sale being subject to a suspensive condition—namely, the transfer of the licence—the hotel remained part of the testator's estate at his death, and accordingly that the legacy had not been adeemed, and that the price of the hotel belonged to the daughter.

Opinions that even if there had been no suspensive condition there had been no ademption, the hotel, or the right to its price, remaining part of the testator's estate.

1ST DIVISION.
with three consulted Judges.

PETER M'ARTHUR, Perth, died on 16th April 1906, leaving a will executed in 1905. By his will, two of the testator's sons were appointed his executors, and after various special bequests the testator conveyed to them the whole residue of his means and estate, heritable and moveable, with power to realise and divide the same among the residuary legatees named therein.

The third head of the will was as follows :—“(Thirdly) I dispoñe, assign, and bequeath to my daughter, Mrs Margaret Anderson M'Arthur or Guild, residing in Strathmiglo, Fifeshire, wife of James Guild, hotelkeeper there, whom failing, to her child or children in equal right (first) the property in Strathmiglo, consisting of the Royal Hotel and premises therewith connected, with the pertinents and the writs and title-deeds thereof; (second)” (certain other properties).

By minute of sale, dated 5th March 1906, the testator sold the Royal Hotel, Strathmiglo, to William Steven, Kinross, at the price of £1400 sterling, with entry at Whitsunday (15th May) 1906, at which date the price was declared to be payable. The minute, which was signed by the testator and by Mr Steven, stated :—“(7) It shall be a condition of this agreement being binding on both parties that Mr Steven applies for and obtains a transfer of the licence certificate for the said Royal Hotel, Strathmiglo.” It was also provided that William Steven, the purchaser, should, within seven days from the date of the minute of sale, consign £400 in the Bank of Scotland in Perth on deposit-receipt in the joint names of the testator and himself, in part payment of the purchase price. The said sum of £400 was consigned in said bank upon 12th March 1906, “to await the settlement of the price of the Royal Hotel, Strathmiglo, repayable on the joint indorsement of the said William Steven, Esq., and Peter M'Arthur, Esq., residing at 61 George Street, Perth.” A transfer of the licence certificate in favour of Mr Steven was obtained at the Licensing Court held on 17th April 1906, the day after the death of the testator, and a formal conveyance of the property was thereafter executed in his favour, and the balance of the price paid.

Questions having arisen as to the rights of parties in consequence of the sale of the hotel, a special case was presented, which stated the facts above narrated.

The parties to the case were :—(1) The executors under the will, (2) and (4) the residuary legatees, and (3) Mrs Guild, to whom the hotel had been bequeathed.

The first, second, and fourth parties maintained that the bequest of the said Royal Hotel to the third party was adeemed by the sale thereof concluded between the testator and the purchaser thereof, under and by virtue of the said minute of sale and consignment of Mar. 11, 1908. part of the price, and that the said £400 consigned in bank as aforesaid, together with the balance of the said price of £1400, formed part M'Arthur's Executors v. Guild. of the residue of the estate of the testator. The third party contended that the said bequest was not adeemed, in respect that the testator had executed no conveyance thereof prior to his death in favour of the purchaser, and was then still feudally vest therein as proprietor thereof.

The question of law was:—"Was the bequest by the testator to the third party of the said heritable property known as the Royal Hotel, Strathmiglo, adeemed?"

The case was argued before the First Division, with three consulted Judges, on 4th and 5th February 1908.

Argued for the first, second, and fourth parties;—When heritage was sold voluntarily, the price was moveable from the moment the sale was completed.¹ In the present case the sale was completed at the moment when the minute of sale was signed, it being immaterial that no conveyance had been executed,² and the condition as to the acquisition of the licence being merely resolute and not suspensive. Accordingly, at the date of the testator's death the subject of this special bequest had been converted from heritage into moveable estate, and thus had ceased to exist in the form in which it was bequeathed. The subject of the bequest having ceased to exist, it followed that the legacy had been adeemed.³ The case of Pollok's Trustees v. Anderson,⁴ relied on by the third party, was wrongly decided, and should be overruled, in so far as it decided that where the subject of a special legacy had been sold before the death of the testator the special legatee had a claim on the price. There was no authority for this proposition, and it was contrary to the decision of the whole Court in the case of Heron v. Espie.⁵

Argued for the third party;—The sole test in a question of ademption was whether or not the title to the property in question was in the testator at the time of his death.⁶ So long as the testator remained proprietor of the subject, it was irrelevant to consider any obligations into which he had entered with regard to it, or his intentions as evidenced by such obligations. In this respect ademption was distinguished from conversion, where intention was a relevant consideration.⁷ Applying this test to the present case, it was clear that at the date of his death—which was the date at which the will must be

Mar. 11, 1908. held to speak¹—the testator was still feudally vested in the hotel, and the proprietor of it. The English cases were of no value in this connection, as by English law a contract of sale passed the property.² *Pollok's Trustees v. Anderson*³ was directly in point, and, indeed, the present case was a fortiori, for in *Pollok*³ the sale was unconditional, whereas here it was dependent on a suspensive condition which was not purified until after the death of the testator. *Heron v. Espie*⁴ did not conflict with Pollok,³ and, indeed, had no bearing at all on the doctrine of ademption, for it dealt merely with the point whether a compulsory sale had the same effect as a voluntary sale in a question of conversion.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr M'Arthur of Perth left a will in which he disposed of the whole of his property. By the third head he provided as follows:—"Thirdly, I dispoine to my daughter, Mrs Margaret Anderson M'Arthur or Guild (first) the property in Strathmiglo consisting of the Royal Hotel and premises therewith connected, with the pertinents and the writs and title-deeds thereof." He afterwards went on to make other bequests, and left a residuary clause. Accordingly there was no doubt that the Royal Hotel was a special bequest. Shortly before his death he executed a minute of sale with a Mr Steven of Kinross, under the terms of which he sold to Mr Steven the said hotel at the price of £1400, and by the seventh article of the deed provided that, "It is to be a condition of this agreement being binding on both parties, that Mr Steven applies for and obtains a transfer of the licence certificate for the said Royal Hotel, Strathmiglo." Mr Steven accordingly made the application for the transfer of the licence to the licensing authority, but the day before the Court met Mr M'Arthur died. The Court met and granted the transfer of the licence, and accordingly there is no doubt that Mr Steven is entitled to a conveyance, and he has consigned the £1400. The question arising in this special case is whether the £1400 belongs—as representing the hotel—to the special legatee, or whether it falls into residue, the special legacy having been adeemed. At one time or another there has been a good deal of discussion as to what amounts to proof of ademption, but the leading authority is the judgment of Lord Thurlow in the case of Stanley v. Potter,⁵ following on the previous case of Ashburner v. Macquire,⁶ where, after remarking that the test of ademption was whether the thing remained at the testator's death, he continued,—"The idea of proceeding on the animus adimendi has introduced a degree of confusion into the cases which is inexplicable, and I can make out no precise rule from them upon that ground. . . . It will be a safer and clearer way to adhere to the plain rule which I before mentioned, which is to inquire whether the specific thing given remains or not." That doctrine has been fully adopted in the law of Scotland, and there is no clearer proof of this than is given by the case of Anderson v. Thomson,¹ where the late Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff acknowledges that doctrine, and says that although in his opinion it is utterly at variance with any principle of jurisprudence, it is so firmly established that he has no alternative but to apply it. I need scarcely say that no more striking proof can be given of the authority of a rule than its acceptance by a Judge who personally is convinced that it is a bad rule. Now, taking that doctrine as settled, it seems to me that the decision of this case is not doubtful. We have to look to see whether the trustees at the moment of death could find the thing in the truster's estate. I think it is quite clear here that at the moment of death the truster was still the proprietor of the subject. He had entered into an agreement that if a certain condition were purified he would be bound to sell the subject, but at the moment no one could know whether the condition would be purified. I think the condition was purely suspensive. Upon that simple ground I think there can be no doubt that there was no ademption of this legacy. The property, accordingly, when it came to be sold, was the property of the legatee, and consequently the price belongs to her, because it was her property that was sold.

But I do not want to stop here, although this is enough for the decision of the case, for there is no doubt that this case was taken to test whether the decision of the Second Division in Pollok's Trustees v. Anderson,² really conflicts with the decision of the whole Court in Heron v. Espie.³ *Pollok's Trustees*² was not the same as this case, as it did not involve the question of a suspensive condition. It was the case of a voluntary sale, where missives had been signed, but the testator had died without having executed a conveyance to the purchaser. The Second Division found that the property belonged to the testator at the time of his death, and that the legacy had not been adeemed. It is argued that this decision cannot stand with Heron v. Espie.³ At the first hearing of this case I was inclined to agree with this, but I have come to be clearly of opinion that *Pollok's Trustees*² was quite rightly decided, and that Heron,³ so far from being in opposition, really supports the views upon which *Pollok's Trustees*² was decided. In Heron v. Espie,³ a property had been taken by means of compulsory notice by a railway company. The company had consigned a sum and entered into possession. An arbitration had taken place and the actual price fixed, and all that remained to be done was to grant a conveyance. In that position of matters the quondam owner of the property died and left a general settlement covering both his heritable and moveable property. This settlement was reduced ex capite lecti quoad the heritable property, and the point was whether the heir or the executor took the consigned price. Now, had it been a voluntary sale there could have been no question. There would have been conversion upon the authority of Chiesley,⁴ and all the cases that have followed since. But here there was no conversion by the act of the owner, and accordingly the doctrine was pressed that the infestment of the quondam owner was still undisturbed by any new infestment in favour of the

Mar. 11, 1908. company. The minority held that the price ought to go to the heir, and the majority only came to the opposite conclusion because they held that the effect of what had happened was to effect a statutory transference which transferred the land without infestment, and left the right in the quondam owner as not a right of property, but only a right to receive the price, which being moveable in se could not go to the heir. As the Lord Justice-Clerk expressed it (page 922)—“I hold that to be real corporal and complete possession of the lands, as much as if infestment had been taken.” Lord Wood says (page 939)—“The seller was dispossessed of the lands and had no interest in them remaining in him, his right having been absolutely converted into a direct right to payment of the fixed price only.” The contrary view, that there was no such divestiture and that consequently the subject remained heritable in the hereditas of the seller, is developed by Lord Deas. Now, it matters not for the moment which of the conflicting views was right. Either it remained heritable, or if it did not, it did not because something had occurred which transferred the property in the land itself in spite of the standing infestment in the quondam owner, a result which could not have occurred in a voluntary sale. If it had been a voluntary sale, of course the property would have been moveable, but only on the principle of conversion, which depends on the will of the owner and testator. It seems to me that the moment that you settle that intention is neither here nor there in a question of ademption, *Heron v. Espie*¹ becomes really an authority, not at variance with, but in favour of Pollok's Trustees v. Anderson.²

I would further add that the English authorities quoted to us do not seem to me to touch the question, for the simple reason that by English law the contract of sale passes the property—the exact opposite being true by the law of Scotland, and the law not having been altered as to heritable property though it has been as to moveable.

I am, therefore, for answering the question of law in the negative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this had been an unconditional sale I should have been disposed to say that the legacy was adeemed, for though this is heritable property I think the question properly falls to be tested by the doctrine of ademption, because that doctrine comes from the Roman law, which recognised no difference between moveable and immoveable estate. Both are covered by the same principle, viz., that if the testator after making a special legacy by will has parted with the subject, it is no longer in the power of the testamentary representatives to make over the property, and therefore the legacy ceases to have effect. The only difference in the case of a conditional sale is that there is no sale until the condition is purified. There might be cases in which a personal right to the land effeired to the purchaser from the moment the contract of sale was made, subject only to a resolutive condition, and in such a case I might be disposed to think that the personal right was a sufficient withdrawal of the property from the testator's general estate to lead to the conclusion that the legacy had been adeemed. But it is not necessary to consider that question, which might come to be important in reference to the peculiarity of our law as to heritable and moveable estate. For the decision of this case I think it is enough to say that it was a conditional sale, and that there was not even a personal right in the purchaser to the property at the date of the testator's death. The testator was the undivested owner of the subject of a contract, which contract his representatives would be bound to fulfil. So I think the legatee took the property, subject of course to the terms of the contract.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with what your Lordship has said in reference to the case of Pollok,¹ which we are directly invited to reconsider. But for my own part, I think that even if that case had been decided differently I should still have come to the same conclusion upon the question now before us, because there was a much more plausible argument for ademption in the case of *Pollok*¹ than in the present. In *Pollok*¹ the testator had directed his trustees to convey certain subjects to certain persons, but before his death he had sold them with entry at a certain term. He died before a conveyance was executed, but undoubtedly under an absolute obligation to convey, which neither he nor his representatives could have refused to implement. But the present testator was under no absolute obligation to convey the subjects. He had entered into a contract for the sale of the subjects subject to a condition that the intending purchaser should apply for and obtain a licence certificate. The testator died before the application was made, and therefore at the date of his death it was quite uncertain whether the contract would become binding or not. I think that constitutes a material distinction between the two cases. For a similar reason I think the case of *Heron v. Espie*² has no application. In that case a railway company had taken possession of lands under statutory powers, and had consigned a sum of money to meet the price. The true amount of the price had been ascertained by arbitration, and the proprietor of the land died before the disposition to the railway company had been signed. There is a great deal of learned discussion in the opinions of the Judges, but I think the material point is that throughout the discussion the assumption was that the transaction of purchase and sale had come to an end, and that there was no question as to any right in the lands, but only with reference to the money. This is clearly brought out in the terms of the interlocutor, because the judgment of the Court "finds that the right to demand payment of the price due by the railway company for the stripe of ground referred to was a personal right in the person of the deceased William Simpson, and that the said price was part of" his "moveable estate." The result of the whole discussion therefore was to find that the price of land sold was personal and not heritable property. For the actual decision of the present case I agree with your Lordship in the chair, that we must look to the doctrine of ademption as laid down by Lord Thurlow in the case of Ashburner v. Macquire,³ and repeated in the case of Stanley v. Potter.⁴ The

Mar. 11, 1908. principle is that when a particular thing has been specifically bequeathed the claim of the special legatee will be defeated if the thing in question is not in existence or not within reach of the testator's executors at his death.

M'Arthur's Executors v. Guild. The reason is, as his Lordship expressed it in the second of the two cases Lord Kinnear. mentioned above, that "one must consider it in the same manner as if a testator had given a particular horse to A B—if that horse died in the testator's lifetime, or was disposed of by him, then there is nothing on which the bequest can operate." And then he goes on to say that the idea of proceeding upon the supposed animus adimendi leads to confusion, and that no rule can be safely adopted except to inquire (1) whether there is a special legacy, and (2) whether the thing bequeathed remained at the testator's death. I think that doctrine has been followed too consistently to be called in question now, and I cannot say that my reliance on it is shaken even by the criticism of so very eminent a Judge as Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff in the case of Anderson.¹ His Lordship thought the doctrine contrary to principle because it displaced what ought to be the sole rule in the construction of wills, viz., to ascertain and give effect to the intention of the testator. But I cannot see that the case of *Ashburner*² throws any doubt on this cardinal rule of construction, or affects it in any way. For the doctrine comes into operation only after the will has been construed. The first question, and the question which Lord Thurlow thought was generally the question of difficulty, is whether there is a special legacy, and that is a question of construction in which the intention of the testator is the proper subject for inquiry. The question whether the thing bequeathed remains or not is a question of fact, not a question of intention. Applying that rule in the present case it appears to me that the testamentary gift of the hotel was a bequest of a specific subject, and the only question which we have to consider is whether that subject remained a part of the deceased's estate at his death. For the reasons given by your Lordship I think it did remain. It remained subject to a contract which bound the testator, but at the date of the death it was a contract which was still in suspense; when it did come into operation the legatee was bound also, as a gratuitous taker under her father's will, but her obligation was to complete the sale by conveying the property in return for payment of the price.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair.

LORD ARDWALL.—I am of opinion that the bequest of the Royal Hotel, Strathmiglo, in favour of the party of the third part did not, in the circumstances set forth in the special case, suffer ademption.

Any apparent difficulties that arise on the authorities can, I think, be satisfactorily explained if care is taken to distinguish between cases of conversion and cases of ademption. *Heron v. Espie*³ does not appear to me to conflict with the decision which it is proposed to pronounce, and the case of Chalmers,⁴ which was a case of ademption, was very different from the present, for in that case the house bequeathed to the pursuer had been taken by a railway company, the price thereof paid, and a disposition thereof in favour of the railway company granted two months before the testator's death. Accordingly, at that date the testator had been absolutely divested of all right to the house in question. The case of *Pollok's Trustees v. Anderson*¹ is an authority directly applicable to the present case, but the present case is, I think, a fortiori of that one. The question whether or not ademption of a bequest of a specific subject has taken place depends solely upon this other question, whether or not the subject of the bequest was at the date of the testator's death in existence, and formed part of his estate. In the present case, although a minute of sale had been entered into between the testator and a person of the name of William Steven, yet the contract thereby concluded was subject to a suspensive condition, and was not binding upon both parties unless and until (1) the purchaser applied for, and (2) obtained a transfer of the licence for the hotel, the second of these conditions depending upon third parties for its fulfilment. The testator died on 16th April 1906, and at that date the transfer of the licence had not been granted, and of course the price had not been paid, nor had a conveyance of the subjects been executed. Accordingly, the subject of the bequest formed part of the testator's estate at the time of his death, and was carried by his settlement directly to the party of the third part, subject to her obligation to carry out the contract of sale and her right to receive the stipulated price in return for a conveyance of the property.

Company — Memorandum — Inconsistency between Memorandum and Articles of Association—Provisions in the Articles for preferential treatment of one class of shareholders.—The memorandum of association of a limited company provided:—"The capital of the company is £250,000, divided into 139,092 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 110,908 deferred shares of £1 each."

The articles of association provided that the ordinary shares should have a preferential ranking as to dividend; and that, in the event of a winding-up, the shares of the company should be repaid "in the order in which the shares or stocks are entitled to rank for payment of dividend."

In the winding-up of the company the deferred shareholders maintained that the provision in the articles for the preferential ranking of the ordinary shareholders in a winding-up was inconsistent with the memorandum of

Held that there was no inconsistency between the articles and the memorandum of association, and that in the winding-up the ordinary shareholders were entitled to payment of their capital in full before the deferred shareholders received anything on account of their capital.

Andrews v. Gas Meter Company, L. R., [1897] 1 Ch. 361, approved.

1ST DIVISION. ON 18th January 1908 William Sime, C.A., Edinburgh, liquidator of the Humboldt Redwood Company, Limited, a company registered under the Companies Acts, presented a petition to the Court under these Acts, and particularly under section 138 of the Act of 1862, for the determination of a question which had arisen in the winding-up of the Company.

The petition set forth that the memorandum of association of the Company provided, article 5:—"The capital of the Company is £250,000, divided into 139,092 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 110,908 deferred shares of £1 each."

That the articles of association of the Company provided, by article 43:—"The holders of ordinary shares of the Company shall be entitled to receive out of the profits of each year a cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 10 per cent per annum on the amount for the time being paid up on the ordinary shares held by them respectively, and the surplus profits in each year shall belong to the holders of the deferred shares." And by article 137:—"In the event of the Company being dissolved and wound up, the different shares or stocks of the Company shall be repaid out of the assets of the Company as realised, in the order in which the shares or stocks are entitled to rank for payment of dividend."

That the liquidator had in hand a balance of about £9000 for distribution among these shareholders, and that "the ordinary shareholders maintain that they are entitled to distribution amongst them of the whole remaining assets of the Company, up to any amount not exceeding their paid-up capital, being £1 per share, in preference to any payment to the deferred shareholders, and some of the deferred shareholders dispute the rights of the ordinary shareholders to this preference."

The question which the petitioner submitted to the Court was:—"Whether the ordinary shareholders are entitled to receive payment of their capital in full before the deferred shareholders receive anything on account of their capital or not?"

Answers were lodged by Archibald Coats and certain other shareholders, all of whom held a larger number of ordinary shares than deferred shares.

Answers were also lodged for the Merchant Banking Company, Limited, and the liquidators thereof, who were holders of 30,808 deferred shares.

The petition was heard on 13th March 1908, when the respondents Archibald Coats and others argued;—The provision in the articles of association that the ordinary shareholders were to have priority of payment in a winding-up was not in any way inconsistent with the memorandum. The memorandum merely fixed the amount of the division into shares of the capital and left it to the articles to define the rights inter se of the shareholders, both as to dividend and repayment of capital. Such provisions could quite competently be embodied in the articles, and that there was no special sanctity with regard to the rights inter se of shareholders was shewn by the fact that even by resolution or by amendment of the articles preferences between different classes of shareholders could be created.¹ Mar. 18, 1908.

Argued for the respondents the Merchant Banking Company, Limited, and Liquidator;—Article 5 of the memorandum did not provide for any preference in a winding-up between the two classes of shareholders. If a preference had been intended it should have been provided for in the memorandum, and a preference not being in the memorandum it could not be competently embodied in the articles.² Further, nothing in the articles inconsistent with the provisions in the memorandum could have any effect, and the preference founded on here was so inconsistent.³ On both these grounds, therefore, the provisions in the articles for the preferential payment of the ordinary shareholders in a winding-up were invalid, and the assets fell to be distributed equally among all the shareholders.

Liquidator of The Humboldt Redwood Co.,
Limited, v.
Coats.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first matter that is before your Lordships in this case is the determination of a question which has arisen in the winding-up of the Humboldt Redwood Company, and which is brought before your Lordships by Mr Sime, the liquidator in the voluntary winding-up of that Company. The question, as put by the liquidator, is this—"Whether the ordinary shareholders are entitled to receive payment of their capital in full before the deferred shareholders receive anything on account of their capital or not?" That question is one of the simplest, and must be solved by reference to the constituting documents of the Company. The memorandum of association provides in article 5 that "the capital of the Company is £250,000, divided into 139,092 ordinary shares of £1 each, and 110,908 deferred shares of £1 each." The articles of association provide by article 137 that "in the event of the Company being dissolved and wound up, the different shares or stocks of the Company shall be repaid out of the assets of the Company as realised, in the order in which the shares or stocks are entitled to rank for payment of dividend." And by the 43d article it is provided that "the holders of ordinary shares of the Company shall be entitled to receive out of the profits of each year a cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 10 per cent per annum on the amount for the time being paid up on the ordinary shares held by them respectively, and the surplus profits in each year shall belong to the holders of the deferred shares."

Now, there can only be one meaning to these words. It is too clear to admit of argument that the ordinary shareholders are to be paid in full before the deferred shareholders get anything. But the argument is that these provisions in the articles of association are bad as being contrary to the terms of the memorandum, and the well-known doctrine is invoked that the memorandum is the ruling document and overrides anything in the articles of association that may be contrary to its provisions.

As far as I can see there is no inconsistency between the two documents here. The memorandum only states that the capital of the Company is to be

Mar. 13, 1908. divided in certain proportions between two classes of shares. Mr Hunter Liquidator of The Humboldt Redwood Co., Limited, v. Coats. Ld. President. says the inference from that is that these shares are to rank equally as to divisions of assets. There is no authority for that proposition, and I think the matter is determined by the decision in Andrews v. Gas Meter Company,¹ where Lindley, L. J., says, — "These decisions turned upon the principle that although by section 8 of the Act the memorandum is to state the amount of the original capital and the number of shares into which it is to be divided, yet in other respects the rights of the shareholders in respect of their shares and the terms on which additional capital may be raised are matters to be regulated by the articles of association rather than by the memorandum, and are, therefore, matters which (unless provided for by the memorandum, as in Ashbury v. Watson,²) may be determined by the Company from time to time by special resolution pursuant to section 50 of the Act. This view, however, clearly negatives the doctrine that there is a condition in the memorandum of association that all shareholders are to be on an equality unless the memorandum itself shews the contrary. That proposition is in our opinion unsound. Its unsoundness was distinctly pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper."³ To all there said I respectfully subscribe. All that the memorandum does here is to say that there shall be two classes of shareholders, but it leaves it to the articles of association to prescribe their respective rights. The answer, therefore, to the question put by the liquidator must be in the affirmative.

Held that in disposing of such an appeal the Dean of Guild is not limited to the consideration of whether the Corporation in giving their consent were acting capriciously or ultra vires, but must also take into consideration whether the individual owner appealing is, as a result of his proximity, unduly prejudiced by the increased height; and that the Dean of Guild should not take into consideration the invasion of any legal rights of the individual owner, such legal rights falling to be vindicated in the petition for lining.

Observed that in disposing of such an appeal the Dean of Guild ought to apply his expert knowledge, and, where possible, dispose of the matter summarily without a proof.

On 17th June 1907 Archibald Maclaren Lindsay, Robert Meldrum, and John Lumsden Oatts, solicitors in Glasgow, the proprietors of certain ground abutting on Regent Street Lane there, appealed to the First Division against two interlocutors pronounced by the Dean of Guild in Glasgow in connection with a petition for lining, presented by the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited, for authority to erect certain buildings to abut on Regent Street Lane, within 100 yards of the appellants' property. The buildings proposed to be erected exceeded the limitation of height provided for in the Glasgow Building Regulations Act, 1900, and one of the interlocutors that the appellants appealed against was an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild dismissing an appeal at their instance under sec. 60 (3) of that Act,* against the consent of the Corporation being granted to the proposal to exceed the statutory height. The other interlocutor appealed against was an interlocutor of the Dean of Guild granting the lining craved.

Glasgow.

On 13th July 1907 the First Division recalled the interlocutors appealed against, and remitted to the Dean of Guild to consider whether the consent of the Corporation had been given in knowledge of the true interpretation of the statutory provisions applicable, "and if he is satisfied that such consent has been so given, and does not propose to recall that consent in virtue of the powers given to him by said subsection (3) of section 60 of the said Act, to dismiss the appeal taken to him," and to grant the lining.†

On 20th December 1907 the Corporation of Glasgow, having reconsidered the matter in the light of the interpretation of the statutory provisions laid down by the First Division, of new gave their consent to the buildings being erected beyond the statutory limit of height.

On 14th January 1908 Messrs Lindsay, Meldrum, and Oatts appealed to the Dean of Guild, under sec. 60 (3) of the Building Regulations Act against that consent, and the appeal was conjoined with the original petition for lining.

In art. 9 of the note of appeal the appellants stated that they considered themselves aggrieved by the proposal to which the Glasgow Corporation were alleged to have given consent, inter alia, for the following reasons:—“(3) The erection of the buildings to the height proposed would be detrimental to the interest of adjoining proprietors and occupiers by unnecessarily restricting air space and light, and in the event of fire would become a serious danger to

(4) No reasons exist on account of site or otherwise for relaxing the statutory height of the building, and the fact of its being more remunerative to the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited, to have increased height is no reason for such consent being granted. (5) The granting of consent has resulted in the Corporation conferring an unnecessary pecuniary advantage on the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited, to the detriment of adjoining proprietors, and the amenity, health, and safety of the neighbourhood."

Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Lindsay.

On 24th February 1908 the Dean of Guild pronounced an interlocutor allowing the appellants a proof of their averments (3), (4), and (5) in art. 9.*

The respondents, the Summerlee Iron Company, Limited, appealed to the Court of Session, and the appeal was heard on 12th March 1908.

Argued for the Summerlee Iron Company;—The Dean of Guild should not have allowed a proof here, but should have disposed of the matter summarily, and the consent of the Corporation being given, and the objections already disposed of on their merits on the former occasion, he should have granted the lining. The averments remitted by the Dean of Guild to probation were largely irrelevant, and, so far as relevant, were such as could, and should, have been disposed of by him with the assistance of his expert advisers without a proof. The appeal was provided to the Dean of Guild Court just because it was a Court of experts who could dispose of such matters summarily, and by allowing a proof the Dean of Guild was in fact unjustifiably declining his own jurisdiction.

Argued for Archibald Maclaren Lindsay and others;—The statute provided that the Dean of Guild in such an appeal should have "power to deal with the case as shall seem to him just." There was no limitation as to his method of dealing with it, and no enactment that he must dispose of it summarily. Here in the exercise of his discretion he had decided that to inform his mind properly a proof was necessary. Such an exercise of his discretion was perfectly valid, and should not be disturbed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When this case was before us in this Division on the former occasion we pronounced an interlocutor to this effect:—"Recall in hoc statu the interlocutors of the Dean of Guild, dated 3d June 1907, in the respective processes, and remit to him to consider whether as a matter of fact the consent of the Corporation has been knowingly given to a building which, under section 62 of the foresaid Act, must be held as

* In his note the Dean of Guild, after referring to the new consent given by the Corporation, continued:—"That consent being now in process, the duty of the Dean is to say whether or not he sees any reason to interfere with it. The objectors take exception to the consent on several grounds. Some are technical; the others deal with what may be said to be the practical side of the matter. The Dean thinks it would be unfortunate if by any pronouncement of his upon the technical pleas the case would reach the Court of review without all the relevant considerations upon the practical side of the matter having been ascertained. He has, therefore, before answer allowed a proof of the averments as to the detriment which the objectors would suffer by the building proposed to be erected by the petitioners being authorised."

abutting on two streets, and if he is satisfied that such consent has been so given, and does not propose to recall that consent in virtue of the powers given to him by said subsection 3 of section 60 of the said Act, to dismiss the appeal taken to him, with or without expenses as to him shall seem just, and to grant the lining in the petition therefor." The case went back to the Dean of Guild, and as the Dean of Guild was not certain as to whether as a matter of fact the consent of the Corporation had been knowingly given to a building which must be held as abutting on two streets, he asked the Corporation to that effect, as, indeed, was indicated as the appropriate course by the opinion pronounced by myself in that case. The result of that was that the Corporation confessed that they had not viewed the case from that standpoint, and therefore they quite rightly again considered the matter from the standpoint which the Court had given them, namely, that this was a building which was to be held as abutting upon two streets. Having done so, they again gave their consent. Against that consent an appeal was again taken to the Dean of Guild so that he might, as it is expressed in the interlocutor, "recall that consent," if he wished to do so, under the powers of subsection 3 of section 60.

Ld. President.

Now, it is quite true that the Dean of Guild had already pronounced, so to speak, an opinion on the merits of this matter when the former consent was given, but I have no doubt whatsoever that technically the Dean of Guild was perfectly entitled, if he wished, to reconsider the matter, because the old consent was gone as inapplicable, and this was a new consent; and I do not say a word against the technical propriety of the appeal being taken, in order that the Dean of Guild might this time refuse his consent, if so advised. The Dean of Guild, however, upon that matter has not, as yet, indicated whether he consents or not, but he has pronounced an interlocutor to this effect:—"Before answer, allows to the objectors a proof of their averments in article 9 (3), (4), and (5) of their note of appeal." Now, the averments there referred to, of which proof has been allowed, are as follows:—(His Lordship read the averments quoted supra).

Before I deal with these averments perhaps it may be as well to say a word upon what I think the Dean of Guild has got to consider upon this matter. The section which gives the Dean of Guild appeal is the third subsection of the 60th section of the Glasgow Building Regulations Act,¹ which, after providing that the Corporation's consent shall be advertised, says it "shall not be acted on till twenty-one days after such publication; and the owner or lessee of any lands and heritages within 100 yards of the site of any intended building who may deem himself aggrieved by the grant of such consent, may, within twenty-one days of such publication, appeal to the Dean of Guild, who shall have power to deal with the case as shall seem to him just." Now, the Dean of Guild made certain observations—not in this case, but in the last *—as to what that appeal really meant, and

* The observations to which his Lordship referred were contained in the Dean of Guild's note to his interlocutor of 3d June 1907, and were as follows:—"If the power competent to the Dean of Guild in an appeal under this section is to be taken to be absolute, the position would seem to be somewhat anomalous. The appeal is an appeal from the discretion of a

Summerlee
Iron Co.,
Limited, v.
Lindsay.

Ld. President.

I do not think that the view that the Dean of Guild there took is quite correct. I think he took too restricted a view of his own powers. He seemed to think that, because the appeal was given from a public body to one person, namely, himself, all that he had to do was to see that the public body had not acted capriciously, or in any way ultra vires, but that he could not consider the matter on the merits. I do not think that there is necessarily any such limit. Nor do I think that there is anything to be surprised at in the Legislature giving an appeal from a public body to one person, seeing that that public body fails in two respects, first, it is not a judicial body, and, secondly, it is not a body that necessarily has among its number any member practically skilled in these matters—and seeing that the Dean of Guild enjoys both those advantages. The scheme of the statute seems to me clear enough. There are certain restrictions made upon height, which are, I suppose, made for the good of everybody concerned. Well, then, these restrictions are allowed to be dispensed with by the Corporation; and I think the matter which the Corporation in that question has to decide is a question, so to speak, of public policy. If they think that, in their view as custodiers of the town, it is a bad thing that the restriction should be dispensed with, then they will not give their consent; on the other hand, if they think there is no harm from the public point of view, they may dispense with the restriction and give their consent.

But then comes in the question of individuals; because there is no doubt that one person may have, from his local situation, a great deal more interest than another even although the thing which is being dealt with is, so to speak, a matter of public interest. A very obvious illustration is this: it is a matter of public interest whether a certain street should be shut up, but it is very much more a matter of interest to the man who lives in a house near the street, and perhaps uses that street every day as a convenient way of getting to his business, than to somebody else, who is equally a citizen, but who lives two miles away at the other end of Glasgow. And, therefore, I public body to the discretion of a single Judge. If it were necessary in the present case to form an opinion as to the precise limits of the power of the Dean of Guild in an appeal such as the present, the Dean would be inclined to conclude that the right of review is more limited than was assumed at the debate. When Parliament confers upon a public body a power that body must act within the limits of the power, and it must act in good faith and not in any arbitrary or capricious manner. A discretion exercised within these bounds is not one which is likely to be presumed to be subject to the veto of another tribunal consisting of one man. The Dean is therefore inclined to think that under the appeal contemplated by section 60 (3), his function, like the function of any legal tribunal when reviewing an administrative act, is to see that the power conferred on the Corporation has been exercised within its limits, and has been exercised not in bad faith and not in any arbitrary or capricious manner. But these views are not of importance in this case, because assuming that the Dean's review is not limited, and that the discretion vested in him is as full as that vested in the Corporation, the Dean would in this case reach the same conclusion as the Corporation, and relax the restriction as to height in the locality where the building in question is proposed to be erected."

think properly, the statute provides for a second consideration being given to Mar. 13, 1908. the question in the light of how the height of the building is going to affect private people. But then, I think it is very necessary to say that I do not consider that this has anything to do with what may be called private people's legal rights. Private people's legal rights—rights of servitude, rights of prospect, and so on—have nothing to do with this matter, because they are, of course, perfectly safeguarded in the process of lining, which this is not. If a person has a servitude of light which is going to be affected by the building which is proposed to be put up, the proper place for him to appear is not in this question as to height, but in a question of decree for lining, and there he will have his right made good if he can. It must be remembered that these restrictions are purely statutory restrictions, and not under the common law at all. A man at the common law, if he is not restrained by other rights in his neighbour—of servitude or building conditions or something of that sort, all of which, as I have said, can be made good in the decree of lining—of course may build his house as high as the Tower of Babel. But then comes in this Building Regulations Act, which says that, except on certain conditions, he shall not. Well, then, after the Town-Council consents, the neighbour says,—“But, then, this is going to affect me in a peculiar way.” I think he has got a right to say so, and I think it falls within the province of the Dean of Guild to consider his objection in an appeal under sec. 60, subsec. (3), but I think he must shew his hurt, not upon any ground of private injury—for that he must do in the lining—but upon what I may call the public ground which he says presses upon him more severely than it would do upon other people.

I now revert to the Dean of Guild's interlocutor, and I first take the averments upon which he has allowed proof. I think that the third is in itself a good averment,—that is to say, “the erection of the buildings to the height proposed would be detrimental to the interest of adjoining proprietors and occupiers by unnecessarily restricting air space and light.” I can imagine that a building could be so high and so big that it would, as a public matter, really hurt the air and light of the neighbourhood, and I think the adjoining proprietor should be able to say,—“Well, that is so, and I am one of the people who would be specially hurt by it.” I again call attention to the fact that a restriction of light does not mean a question of servitude. If he has got that, he must make it good in the lining. This must be a public detriment, but one which a particular person feels more than others. But it seems to me that averment (4) is no averment at all. Really, if I may say so without offence, it is ridiculous to allow proof upon averment (4) to prove a negative,—“that no reasons exist.” I cross that averment out altogether. Averment (5) seems to me to be, as to part of it, entirely irrelevant—the part where it talks about conferring unnecessary pecuniary advantages on the Summerlee Iron Company, for that is neither here nor there—and, so far as it is relevant at all, it seems to me nothing more than a repetition of averment (3) without the specification given in averment (3), because, whereas the detriment is explained in averment (3), it is not explained in averment (5) at all. I therefore cross out averment (5), because I think it has not added anything to averment (3). And that leaves averment (3) alone.

Now, as to the allowance of the proof itself, while I want to make it perfectly clear to the Dean of Guild that we should certainly never interfere with him in taking the best means he can for the expiscation of a case, and while I also want to make it clear that there might be such specific averments as to particular things as, if not admitted, might make it perfectly proper for him to have a proof before he comes to his decision, yet it seems to me perfectly clear that the class of averment that is made in article (3) is an averment which is not meant to be expiscated by putting people in the witness box ; it is meant to be decided by the Dean of Guild himself as a practical man, for which reason it is that he is selected. Holding these views, and expressing them so, I wish to say that I hope the Dean of Guild will not misunderstand me. I propose that we should recall the Dean of Guild's interlocutor, and remit to him to pronounce his judgment, whether he thinks there is any reason for interfering with the consent which has been granted by the Corporation.

LORD M'LARN.—I think it is necessary to keep in view that this is an appeal in a process which is preliminary to the regular application to the Dean of Guild Court for authority to build. I should have thought that it would be a more convenient mode of procedure if it had been enacted that the Dean of Guild, when the case comes before him for hearing, should be entitled, notwithstanding the consent given by the Town-Council, to refuse the additional height upon public grounds. But that is not done ; the provision is that there may be an appeal from the authority given by the Town-Council to exceed the height prescribed for ordinary uses. Now, I think, although this is not the ordinary Dean of Guild jurisdiction, it must have been intended that the Dean of Guild should proceed according to the same methods of inquiry and procedure as in his ordinary jurisdiction, because, if it had been an appeal in which the parties were expected to adduce expert evidence on either side, it would, I venture to think, be more convenient if that appeal had been to the Sheriff rather than to the Dean of Guild. The Dean of Guild, in his note, remarks that he considers it a somewhat anomalous thing that there should be an appeal from the whole Council to a single member of it, and so it would be if this were an appeal in which evidence were to be taken and dealt with as in a regular action. But then, in my view, that is not the intention of the Legislature. In the present case it happens that the parties were heard before a committee of the Town-Council upon the question whether the necessary consent should be given, but that was owing to the peculiar position into which the case had got. In the ordinary case, I take it, when the appellant goes to the Town-Council in the first instance, there is no argument, and, if he makes a prima facie case before the Committee of the Town-Council, he may get their consent to the extension of the height of his building ; and then that is safeguarded by the provision that there may be an appeal to the Dean of Guild Court at the instance of other parties. Now, that is not like an ordinary appeal from a whole body to one of its members, because the consent given in the first instance is given upon an ex parte application. I suppose it is thought more convenient that the hearing should be before a single member of the Town-Council, and one who is specially conversant with these questions, rather than before the Town-Council or its Committee. In any case, as the appeal is given to the Dean of Guild, I think it must have been intended that he should proceed in the summary manner which is appropriate to his jurisdiction. It would be very much to be regretted if in these applications the case should go through all the stages of an ordinary action.

Mar. 13, 1908.
 Summerlee
 Iron Co.,
 Limited, v.
 Lindsay.
 Lord M'Laren.

I cannot help thinking that in allowing a proof the Dean of Guild was largely influenced by a consideration which he mentions in his note, that the proof might be useful in the event of the case going to a higher Court. There have been previous appeals in this case—I think this is appeal C, and probably he contemplated that there would be appeals with other letters, and that the Court might need evidence to enable the point to be decided finally. But in the view which your Lordship has taken—in which I entirely concur—that this is to be treated as summary procedure, if cause can be shewn against the decision which the Dean of Guild has given, with the aid of the expert members of his council, we have always power to remit to a man of skill to give us such information as may enable us to check the conclusions to which the Dean of Guild Court has come. That is a power we have rarely had occasion to exercise, but it exists. And it is a better mode of dealing with these questions than by having a proof with half-a-dozen experts on each side coming to different conclusions. I therefore agree that this case should be remitted back for the purpose of having it decided by the Dean of Guild in a summary manner, in accordance with the practice of his Court.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair, and I only desire to add a single observation with reference to the future procedure. I agree that the Court ought to be very slow to interfere with the discretion of the Dean of Guild, or any other magistrate, in the course of procedure which he has thought necessary to adopt in order to inform his own mind. But, then, I think that, on the remit which your Lordship proposes, the Dean of Guild will have a different question to consider from that which he disposed of in the interlocutor under appeal, because it is now fixed that two out of three of the averments which he thought ought to go to proof are irrelevant. The remaining averment raises a question of fact, but one on which the Dean of Guild himself is an expert authority. According to the ordinary course of procedure in this Court, in an appeal from the Dean of Guild Court, the usual method for reaching a decision of practical questions of this kind is to remit to the Dean of Guild to decide on an inspection of the premises, or on a consideration of the plans, if he thinks an inspection unnecessary. The question being limited, as it will now be by the judgment proposed, the Dean of Guild will not be precluded by his former judgment from taking the course which seems most expedient under the altered circumstances of the case. It will be for him to consider whether he is or is not in a position to pronounce his own opinion without extrinsic evidence. I therefore agree in the course your Lordship proposes.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Dean of Guild, and

STEWART M'GLASHEN & SON, LIMITED, Respondents.—C. D. Murray—MacRobert.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), sec. 7, subsec. (2)—Dependants—Wife living apart from husband and not supported by him—Child living with wife and supported by her.—In 1895 a wife voluntarily left her husband, and a month afterwards gave birth to a child. By means of her earnings as a weaver, and the assistance of the relatives with whom she lived, she supported herself and her child, never asking for and never receiving alimony from her husband. In 1907 her husband was killed by accident in the course of his employment as a workman.

Held that neither the wife nor the child were either wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death, and accordingly that they were not entitled to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Turners Limited v. Whitefield, June 17, 1904, 6 F. 822, followed.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

MRS ALEXANDRINA M'INROY OR LINDSAY, for herself, and as tutor and administrator-in-law to her pupil daughter, Isabella Walker Lindsay, claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from Stewart M'Glashen & Son, Limited, sculptors, Edinburgh, on account of the death of William Jamieson Lindsay, the husband and father of the claimants, and instituted arbitration proceedings under the Act in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh. The Sheriff-substitute (Guy) refused to award compensation, on the ground that the claimants were not "dependants" within the meaning of the Act.* At the request of Mrs Lindsay, he stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth the following facts as admitted or proved:—“(1) On 13th June 1907 the said William Jamieson Lindsay was a workman in the employment of the respondents, and on that day he met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with them at their yard at Warriston Road, Edinburgh, which is a factory within the meaning of said Act, by being crushed against a wall of the yard by a block of stone which was being raised by a crane, and he died almost instantaneously; (2) the appellant, Mrs Alexandrina Allan M'Inroy or Lindsay, is the widow of the said William Jamieson Lindsay, and her pupil child, the said Isabella Walker Lindsay, who was born on 8th January 1896, is the only child of the deceased and her; (4) the deceased and the appellant, the said Alexandrina Allan

(b) in Scotland, such of the persons entitled according to the law of Scotland to sue the employer for damages or solatium in respect of the death of the workman as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death.”

M'Inroy or Lindsay, were married on 26th August 1895; (5) in December 1895, and shortly before the birth of the said Isabella Walker Lindsay, the said Alexandrina Allan M'Inroy or Lindsay left her husband, and went to reside with her mother and brothers in Dundee; (6) the said Alexandrina Allan M'Inroy or Lindsay stated her reason for leaving her husband to be his cruelty, but she led no evidence corroborative of this, and she took no proceedings against her husband; (7) since leaving her husband the appellant has worked as a weaver, and by this means, and with assistance from her mother and brothers, has maintained herself and her said pupil child, born on 8th January 1896, and an illegitimate child, to which she gave birth on or about 30th January 1903; (8) since the separation neither the said Alexandrina Allan M'Inroy or Lindsay nor her daughter, Isabella Walker Lindsay, received any aliment or support from the deceased; (9) at the date of the said William Jamieson Lindsay's death neither the said Alexandrina Allan M'Inroy or Lindsay nor her child, the said Isabella Walker Lindsay, was in fact dependent either wholly or partially upon his earnings."

Lindsay v.
Stewart
M'Glashen &
Son, Limited.

The question of law was:—"Whether the said Mrs Alexandrina Allan M'Inroy or Lindsay and her pupil child, or either of them, were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the deceased at the time of his death, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897?"

Argued for the appellant;—The Sheriff-substitute was wrong. As to the wife, there was a legal obligation upon the husband to support her,¹ and therefore an initial presumption in fact and in law, which doubtless might be displaced, that she was dependent upon him.² The dictum of the Lord President in *Baird & Co., Limited, v. Birsztan*³ that there was no such presumption was unsound. There was nothing in the present case to overcome that presumption, the facts that at the time of his death the workman was not contributing to his wife's support, and that she was living upon other resources, partly her own earnings, partly the charity of relatives, being quite consistent with a state of dependence upon him. These facts had all been present in previous decisions, in which the claimants had nevertheless been held to be dependants.⁴ To overcome the presumption it was necessary to shew that the wife was voluntarily living apart from her husband, and had ceased to look to him for support.⁵ The facts here shewed that the separation was not voluntary but due to the husband's cruelty. Addie & Sons' Collieries, Limited, v. Trainer,⁶ was in Lord Moncreiff's words "altogether exceptional," and threw no light on the present case. As to the child, all the arguments adduced for the wife applied a fortiori to its case, a pupil child being incapable of discharging its Lindsay v.

Stewart
M'Glashen &

Argued for the respondents ;—The question was purely one of fact. Were the wife and child actually dependent upon the deceased's earnings at the time of his death ?¹ That the husband was under a legal obligation to support them was immaterial,² and created no legal presumption in favour of dependence.³ Admittedly the mere fact that at the time of his death a husband was not contributing to his wife's support, and that she was living by charity and her own exertions, did not necessarily make her independent of his earnings in the sense of the statute provided she still looked to him as her permanent source of support. As soon as she ceased so to look, as the wife had for long done here, she ipso facto ceased to be dependent upon his earnings. It was just in this essential element that the cases founded on by the appellant⁴ were distinguishable from the present. In all of them the wife still looked to her husband. The present case was directly ruled by Turners Limited v. Whitefield,⁵ which was exactly in point. There was no difference in principle between the case of the wife and child, the only question in the latter's case also being, was there in fact dependence ? Here there was not.⁶

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—So far as one case can be an authority for the decision of another, I think that the nearest case to the present is the case of Turners Limited v. Whitefield.⁶ In that case a wife had been living apart from her husband for fourteen years, and was not in fact supported by him at the time of his death, but by an illegitimate son. In these circumstances it was held that she was not dependent on her husband's earnings, and was not entitled to compensation. Mr Orr has pointed out that in that case there was no formal severing of the family tie such as by a deed of separation ; but neither is there here. In fact, the separation took place by the wife leaving the husband and going to reside with her mother and brothers in Dundee about four months after the marriage, and about eleven years and a half before the husband met with his fatal accident in the respondents' works in Edinburgh, which occurred on 13th June 1907. The Sheriff does not say that the wife was in desertion. She stated her reason for leaving her husband to be his cruelty, but she led no evidence corroborative of this, and she took no proceedings against her husband. The Sheriff had therefore no means of judging whether her reasons were good or bad. But whatever they were, all we know is that she left him voluntarily, and that at the time of his death they had been living apart Mar. 14, 1908. since December 1895, a period of time nearly corresponding to the period of separation in Turners Limited v. Whitefield.¹ That being so, I take the case simply upon the footing that the wife's action in leaving her husband was voluntary and unexplained. Shortly after the separation she gave birth to a child by the husband, and on 30th January 1903 she gave birth to an illegitimate child. Since leaving her husband the appellant has worked as a weaver, and by this means, and with the assistance of her mother and brothers, she has maintained herself and her two children.

The Sheriff has found that since the separation neither the wife nor the child has received any aliment or support from the deceased, and that at the date of his death neither the wife nor the child was in fact dependent on his earnings. Now, the question which the Sheriff has decided by the first of these findings was a question purely of fact, but the question on which the second finding was pronounced was a question of mixed fact and law, and I quite concede that that question can be brought before this Court, because it is ultimately a question on the construction of the Act, and therefore a question of law. The Sheriff seems to have been satisfied that the claimants were persons who would have been entitled to sue for solutum and damages in respect of the death of the workman. But he had also to consider the question whether they were wholly or in part dependent on the earnings of the deceased, and he has decided that question by holding that they were not so dependent at the time of his death. There I am of opinion that the Sheriff is right, or, to put the matter as it would be put in England, that he has properly directed himself. I think that there is no flaw in the conclusion which he has drawn from the facts he has found.

A number of cases were cited to us, which I do not propose to go over. I proceed on the broad facts of the case—on the fact that the spouses voluntarily separated nearly twelve years ago, on the fact that the husband was never made liable (because, as I gather, he was never asked) to support his wife and child, and on the further fact that he did not contribute a single penny to their support down to the day of his death. Now, in these circumstances, can it be said that the Sheriff was wrong in the conclusion to which he has come? I think not.

It was argued by Mr Orr that the husband was liable in law to support his wife. Now, it is true that he might, in certain circumstances, have been called on. But does the husband's legal obligation affect the matter at all? I agree with the opinions expressed by Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear in the case of Turners Limited v. Whitefield,¹ that the fact of the husband being under a legal obligation to support his wife does not alter the fact that she was not dependent on him at the time of his death. Lord Adam says: "The facts found shew that she separated from her husband some fourteen years ago, when she cast in her lot with some illegitimate children of her own, by whom, and partially by her own exertions, she was being maintained at the time of the death. I do not think that the fact that the husband was under a legal obligation to support her makes any

Mar. 14, 1908. difference. It does not alter the fact that she was not dependent on his earnings at the time of his death." Lord Kinnear agrees with Lord Adam, for he says: "I agree with what has been said by Lord Adam, that the question does not depend merely upon the legal liability of a husband to support his wife, because the section in question requires that two conditions shall have been satisfied. In the first place, it is provided that the person said to be a dependant shall be a person 'entitled, according to the law of Scotland, to sue the employer for damages or solatium in respect of the death of the workman.' That condition is satisfied when the woman claiming compensation is in the position of a wife who is legally entitled to be supported by her husband. But then the statute goes on to prescribe as a second condition that the claimant must be such a person among those already described as was 'wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death.' I do not think it necessary to define the word 'dependent' more exactly than the statute defines it. But I am not prepared to say that its meaning is exhausted when it is said to cover those who were in fact supported by the deceased workman up to the time of his death." I agree with every word of that. I think that the Sheriff was right in holding that, while the claimants here answer the description of persons "entitled, according to the law of Scotland, to sue the employer for damages or solatium in respect of the death of the workman," they do not, either of them, answer the description of person dependent on the earnings of the deceased at the time of his death.

LORD LOW.—(After stating the facts)—Now, I think that as regards the widow the case is a very plain one. As I have said, she voluntarily left her husband some eleven years before his death. She never received, or apparently asked for, any aliment from him during that period, but supported herself. Now, I think that if a wife voluntarily leaves her husband and chooses her own line of life, and supports herself by her own earnings, it is impossible to say that in any reasonable sense she is either wholly or partially dependent on his earnings at the time of his death, so I have no doubt that the Sheriff-substitute is right in his view about the widow.

The case of the child is more difficult, because a pupil child cannot choose his own line of life and cannot earn his own livelihood, and there is no doubt that in one sense every pupil child may be said to be dependent on its father, because the father is under an obligation to support it. Now, if a father deserted a pupil child and refused to support it, and if that child were kept from starvation only by charity from others, I would have no hesitation in saying that, although the father was not in fact supporting it at the time of his death, yet the child was, within the meaning of the statute, dependent on the earnings of the father. That, however, is an extreme case in one direction, and I think an equally extreme case in the other direction might be supposed—for instance, if a child had independent means which were administered by trustees, and which were ample for his support, and by which he was in fact supported, it is plain that he would not be dependent on the earnings of his father. But between such extreme cases there may be a great variety of circumstances where the question whether or not a pupil child was dependent on the earnings of the father at the time of his death would be attended with considerable difficulty. Mar. 14, 1908. It is perhaps impossible to lay down a rule which will be applicable to every case, but I am inclined to think that as good a test as can be found is that given by Lord Moncreiff in the case of Cunningham v. M'Gregor & Company.¹ That was the case of a wife, but I think the case of a child is substantially the same, and what Lord Moncreiff said was that the question whether a wife was or was not entitled to claim compensation depended on whether she had at her husband's death means of support of a more or less permanent and substantial character. Now, applying that test here we find that this pupil child had been supported by his mother for very nearly eleven years prior to the father's death, which gives the support the character of substantial permanency, and there is nothing to suggest that at the time of the father's death the support which the pupil child was receiving had come to be of a precarious character. I am therefore of opinion that in the case of the child, as in the case of the mother, the determination of the Sheriff-substitute was right, and accordingly I concur that the question of law should be answered in the negative.

Lord Low.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur with both your Lordships. This is a compensation Act, and its purpose is to give compensation to workmen and also to dependants of workmen who may have suffered by their deaths. Now, that being the purpose of the Act, we must start with this: that it is only actual loss for which compensation is to be awarded, and not prospective or possible loss, and accordingly the Act provides that the dependants who are to be entitled to compensation are such of the persons entitled according to the law of Scotland to sue the employer for damages or solatium in respect of the death of the workman "as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death." Now, it appears to me that that definition excludes altogether the idea that a legal right to support from a person killed by an accident on the part of a person surviving him can by itself constitute the latter a dependant of the deceased in the sense of the Act; it concentrates the attention of any Court which has to decide a case like the present on these points—first, whether the person claiming compensation was in fact dependent upon the earnings of the workman; and, second, whether he or she was so at the time of the workman's death. Now, it has been decided in the case of the *Main Colliery Company*² in the House of Lords, and in the cases of Turners,³ Baird,⁴ and *Moyes*⁵ in the First Division of this Court, that the question raised by this definition is primarily one of fact, and, if I may humbly say so, I think that that is the true view of the matter. Of course every question of fact under a statute may become a question of law in so far as a question may arise whether certain circumstances bring a person within a certain category laid down in the statute—for instance, whether certain facts render or do not render a person a dependant within the meaning of the Act—and so far that may be said to be a question of mixed fact and law, but being so, it is primarily a matter of fact that has Now, after what your Lordships have said, I do not think I need to say more, except that I desire to express my concurrence with what was said by the Lord President on the construction of this Act in the case of Baird,¹ and in particular I concur in his criticism of Lord Young's judgment in the case of *Sneddon v. Expenses—Arrestments on Dependence—Recall—Motion—Separate Process—Personal Diligence Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114), sec. 20.

—Pursuers, who had been found by the Inner-House entitled to the expenses of an action, included in their account a sum of £6, 6s., as the cost of opposing an incidental motion for recall of arrestments on the dependence made by the defenders when the action was in the Outer-House, and refused by the Lord Ordinary without pronouncing any interlocutor. The Auditor disallowed the charge in toto, on the ground that, in view of section 20 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838,* proceedings before a Lord Ordinary for recall of arrestments, whether by petition or motion, constituted a separate process, the expenses of which could not be dealt with in the principal action.

The pursuers presented a note of objections to the Auditor's report, in so far as he had disallowed the expenses of opposing the motion for recall of the arrestments. The defenders supported the determination of the Auditor.†

The Court sustained the objection and allowed £3, 3s. for said expenses.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), First Schedule (1) (a).—Death of Workman—Amount of Compensation—Dependant—Sum "reasonable and proportionate to the injury"—Funeral Expenses.—In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, for the death of a workman, the arbitrator found that an illegitimate pupil child of the deceased, for whose support the deceased had been paying aliment under a decree of affiliation and aliment, was partially dependent on his earnings, and that the sum available for compensation under the Act was £150. No other dependant having applied for compensation the arbitrator awarded the whole sum of £150, less £5, 10s. of funeral expenses, to the illegitimate child.

Murray v. Gourlay.

Held, on an appeal, that in making the award the arbitrator had proceeded on a wrong principle, in respect that the Act does not provide for the maximum sum being awarded in every case, but only for an award of reasonable compensation within that limit; and case remitted to him to ascertain the prospective value of the contributions that would probably have been made by the deceased, if he had lived, for the support of his illegitimate child.

Opinion, per curiam (following Bevan v. Crawshaw Brothers (Cyfartha), Limited, [1902] 1 K. B. 25), that reasonable funeral expenses are a proper charge on the fund available for compensation.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, arising out of the death of John Murray, golf club maker, Carnoustie, compensation for his death was claimed from his employer, James Gourlay, golf club maker, Carnoustie, by Margaret Ann Murray, the pupil illegitimate child of the deceased, and also by James Murray, the deceased's father. The Sheriff-substitute of Forfarshire at Arbroath (Lee), acting as arbitrator, awarded to the first applicant £144, 10s., and to the second £5, 10s. for funeral expenses; and at the request of the respondent stated a case for appeal.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.

The case set forth that the Sheriff-substitute, besides finding that the deceased had lost his life by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, further found "in fact that the claimant Margaret Ann Murray is the illegitimate daughter of the said deceased, conform to extract decree of affiliation and aliment obtained on 17th July 1907, and that she was at the time of his death partially dependent upon his earnings . . . that the said claimant James Murray is an able-bodied labourer in receipt of regular wages, and that he was not, at the time of deceased's death, either wholly or partially dependent upon the deceased's earnings. Found further in fact that the deceased's funeral expenses, amounting to £5, 10s. or thereby, have been paid by the claimant James Murray. Found that the sum available for compensation in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, is £150. Found in law that the claimant James Murray, not having been dependent on the deceased, had no claim to compensation under the Act, but is entitled, out of the sum available for compensation, to repayment of the amount paid by him for funeral expenses; and that the claimant Margaret Ann Murray, having been partially dependent on the deceased, is entitled to a reasonable sum proportionate to the injury to her through the deceased's death as compensation therefor. Assessed the compensation due to the said claimant at £144, 10s."

Mar. 17, 1908.

Murray v.
Gourlay.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Whether the sum assessed is reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the claimant Margaret Ann Murray in so far that it exceeds in amount the aggregate of the alimentary contributions in which the deceased workman would have been liable had he lived?"

The case was heard on 18th February 1908.

Argued for the appellant;—The arbitrator was in error in awarding the maximum sum here. He had failed to follow the provisions of the statute, which were that he should award a sum which was "reasonable and proportionate to the injury."* The sum awarded here was not reasonable and proportionate, for two reasons. First, the sum was the maximum which could have been awarded if the claimant had been totally dependent, while here the claimant was only partially dependent, being dependent principally on her mother, and only dependent on the deceased to the extent of a decree for aliment, under which the mother was entitled to receive certain payments from the deceased. Second, in estimating the pecuniary value of the dependency, that estimate must be made as at the time of the death, and at that time the dependency rested only on the decree for aliment, the capital value of which was £78. The arbitrator was bound to take into consideration both the extent of the dependency on the mother, and the value of the actual dependency on the deceased as at the date of his death,¹ and he had failed to do so here. It was not a reasonable and proportionate estimate of the injury to base it on a speculation as to the maximum which, under any conceivable circumstances, the deceased might have had to provide.

Argued for the respondent;—The arbitrator's award should not be interfered with, for the finding as to dependency and as to the pecuniary value of the dependency was a finding in fact on which the arbitrator was final.² Further, the arbitrator was entitled to exercise his discretion as to the sum awarded, and his discretion ought not to be interfered with so long as he kept within the maximum limits.³ In

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 58), First Schedule, enacts:—" (1) The amount of compensation under this Act shall be—

" (a) Where death results from the injury—

" (i.) If the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings, a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, or the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds, whichever of those sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case three hundred pounds. . . .

" (ii.) If the workman does not leave any such dependants, but leaves any dependants in part dependent upon his earnings, such sum, not exceeding in any case the amount payable under the foregoing provisions, as may be agreed upon, or, in default of agreement, may be determined, on arbitration under this Act, to be reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the said dependants."

any event, the arbitrator had rightly exercised his discretion here, for ^{Mar. 17, 1908.} he was not limited to a consideration of the sum awarded in the decree for aliment. The liability for support was a continuing liability,¹ and ^{Murray v. Gourlay.} the arbitrator was entitled to take all future contingencies into consideration in arriving at his estimate of what was a reasonable and proportionate value to put on the injury. [No argument was submitted by either side with regard to the award of the funeral expenses.]

At advising on 17th March 1908,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this case the important facts are that the deceased John Murray was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and that he left an illegitimate child, Margaret Ann Murray, who was partially dependent on his earnings. The Sheriff-substitute, acting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, has found that the sum available for compensation is £150, and he has awarded this sum, less £5, 10s., for funeral expenses, as the compensation due to the child. I may here notice that it has been held in England,² that in such a case reasonable funeral expenses are a proper charge on the available fund, and I propose that we should follow this decision. The question then remains whether the Sheriff-substitute was right in awarding the balance of the available fund to the child as compensation.

The Act of 1906 puts illegitimate children and grandchildren into the category of dependants, and in their case, just as in the case of lawful children, the question must be, What is the measure of the parent's obligation to maintain the child?

According to the judgment of the House of Lords in Main Colliery Company v. Davies,³ this is a question of fact in each case to be determined neither by strictly legal considerations nor by any supposed standard of living in the class to which the workman belongs, but by taking into consideration the extent to which the applicant was in fact dependent on the injured workman, and putting a value upon the benefit which the applicant derived from being so dependent.

In the question put to us it is stated (inferentially) that the sum assessed "exceeds in amount the aggregate of the alimentary contributions in which the deceased workman would have been liable had he lived." Now, it is evident that the deceased was not a willing contributor to the support of his illegitimate child, because he allowed a decree of affiliation and aliment to go out against him, and no facts are stated which warrant the inference that the deceased would have contributed anything in excess of what he could be compelled by law to pay. If there are grounds for holding that the deceased voluntarily recognised an obligation to contribute to a larger extent than he was legally bound to do, the arbitrator would be right in taking such evidence into account. But I think that in awarding the whole available fund, less funeral expenses, the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded on a wrong principle, because the Act of Parliament does not prescribe that the maxi-

JAMES M. SINCLAIR, residing at Cloichard Cottages, Pitlochry, in the parish of Moulin, Perthshire, in June 1907 raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Perth against the School Board of the parish of Moulin, in the county of Perth, and William MacGowan, school-master, residing at Pitlochry, in which he prayed the Court to interdict the defenders from refusing to enrol the pursuer as a pupil at Pitlochry Public School, and preventing him from entering, or excluding or expelling him from said school, or in any other way obstructing his attendance as a pupil at said school during school hours, and to grant interim interdict, or otherwise, and alternatively, to decern and ordain the defenders, the School Board of the parish of Moulin, to make sufficient and available provision elsewhere for the efficient education of the pursuer.*

The pursuer was an illegitimate child. He was born in Pitlochry on 5th June 1896, and resided with his grandfather, James Sinclair, at Pitlochry, in the parish of Moulin, Perthshire. The defender William MacGowan was headmaster of Pitlochry Public School, which was vested in and under the management of the School Board of the parish of Moulin.

The pursuer was enrolled as a pupil in Pitlochry School in September 1901, and attended there until December 1906, when the School Board refused to admit him to the school on the ground that he was mentally incapable of receiving instruction in a board school, and hindered the progress of the other children. On 27th December a letter† was sent by the Clerk of the School Board to James Sinclair

* The Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 1, enacts:—" . . . 'Parent' shall include guardian and any person who is liable to maintain or has the actual custody of any child."

The Education (Scotland) Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 9), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "It shall be the duty of every parent to provide efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for his children who are between five and fourteen years of age."

The Education of Defective Children (Scotland) Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 10), enacts:—

Sec. 1. "From and after the commencement of this Act it shall be lawful for a school board in Scotland, if they think fit, either alone or in combination with one or more school boards, to make special provision for the education, medical inspection, and, where required, for the conveyance to and from school, of epileptic or crippled or defective children between five and sixteen years of age, within their education district, and to defray the cost thereof out of the school fund."

Sec. 2. "The expression 'defective children' means children who, not being imbecile, and not being merely dull or backward, are, by reason of mental or physical defect, incapable of receiving proper benefit from the instruction in the ordinary schools."

† "Dear Sir,—I wrote you some time ago that your grandson, James Sinclair, was mentally incapable of receiving instruction in a board school, and that he was not to be sent to school in the meantime. Notwithstanding my letter, the boy has again been sent to school, and is a source of great trouble in the class, as he is quite incapable of learning anything and cannot sit still, but wanders about the room, thus distracting the attention of the class. The Board are not bound to provide instruction for children who are mentally weak, and a public school is not the proper place for such a child; and, by instructions of the Board, I have therefore to intimate that James Sinclair cannot be permitted to enter Pitlochry School unless you produce a certificate from a duly qualified medical man that James

School Board. In January 1907 the pursuer was examined, at the instance of James Sinclair, by Dr Robert Stirling, Perth, who stated in a certificate that, although backward, he was not unfit for education, but required special consideration on account of physical weakness. A copy of this certificate was sent by James Sinclair to the School Board, and on 22d January a letter was sent by the School Board in reply stating that they could not in the circumstances admit the pursuer to their school. On 25th January James Sinclair's law-agent forwarded to the Scotch Education Department Dr Stirling's certificate and the School Board's letters of 27th December and 22d January, with a formal request that the Department should compel the School Board to educate the pursuer. A correspondence followed between James Sinclair's law-agent and the Education Department, and ultimately, the Department got the pursuer examined by Dr Ash of Dunfermline, who prepared a report * upon his physical and mental condition. Thereafter the Scotch Education Department wrote saying that the pursuer "would appear to belong to the category of 'defective' children for whom special provision may be made by a school board" under the Act of 1906.

The pursuer (cond. 5) denied that he was incapable of receiving benefit from the instruction in Pitlochry Public School.

The defenders averred that the pursuer was incapable of receiving ordinary instruction in an ordinary school. They also stated that they did not think fit to make special provision for the education of the pursuer under the Act of 1906.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders being bound to admit and enrol the pursuer as a pupil in Pitlochry Public School, and having refused to do so, interdict should be granted, as craved, with expenses. (2) The pursuer being a child of school age resident in the parish of Moulin, the defenders, the School Board of the said parish, are bound, in terms of the Education (Scotland) Act, to have at all times sufficient and available provision for his efficient education.

The defenders, the School Board pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (4) The defenders having acted within their power and according to their duty as managers of the school in refusing to admit the pursuer to the school, the petition should be refused. (5) Separatim, the exclusion of the pursuer from the said school being in the circumstances proper and reasonable, the petition should be refused.

The Sheriff-substitute (Sym), after appointing a curator ad litem

Sinclair is at the time of the certificate being granted so far improved mentally as to be capable of receiving instruction at a board school in the usual way."

* " Conclusion.— . . . it is practically hopeless to expect any education in the literary direction, though something might be done to instruct by and through the sense of hearing and Kinæsthetic memory. In any case instruction could only be carried out in special schools. The pursuer appealed.

Argued for the pursuer and appellant;—Every child capable of being educated was entitled to receive elementary education from the educational authorities, and every parent or guardian was entitled to demand education for his child.¹ The Education Acts placed parents or guardians under an obligation to send their children to school,² from which obligation there necessarily arose a correlative right on the part of the parent or guardian to demand that his child should be received into the school. This duty to send, and obligation to receive, was not confined to the case of normal children only, but extended to all children who were in any degree capable of receiving education. Thus school boards were bound to educate blind and deaf mutes³ where their parents were in poverty, and by the Education of Defective Children (Scotland) Act, 1906,⁴ the statute particularly under consideration in the present case, express power was given to school boards to make special provision for the education of "defective" children. That statute, reasonably interpreted, meant that whereas formerly the school board were bound to receive such children in their ordinary school, they had now the option of making special provision for them elsewhere, but it contained nothing to suggest that they could rid themselves altogether of their primary obligation to supply education. The suggestion that a school board could refuse to admit scholars involved a complete misapprehension of the duties of a school board, which were to safeguard the rights and interests of rate-payers, by protecting them against extravagant expenditure, and by at the same time securing efficiency in accommodation and education.⁵ *Haddow v. Glasgow School Board*⁶ had no bearing, because the parent of the child there was able to pay for the books in question. In no event, however, could the case be decided in favour of the defenders without proof upon the question of the existence of defectiveness. The plea as to title was purely technical. The only question which the Court considered in such a case was whether the pursuer had an interest. Here the pursuer's interest was undoubted.

Argued for the respondents;—The pursuer had no title to sue, children having no rights or duties in the matter of their education

Mar. 17, 1908. either at common law or under the Education Acts. It was on parents¹ that the duty of sending their children to school was imposed, and accordingly a title to sue the school board lay in the parents only.² Even, however, had the action been competently brought, it must fail. It was based upon the fallacy that a school board were under an obligation to educate every child in their district. Every parent, it was true, was bound to educate his child, but the school board's duty was limited to providing a school efficient for the proper education of ordinary children, unless a further duty was in any special case expressly imposed by statute, e.g., as in the case of blind and deaf mutes.³ The Education of Defective Children (Scotland) Act, 1906, section 1, was clearly only permissive, vide the words, "if they think fit." Further, the view that a school board were bound to receive all children into their school had been expressly negatived in Haddow v. Glasgow School Board.⁴ If in that case the non-possession of books justified exclusion, a fortiori must it be sufficient in the present case that the child possessed a mind incapable of receiving instruction, and habits which rendered the instruction of his class-fellows impossible. Lastly, it was a question purely for the School Board, subject to the review of the Board of Education, and the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere except upon relevant averments of mala fides, oppression, or the like.⁵

At advising on 17th March 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case is a child, and the purpose of the case is at the instance of the child to interdict the Moulin School Board from preventing him from attending their school, and from obstructing his attendance at school, and alternatively, to ordain the School Board to make sufficient provision elsewhere for his efficient education. I have no doubt that such an action by a child is incompetent. The duty of education lies upon the parent or the person who is in loco parentis, and he has the right to demand education. There is no right given to the child to demand education in its own name. I do not enlarge upon this, as I concur in Lord Stormonth-Darling's opinion, which I have seen. But even if the action were competent in that form in which it is laid, I am of opinion that the Sheriff has rightly decided the case.

The facts are that the School Board have decided that the child is "mentally incapable of receiving instruction in a board school"—giving great trouble, being incapable of learning anything, and interfering by his conduct with the proper conducting of the class in which he was. They accordingly decided that until they received a certificate of improvement in his condition from a medical man he could not be allowed to attend the school. A medical man who was consulted gave a certificate that, special requirements being attended to, the child might be taught.

 unfitness of the child to receive education in the board school. This Lord Justice-child is thus certified to be a "defective child" in the sense of the Clerk.
 Education Act.

These being the facts, they seem to me to be conclusive. To allow a proof whether the Board's discretion has been rightly exercised I hold to be quite out of the question. They are the proper tribunal, subject to review of the Education Department, and without some relevant allegation of mala fides, there is no room for further judicial inquiry.

Finally, as to the demand that they shall find another place for the child's education, it is sufficient to say that the statute lays no obligation upon the Board in the case of such a child. It confers a power on the Board, "if they see fit," to make special arrangements. It is obvious that in some circumstances such action may be reasonably feasible and in other circumstances it may be impracticable. Of this they must judge. There is nothing in this case which tends towards the conclusion that they have not exercised their judgment fairly and reasonably.

I would therefore move your Lordships to affirm the Sheriff's judgment.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This is an action at the instance of a pupil child (of the age of eleven at the date when the action was raised) against the School Board of the parish of Moulin in Perthshire to have the defenders interdicted from excluding the pursuer from the Public School of Pitlochry, and alternatively to have the School Board ordained to make sufficient and available provision elsewhere for the efficient education of the pursuer. Pupillarity being in contemplation of the law a state of absolute incapacity, it was clear that the action could not proceed as it stood; and the pursuer being illegitimate and having no legal guardian, the Sheriff-substitute adopted the expedient of appointing Mr Gordon, a solicitor in Perth, to be curator ad litem to the pursuer, and by a later interlocutor repelled the plea of "no title to sue." It seems to me that however unobjectionable the course adopted by the Sheriff-substitute would have been in an ordinary action, it was not the proper course to take when it was brought under his notice by both parties that the pursuer resided with his grandfather, who had the actual custody of the child, and was therefore undeniably his "parent" within the meaning of section 1 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872. In such a case as this I hold that the plea of "no title to sue" should have been sustained and not repelled, for the proper person to raise any question as to the duty of a school board to receive any particular child is, in my opinion, not the child himself, but the parent of the child, or the person having the actual custody of the child, on whom the duty of providing efficient elementary education in reading, writing, and arithmetic for children between five and fourteen years of age was laid by section 1 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1901. And it is to be observed that the definition which I have quoted above from the Act of 1872 is read into the Act of 1901, because by section 7 all the Education

Mar. 17, 1908. Acts from 1872 to 1901 are to be construed as one Act. In short, there are only two legal persons—the school board and the parent as defined in the Act of 1872—standing towards each other with correlative rights and duties. It is said that the child himself has an interest; and I admit that he will ultimately have the highest interest of all. But for the time being he has no interest, because he has no duty, except the passive one of imbibing the instruction which he receives. Certainly he has no interest on which, even apart from his status of pupillarity, he can sue, and no rights which he can enforce.

Sinclair v.
Moulin

LdStormonth-
Darling.

I therefore think that we ought to sustain the plea of “no title to sue” which the Sheriff-substitute repelled by the interlocutor of 13th August 1907.

But since we had an interesting argument on the question whether even the grandfather, having the actual custody of the child, could insist on the child being received by the School Board into the public school, or else on their making sufficient provision elsewhere for his efficient education, it is, I think, desirable to take the case upon the footing that the action had been brought at his instance and not at the child's. Now, the whole difficulty here is personal to the boy. After doing their best for his education since he was six years of age, the School Board, through their clerk, intimated to the boy's grandfather, that he was mentally incapable of receiving instruction in a board school, that he was a source of great trouble in the class, as he was quite incapable of learning anything, and could not sit still, but wandered about the room, thus distracting the attention of the class, and for other reasons which are fully set out in their letter of 27th December 1906, they concluded by intimating that the boy could not be permitted to enter Pitlochry School unless the grandfather produced a certificate from a duly qualified medical man that the boy was so far improved mentally as to be capable of receiving instruction at a board school in the usual way. The grandfather then had him examined by Dr Stirling of Perth (a medical practitioner of good standing), who granted a rather inconclusive certificate. This certificate was intimated to and considered by the School Board, and their reply was that, as they had no school staff sufficient to have the boy specially taught, and as the teacher could not neglect the other children in the class in order to give special teaching to this boy, they must adhere to their former determination not to admit him to Pitlochry School. The matter then seems to have been brought under the notice of the Scotch Education Department, at the instance of the boy's legal adviser.

I am quite willing to accept the view taken by the Sheriff-substitute, that the pursuer and his advisers had done nothing to justify what might be called a “reference” of the child's capacity to attend school to Dr Ash of Dunfermline, but it is certain that Dr Ash was selected on the suggestion of the Department. That gentleman visited Pitlochry and examined the boy in the presence of his grandparents and his legal adviser on 3d May 1907. Three days afterwards he made a careful and detailed report, which was forwarded to the Department by the School Board. The practical conclusion of it was that “in any case instruction could only be carried out in special schools. In my opinion, therefore, the boy, not being imbecile, is by reason of mental defect incapable of receiving proper benefit from the instruction in ordinary schools, but capable of receiving instruction in special classes." These words are an echo of section 2 of the Education of Defective Children (Scotland) Act, 1906, which defines defective children thus:—"The expression 'defective children' means children who, not being imbecile, and not being merely dull and backward, are, by reason of mental or physical defect, incapable of receiving proper benefit from the instruction in the ordinary schools," and by section 3 of the same Act it is enacted that "this Act shall be construed as one with the Education (Scotland) Acts 1872 to 1906." To complete the narrative of this correspondence (which is all admitted and referred to), it is proper to add that it ended with a letter from the Department of 10th May 1907, saying that "the boy in question would appear to belong to the category of 'defective children' for whom special provision may be made by a School Board in terms of the Education of Defective Children (Scotland) Act, 1906." And it is important to note that the power to make this "special provision" is all qualified by the words "if they think fit."

Mar. 17, 1908.
 Sinclair v.
 Moulin
 School Board.
 LdStormonth-

Accordingly the question comes to be—Has the grandfather, as the actual custodian of the boy, and therefore, for the purposes of the Education Acts from 1872 downwards in the position of his parent, any right in the circumstances to insist in either alternative of this petition? He is not bound to send him to a public school; his duty is discharged if he has him efficiently educated in reading, writing, and arithmetic in any school of his selection. If the boy is, "by reason of mental defect, incapable of receiving proper benefit from the instruction in ordinary schools," as Dr Ash's report and the letter of the Department say he is, it would undoubtedly be unfortunate for the poor boy that he should be debarred from receiving the little instruction of which he is capable. But, on the other hand, why should the whole order and discipline of the school and the efficient education of the other children in the school, for which the School Board are responsible, be upset by the presence of this hapless lad? It is no question of mere dullness and backwardness. For the exclusion of a case of that kind from its provisions the statute of 1906 makes careful provision, no doubt for the reason that there would be a certain danger in allowing such a case to come within the category of mental defect. But, literally, the only averment in the condescendence of which the proof allowed by the Sheriff-substitute (though rather unwillingly, as I gather) could take note is the averment in cond. 5, "the pursuer denies that he is incapable of receiving benefit from the instruction in Pitlochry Public School." Is that a kind of averment which a Court of law can be asked to send to proof? It is always within the competency and duty of a Court of law to inquire whether a public body, to which has been committed a certain duty of inquiring into facts, have acted reasonably and within the powers entrusted to them, or capriciously and in disregard of those powers—(see observations of Lord President Inglis in *Lord Advocate v. Stow School Board*¹). But here it is not suggested that any such disregard of statutory powers has occurred, either on the part of the School Board or the Education Department. And, if these two public bodies have acted within their powers, can it be said that they are not, each

Mar. 17, 1908. in its own sphere, the proper judges of this boy's fitness for receiving benefit from the ordinary instruction in a public school, and next, whether the School Board can be called upon, in justice to the other interests involved, to make special provision for the efficient education of this particular boy!

Sinclair v. School Board. Moulin. LdStormonth-Darling. If this latter demand is to be open to any parent, or person in loco parentis, I confess I do not see why the Legislature was careful, after referring to a school board in Scotland, to insert the words "if they think fit."

It therefore seems to me that the Sheriff has decided the case upon perfectly right grounds (except only, as I have explained, that he ought to have sustained the plea of "no title to sue"). He has found no expenses due to or by either party in the Sheriff Court, and, as this was an action against a public body on the construction of a recent statute, I think this may pass. But I also think that the pursuer and his advisers, having got a sound judgment against them from the Sheriff, were not entitled to carry the case further, except on penalty of bearing the expenses of the appeal, and I am therefore in favour of finding the School Board entitled to the expenses of this appeal.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur in the opinion which has just been delivered by Lord Stormonth-Darling. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute erred in repelling the plea of no title to sue. Under the Education Acts the two parties concerned in attending to the education of a child are on the one hand the parent, and on the other hand the School Board, the parent being bound to see to it that the child goes to school, and the School Board, under sec. 26 of the Education Act of 1872, being bound to provide efficient schools. "Parent" is defined by sec. 1 of the said Act to include "guardian, and any person who is liable to maintain or has the actual custody of any child." In the present case, the parent in the sense of the Act is the pupil's grandfather, in whose custody he is and with whom he resides, and he was the proper person to raise an action against the School Board regarding the education of the pursuer if such action were justifiable. A pupil child does not appear to me to have under the Education Acts or at common law any title to sue an action of this kind, and it would be exposing school boards to a risk of vexatious litigation were they liable to have actions raised against them nominally at the instance of pupil children, but of course at the instigation of older people who might be possibly moved thereto by motives not of the best description.

In the next place, and supposing that the action had been at the instance of the pursuer's grandfather, I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute made a mistake in allowing a proof, I suppose with the object of enabling himself to determine the question whether the defenders were justified in excluding the pursuer from their school owing to his mental condition, and it seems to have been in the contemplation of the Sheriff-substitute that after evidence of the kind usually given in cases involving inquiries of this kind, which as everyone knows is generally lengthy and conflicting, he should then decide whether the pursuer was entitled to be educated at the Pitlochry Public School or elsewhere. Now, it appears to me that under the Education Acts school boards are the proper judges of questions of this kind, and that their actings ought not to be interfered with unless, as the Sheriff puts it, their decision is capricious or unconscionable or founded on an erroneous view of the law—and I might add, if their conduct has been oppressive. But there is no suggestion in the whole proceedings in this matter that the School Board have acted otherwise than regularly and fairly, and not only have they after careful investigation determined this question in the way they have done, but the matter has been investigated by the Scotch Education Department with the assistance of an able expert in such matters, and I think it is out of the question to propose that there should now be a proof, and that the Sheriff-substitute should upon that proof review the resolution that has been come to by the School Board, and has been approved of by the Board of Education.

Mar. 17, 1908.
 Sinclair v.
 Moulin
 School Board.
 Lord Ardwall.

By section 26 of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, it is provided that all public schools shall be under the management of the school board of the parish or burgh in which they are situated. The exercise of their discretion in regard to the management of the school, including, of course, the question of the exclusion or admission of any pupil, forms part of the functions of the school board as managers of the school, and resolutions arrived at by them with regard to such matters ought not, in my opinion, to be interfered with except on very weighty grounds, and none such exist here.

As I agree with what has been said by the Lord Justice-Clerk, by Lord Stormonth-Darling, and by the Sheriff in his note, it is unnecessary for me to add more.

LORD LOW was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal: Recall the said interlocutor appealed against, as also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 13th August last, except in so far as it dismisses the action as laid against the defender MacGowan, which is affirmed: Recall also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 28th October last: Sustain the first plea in law for the defenders, the School Board of the parish of Moulin: Dismiss the action against them, and decern."

 Hay & Co. v.
 Torbet.

Payment—Appropriation—Account-current.—Where a debtor has paid money on account to his creditor, if the debtor has not appropriated particular payments to particular debts, the appropriation is governed by the intention of the creditor, express, implied, or presumed.

A firm of cattle auctioneers rendered an account to a customer setting forth, in a column in order of date, cattle, &c., sold to the customer, and cash advances made to him, and in another column, below the first, in order of date, the payments made by the customer to the auctioneers. The columns were each added up, and the balance was struck by deducting the amount of the second column from the amount of the first.

Dec. 17, 1907. Held that the account was not an account-current to which the rule as to the appropriation of payments applied.

2D DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Perthshire. On 7th May 1904 Robert D. Torbet, postmaster and merchant, Balbeggie, granted an obligation in favour of Hay & Company, auctioneers, Perth, by which he guaranteed "full and final payment of all purchases made, or that may be made, and of all sums advanced, or that may be advanced, by you to Alexander Cromb, dairyman, St Martins, Balbeggie, with interest at the rates as may from time to time be charged by you, declaring that the said sums shall not exceed the total of Seventy-five pounds sterling (£75). And, further, providing and declaring that this guarantee shall be a continuing obligation until recalled in writing."

On 1st August 1904 the business of Hay & Company was transferred to Hay & Company, Limited, who took over, as at that date, the whole assets and liabilities of Hay & Company.

No intimation of the transference was sent to Torbet.

On 26th January 1905 Hay & Company, Limited, rendered an account in the following terms to Cromb, viz. :—

On 26th July 1905 Torbet wrote to Hay & Company, withdrawing his guarantee as from that date. Hay & Company, Limited, replied, on 29th July, intimating that Cromb was in their debt to more than the full amount of the guarantee, and requesting payment of the amount guaranteed, £75.

Torbet having declined to make any payment, Hay & Company and Hay & Company, Limited, raised the present action against him in the Sheriff Court at Perth for decree for payment of £67, 4s. 6d., being the amount due by Cromb to Hay & Company as at 1st August 1904, after deducting payments by Cromb down to that date. In the action the pursuers admitted that Torbet's liability under the guarantee was terminated ipso facto by the change of company on 1st August 1904, and that he was not liable for debts incurred by Cromb after that date.

In defence Torbet pleaded, inter alia;—The said guarantee has been extinguished by payments made by the said Alexander Cromb to the pursuers subsequent to the date of the change in pursuers' firm, which payments must be appropriated to the guaranteed debt.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

On 2d July 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) granted decree for the sum sued for.

On appeal the Sheriff (Johnston), on 15th October, adhered.

The defender appealed, and argued;—Where there was an account-current between the parties the rule was that, in the absence of express appropriation, items on the credit side of the account were to be set against items on the debit side in the order of date.¹ This rule was not confined to bankers' accounts or to pure cash accounts; all that was necessary was that there should be a continuous account with a debit and a credit side.² The account here was of that nature. It was stated continuously, and no distinction was made between Cromb's indebtedness to the old firm and his indebtedness to the new Limited Company. Where a guarantee was revoked in consequence of a change in the creditor's firm, and an account was thereafter rendered to the common debtor, setting forth dealings both before and after the change of firm, indefinite payments made subsequent to the change of firm fell to be set against the balance due at the change.³ The presumption here was that payments made by Cromb after the change of firm were to be applied in extinction of Cromb's

Hay & Co. v.
Torbet.

Argued for the pursuers;—The case of the "Mecca"¹ had altered the rule, or at least the expression of the rule, laid down in Clayton's case.² Previously the rule had been expressed to be that where neither of the parties made an appropriation of particular payments to particular debts the law made the appropriation; the rule was now expressed to be that where the debtor did not appropriate particular payments to particular debts, the application of the payments was governed not by any rigid rule of law but by the intention of the creditor, expressed, implied, or presumed, and that he might exercise that right up to the last moment by action or otherwise. But, however expressed, the rule did not apply here, for it applied only to cases of account-current, that was to say, to bankers' accounts or to accounts drawn up on the model of bankers' accounts, i.e., in which item was set against item in parallel columns.³ Here the account was drawn up on the principle of setting summation against summation. Further, the rule was not an absolute rule, it was merely a presumption that, in the case of accounts-current credit items fell to be set against debit items in the order of date.⁴ Here there was abundant evidence that the pursuers intended to appropriate the payments made since the date of the incorporation of the Limited Company to debts incurred since that date. It did not make any difference that the question arose with the debtor's cautioner and not with the debtor himself.⁵

At advising on 17th December 1907,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The defender Torbet having along with another become cautioner for Alexander Cromb for all purchases made and all sums that might be advanced to him by a firm of Hay & Company, the question in the case is whether he is liable to pay to Hay & Company, Limited, as in right of all assets of Hay & Company, the balance which Cromb has failed to pay. The caution was for an amount not to exceed £75. The present claim is for a balance of £67, 4s. 6d.

The defence is that Cromb made payments to Hay & Company, Limited, which if appropriated to the first items in the account with Hay & Company would extinguish the obligation. The contention is that the rule as to appropriation of payments on accounts-current applies to the kind of account with which the Court has to deal, viz., that where there has been no special appropriation of payments these must be held to apply to and to go to extinguish the first item of debt. That there is in cases to which the rule is appropriate such a legal presumption is not doubtful, and indeed is not disputed. But the pursuers maintain that the case is not one in which the presumption applies, and further, that if it did apply, it is a presumption which can be redargued, and that it is redargued by the facts disclosed in the documentary and oral evidence.

⁵ Eyre v. Everett, 1826, 2 Russ. 381; Creighton v. Rankin, 1840, 7 Cl. & Fin. 325.

If it were necessary to decide the question whether there was in this case Dec. 17, 1907. an account-current between the parties, in the true sense of that expression, Hay & Co. v. I should hold that there was not any such account-current. It is true that Torbet. while an account between a bank and a customer to whom advances are Lord Justice- being made is the most direct illustration of an account-current to which the Clerk. presumptions as to appropriation of payments applies, yet it is quite certain that accounts of a similar character, although not occurring in business of a strictly banking type, may be held to be in the same position. The case of *M'Kinley v. Wilson*¹ may be taken as an illustration of an account-current which was an account of transactions not purely of a banking character, including as it did purchases and sales. Nevertheless, on the facts which brought out the intention of parties, it was held that the account which was made out as an "account-current" was truly of that character, and the presumptions as to appropriation of payments applied. But in cases where the accounts truly disclose trade transactions the presumption does not apply. Where in course of a series of transactions of trade payments are made to account, these go against the general indebtedness, the debtor not being entitled to claim that they presumably go to clear off the first items, and the creditor not being entitled to shut the debtor out from his defence against the liability for any particular item by maintaining that the debtor in making payment has cleared off that particular item and cannot go back upon it.

Now, in my opinion, the whole character of the accounts in this case is against the idea of the application of the doctrines which apply to accounts-current. It may be true that the pursuers did not absolutely confine their dealings with Cromb to transactions of purchase and sale, and sometimes helped him over a temporary difficulty by financial aid. But that would not, as I think, necessarily convert what was in its general character a tradesman's account into an account-current. Therefore, as I said before, if it were necessary to decide the matter strictly, I should be inclined to hold that the defence set up on the theory of an account-current must fail.

But I am clearly of opinion that if there were any ground for holding that this was an account to which the doctrine of particular appropriation might apply, the presumption arising upon it has been completely redargued. Hay & Company, Limited, when they took over the business and assets of Hay & Company, made their position quite clear, to the effect that in business with them Cromb was to make payments for that which they sold to him. This is made distinct by their insisting upon a payment to account on a purchase of hay before Cromb was allowed to take delivery, and by their repeated insistence that he should pay sums to account of purchases made from them. In no more marked way could Hay & Company, Limited, shew their intention to appropriate to debts incurred to them payments to them for purchases made after they took over the business. I agree with the Sheriffs in holding that their right to do so has not been lost to them by anything that has been disclosed in the documentary or parole evidence.

Dec. 17, 1907. The case will require to go back to the Sheriff that the question of interest may be settled, and in that view I would propose that the expenses in this Court should be awarded to the successful party, and that power should be given to the Sheriff to decern for them.

Hay & Co. v.
Torbet.

LORD STORMONT-DARLING.—The stringency of the rule in Devaynes' case¹ has been a good deal modified by the course of recent decisions, particularly by the case of Cory Brothers & Company.² In particular, it is now quite recognised that the rule (never a rigid rule of law, but always yielding to evidence of the intention of the parties) does not apply at all where there is no account-current between them of the nature of that between banker and customer, nor where it appears that the creditor intended not to make any appropriation, but to reserve the right.

The only difficulty I have had in this case is that it arises not between the parties to the account, but between one of them (the creditor) and a cautioner for the debtor, and that there was a change in the persona of the creditor during the currency of the account by the conversion of the private firm into a limited company—a change which (everybody is now agreed) brought the liability of the cautioner to an end as from the date of the conversion on 1st August 1904, but which neither Limited Company nor cautioner understood at the time as having that effect. I say that, because if the cautioner had realised his position he would not have written the letter of 26th July 1905, in which he declared that in any event he would take no responsibility beyond that date, although in truth his responsibility had ceased a year before, and the Company on the other hand, if they had recognised the truth, would have intimated the change to the complainer at once, and would certainly not have replied to his letter repudiating further responsibility by writing the letters of 29th July and 4th August, in which they claimed payment of the full limit of his liability (£75), which clearly implied that they believed his liability to have continued after the formation of the Limited Company. Neither party, I believe, thought at the time that the conversion of Hay & Company into Hay & Company, Limited, made the least difference in the matter. The cautioner simply remained quiescent, while Hay & Company, Limited, went on dealing with the debtor till he became bankrupt in August 1905. They now sue the cautioner for the amount of the purchases remaining unpaid by the debtor down to the formation of the Limited Company, less the payments made to account by him before that date, the amount sued for being £67, 4s. 6d., with interest. But the defender claims to have the benefit of all the payments to the credit of the account in their order, whether before or after that date, on the assumed principle of Devaynes' case.¹

But, notwithstanding the misconception, common to both parties, which I have pointed out, and which is not shewn to have prejudiced the cautioner's position, I have come to agree in what I understand to be the view of all your Lordships, viz., that the account between the auctioneers and Cromb is not an account-current to which the rule in Devaynes' case¹ can apply, and that, even if it were, the Limited Company did evince an intention so to Dec. 17, 1907.

appropriate the subsequent payments into the account as to make Cromb, as Hay & Co. v.
far as possible, pay his way. Torbet.

LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL.—The principal facts in this case are not in dispute. On 7th May 1904 the defender granted to Hay & Company, a firm of auctioneers, the guarantee by which he guaranteed the debts that might be due to Hay & Company by a dairyman called Alexander Cromb to the amount of £75. After certain dealings had taken place between Hay & Company and Alexander Cromb the business of Hay & Company was transferred, with its rights and obligations, to Hay & Company, Limited, who were duly incorporated under the Companies Acts on 1st August 1904, and on that date took over the assets and liabilities of Hay & Company. At that date the sum of £67, 4s. 6d. was due to Hay & Company by Alexander Cromb, and this action is brought for recovery of that sum, with periodical and other interest.

The parties are agreed that the defender is not liable for any advances made or goods supplied by Hay & Company, Limited, to Alexander Cromb after the incorporation of the Limited Company, but the defender further maintains that the guaranteed debt has been extinguished by payments made by Alexander Cromb to Hay & Company, Limited, after 1st August 1904, and the only question which was discussed on the appeal was whether the defender was entitled to have such payments imputed to the extinction of the debt of £67, 4s. 6d. I am of opinion that he was not so entitled, and that accordingly the judgment of the Sheriff ought to be affirmed.

This case is of some interest as being, so far as the citation of authorities at the debate was concerned, the first case in which the question of appropriation of payments to account of particular debts has been raised in this Court since the authoritative judgment of the House of Lords in the English case of *Cory Brothers & Co. v. Owners of the "Mecca."*¹

Two points were raised at the debate—first, whether the account which was the only account rendered by Hay & Company, Limited, to the principal debtor, was so stated as to infer a presumption against the pursuers that the payments to account claimed by the defender had been appropriated by the pursuers to the items due by Mr Cromb to them in order of date, or, in other words, whether the account was a proper account-current between the parties similar to that between a banker and his customer? and second, whether on and after 1st August 1904 the payments made by Mr Cromb to Hay & Company, Limited, were appropriated by them from time to time to particular transactions?

The general law regarding the appropriation of payments was laid down with great clearness by Lord Macnaghten in the case I have mentioned, page 293. He says,—“When a debtor is making a payment to his creditor he may appropriate the money as he pleases, and the creditor must apply it accordingly. If the debtor does not make any appropriation at the time

Dec. 17, 1907. when he makes the payment, the right of application devolves on the creditor. . . . The creditor has the right of election up to the very last moment, and he is not bound to declare his election in express terms. Hay & Co. v. Torbet. He may declare it by bringing an action, or any other way that makes his meaning and intention plain. Lord Ardwall. Where the election is with the creditor it is always his intention, express or implied or presumed, and not any rigid rule of law, that governs the application of the money." The noble and learned Lord states this as the law of England, but in this matter the law of England and the law of Scotland are identical, and have been so since the leading case known as *Clayton's case*¹ (better known in Scotland as Devaynes' case) was decided.

According to the above statement of the law, and it being admitted that no appropriation was made at the times of payment by the debtor, the question in the present case comes to be whether by rendering to the principal debtor the account, the pursuers, Hay & Company, Limited, appropriated the payments in question to the first items in their account against Mr Cromb. I am of opinion that they did not.

In considering this question it is obvious that a great deal must depend on the form of the account, because if the account is so stated as to entitle the debtor to assume that there has been appropriation by the creditor of certain payments to certain items of debt the result will be that the creditor will be barred from going back upon that appropriation. Now, the account No. 18 of process is not stated as a proper account-current at all. It first contains a record of all the goods sold or advances made to Mr Cromb by the pursuers, and next, below that, a record of all the payments made by Mr Cromb to the pursuers. Each of these columns is added up, the one deducted from the other, and a balance struck. Now it appears to me that this is very far from being an account-current. It was argued for the defender that an account stated in this way was in no view essentially different from an account stated with the debit and credit entries running side by side with each other, and that the fact of its not being so stated in the present case might simply be due to there not being room on the same sheet of paper so to state it. I do not think that this argument can be accepted seriously. If the debit and credit entries had been placed side by side, that might have raised a presumption of more or less force to the effect that the entries were to be set against each other in order of date—in short, that the account was an account-current. In the present case there are two summations, and the fact that the one is deducted from the other in order to shew the balance due certainly cannot turn what is merely a summation of items of debit separately from the items of credit into an account-current. Assuming that the pursuers desired to render a statement to Alexander Cromb shewing the amount of his indebtedness to them, but without inducing him to believe that they were stating their account as an account-current, it is difficult to see in what other form they could have stated their account. I therefore have no doubt whatever that the account contains in itself nothing that the debtor was entitled to rely on as an appropriation of particular payments to particular items of debt, and nothing to shew that the creditor appropriated or intended to appropriate payments in Dec. 17, 1907. that way.

Hay & Co. v.
Torbet.

Lord Ardwall.

The two leading cases regarding the appropriation of payments in order of date to extinction of debit entries in order of date, namely, Devaynes' case¹ and the case of Bodenham v. Purchase,² were both cases of bankers' accounts, and indeed bankers' accounts are the typical examples of accounts-current. In Devaynes' case¹ Sir William Grant, who was the Master of the Rolls, says that where an account-current is kept between parties as a banking account "there is no room for any other appropriation than that which arises from the order in which the receipts and payments take place and are carried into the account. Presumably it is the sum first paid in which is first drawn out. It is the first item on the debit side of the account that is discharged or reduced by the first payment on the credit side. The appropriation is made by the very act of setting the two items against each other."

This rule has been adopted both in England and in Scotland, but as pointed out by the noble and learned Lords who decided the case of *The "Mecca,"*³ the rule in Devaynes' case¹ had come to be considered a rule probably of much more force and stringency than had ever been intended by the Master of the Rolls when he laid it down, although several cases prima facie falling within the doctrine in Devaynes' case¹ have since the decision in that case been decided otherwise owing to their peculiar circumstances. The case of *The "Mecca,"*³ was a case in which the account was stated very much in the same way as the one in the present case, and there it was held that there was no account-current between the parties and no other circumstances making it appear that the creditor intended to make any appropriation.

Among the Scotch cases which were cited at the debate the case of *Lang*⁴ may be taken as typical of the ordinary current account. In that case it was an account between agent and client, but the agent had from time to time been accustomed to make advances to or on behalf of the client, and, on the other hand, the client from time to time made payments to the agent by cash or by bill or note, and the account-current was kept in practically the same way as a banker's account, although the relation of the parties was that of agent and client. It was accordingly there held that the account was an account-current to which the principle of Devaynes' case¹ was applicable.

The case of *Dougall v. Lornie*⁵ was a typical case of a different kind of account. That was a case of a plumber's account divided into sections according to work done from time to time, and the account sued for was the fifth of a series of accounts rendered in a similar way. For the work charged in these accounts various payments to account had been made, and it was there held that indefinite payments to account of a tradesman's account were not to be ascribed to the items or sectional accounts in order of date so as to preclude the debtor from subsequently challenging any item in the account. Lord Adam there pointed out that "the rule in Devaynes'

Dec. 17, 1907. case¹ applies to cash accounts-current, and has no application whatever to a tradesman's account. Payments to account of a tradesman's account go not against individual items in order of date, but against summation."

Hay & Co. v.
Torbet.

Lord Ardwall. There may, however, be accounts-current consisting of entries other than proper cash entries. The case of *Mackinlay v. Wilson*² was a case of this kind. That was a case where two horse-dealers had frequent dealings with each other, and in the account sued for by Mackinlay, which was titled "account-current," horses and harness and cash were entered on the debtor side of the account, and horses, cash, and other things were entered on the other, the dates on both sides being consecutive. There prescription was pleaded, and it was against that plea that the pursuer pleaded that the account was an account-current and that prescription was excluded. Before deciding the question of prescription a proof was led, and on that proof the Court was satisfied that it was the intention of parties that the transactions should be set against each other from time to time as they occurred, and that the account, therefore, was rightly stated as an account-current, the one side of the account being set against the other, and that accordingly the plea of prescription should be repelled—See opinion of Lord Adam, page 217.

The case of *Batchelor*³ forms a useful contrast to Mackinlay's case,² for there it was held that a merchant's account with cross entries was not a proper account-current. There was no proof in that case, and it was decided simply upon the account as it stood, Lord Trayner saying,—“This is simply a merchant's account.”

From an examination of the various cases which were quoted at the debate it is evident that the important alteration in the statement of the law that was introduced by the decision in the case of *The “Mecca”*⁴ is this, that while in several of the former cases the law was stated to the effect that, failing appropriation by the debtor or the creditor, the law appropriated payments to items of debit in order of date, in the case of *The “Mecca”*⁴ the law was stated to the effect that failing appropriation of the money by the debtor, the appropriation of the money is governed by the intention of the creditor, expressed, implied, or presumed, and that such intention may be presumed from the form and statement of the account rendered by the creditor to the debtor. Applying this law to the present case, my opinion is that it cannot be presumed from the account that the creditor intended to appropriate payments to account as such after 1st August 1904, to the items of debt in order of date, and that by making the claim and raising this action for £67, 4s. 6d. they have shewn that they do not so appropriate them.

But the pursuers maintain, further, that if any presumption arises from the statement of the account, that is displaced by the fact that at the times of the payments which the defender seeks to impute in order of date to the debt incurred by Cromb before 1st August 1904, they were appropriated by the parties to particular items, and, to begin with, that the very first payment after 1st August, namely, £4 on 16th August, was paid for hay bought at Southtown sale, and in response to a letter dated 11th August Dec. 17, 1907. 1904. This is established by the proof. The course of dealing with the new firm accordingly commences with a payment appropriated to a specific item. Again, it is proved that certain cows were paid for by instalments of £1 per week, and then again it appears that Hay & Company, Limited, were frequently finding fault with Mr Cromb for not paying for particular purchases which he made from them, and for not sending in stock to be sold by them so as to pay for such purchases. In short, without going into further details, I am of opinion that it appears from the whole of the proof that when those who had the management of Hay & Company, Limited, who of course had a responsibility to the company, commenced dealing with Mr Cromb on and after the incorporation of the company, they dealt with each transaction between them and Cromb separately as it arose, and demanded and received payments to account of the particular transaction. This course of dealing is quite inconsistent with treating these transactions as parts and portions of an account-current. But further, it proves the appropriation of particular payments to particular transactions, and therefore excludes the idea that the payments on August 16th and onwards were payments which the defender is entitled to have imputed towards the debt which had been incurred previous to that date.

On both the grounds above dealt with I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed, and the case remitted back in order that the question of interest may be dealt with.

THE COURT affirmed the interlocutor appealed against.

Trust—Administration—Investment of Funds—Liability of Trustees—Local Authorities Loans Stock—Purchase at Premium—Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 44 (2)—Liferent and Fee.—The Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, by sec. 44 (1), authorises the investment of trust funds in stock issued under that Act, but by sec. 44 (2) provides "that when two or more persons are successively interested in money left subject to a trust, no investment thereof shall be made in stock at a price exceeding the redemption value of the stock."

Testamentary trustees, who held funds for behoof of different persons as liferenter and fiar respectively, in 1897 invested part of these funds in a redeemable stock issued under the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, at the price of £102 per cent, being £2 per cent more than the redemption value. They at the same time entered into an arrangement with the liferenter whereby he undertook to repay to the trust this £2 per cent of excess cost. On the death of the liferenter this £2 per cent of excess cost had been paid back to the trustees, but at that time the stock stood in the market at 10 per cent below its redemption value.

Beveridge's
Trustee v.
Beveridge.

Held that as the stock had been purchased at a price beyond its redemption value, contrary to sec. 44 (2) of the Local Authorities Loans Act, 1891, the investment was ultra vires of the trustees, and that the arrangement whereby the excess cost was to be repaid to the trust by the liferenter did not make the investment lawful.

Held, further, that as the investment was ultra vires the trustees were personally liable to restore to the trust the difference between the redemption value of the stock and the amount which it might yield on being realised.

2D DIVISION.

JAMES ADAMSON BEVERIDGE of Brucefield, Dunfermline, died on 16th November 1887, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 20th April 1883, with two relative codicils dated respectively 13th September 1883 and 10th October 1884. By his trust-disposition and settlement the testator conveyed his whole estate, heritable and moveable, to trustees for the purposes therein mentioned, and, inter alia, directed them to convey the residue of his means and estate to his sister, Mrs Elizabeth Mary Beveridge, wife of Dr Alexander Watt Beveridge. By the second codicil the testator provided:—"I hereby leave to" Robert Methven Heron, Mrs Mary Heron, and Miss Jessie Campbell Heron, "and the survivors and survivor of them, the liferent of the sum of £20,000 . . . and I hereby direct my trustees . . . to set aside and invest, in their names for behoof of the said Robert Methven Heron, Mrs Mary Heron, and Jessie Campbell Heron, and survivors and survivor of them, for liferent use only, the said sum of £20,000, on the securities authorised by the Acts of Parliament relating to the investment of trust funds . . . and on the death of the survivor, the said capital sum of £20,000 will revert to and form part of the residue of my means and estate."

Upon the truster's death his trustees invested the sum of £20,000, as directed by the second codicil. Mrs Mary Heron, one of the three liferenters of that sum, predeceased the testator, and the liferent was shared equally by the survivors, Robert Methven Heron and Jessie Campbell Heron, until the latter's death on 2d September 1896, when the sole right to the liferent vested in Robert Methven Heron.

In 1897 it became necessary to find a new investment for £9650, part of the sum of £20,000 above mentioned. On 20th April 1897 the trustees resolved to purchase £9460 of 3 per cent redeemable stock issued by the Corporation of Dunfermline at the price of £9649, 4s. (being at the rate of £102 per cent) subject to certain arrangements with Mr Robert Methven Heron the liferenter which were embodied in a letter of guarantee granted by him. This stock was issued by the Corporation of Dunfermline under and in terms of the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891.* The dividends thereon were secured upon rates or taxes levied by the Corporation able at par on 15th May 1947, or, in the option of the Corporation, at the term of Whitsunday 1917, or any term of Whitsunday or Martinmas thereafter, on three months' notice to the holder. The whole stock fell to be redeemed on or before Whitsunday 1947.

* The Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 34), enacts:—Section 44 (1)—"Trustees or other persons for the time being authorised to invest money in the mortgages, debentures, or debenture stock of any railway or other company, shall, unless the contrary is provided by the instrument authorising the investment, have the same power of investing money in stock issued under the provisions of this Act (other than stock for the time being represented by a stock certificate to bearer) as they have of investing it in the mortgages, debentures, or debenture stock aforesaid. (2) Provided that when two or more persons are successively interested in money left subject to a trust, no investment thereof shall be made in stock at a price exceeding the redemption value of the stock unless the instrument creating the trust shall otherwise expressly provide."

The letter of guarantee granted by the liferenter was dated 21st April 1897, and provided as follows:—"I, . . . sole surviving liferenter of the fund of £20,000 directed by the late Mr Beveridge, the truster, to be held in trust for the liferent use of me and the late . . . approve of your proposal to invest the sum of £9649, 4s., part of the capital of the said fund, in the purchase, at the price of £102 per cent (that being the minimum price of issue), of £9460 of the redeemable three per cent stock about to be issued by the Corporation of Dunfermline; and I further agree to accept interest on the said sum of £9460 at the rate of two and three-quarters per cent per annum—the difference between such interest and the interest payable by the Corporation to be set aside by you as a sinking fund to meet the premium of £189, 4s., being the difference between the amount payable for the stock and the par value at which the same is redeemable, or such proportion thereof as may be lost when the said stock falls to be realised, or has been redeemed by the Corporation, such sinking fund, in the event of the said stock not being realised at a loss, to be payable to me or my heirs: And, in the event of the said sinking fund not being sufficient to meet any loss that may be made on the realisation or redemption of the stock, I hereby agree and declare that the deficiency shall form a charge against my estate."

The trustees requested the law-agents of Mrs Beveridge, the fiar, to ascertain whether she would consent to the proposed investment, and referred them to section 44 (2) of the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891. In reply the fiar's law-agents wrote that Mrs Beveridge did not see her way to consent.

The £9460 of Dunfermline Corporation stock was purchased by the trustees at Whitsunday 1897 at 102 per cent, the whole price being paid out of the trust funds.

The trustees at the date of the purchase, and at the date of the resolution to purchase, were Messrs Erskine Beveridge, James Beveridge, and Robert Methven Heron, the liferenter, all of whom concurred in the purchase. James Beveridge died on 14th February 1903, and Robert Methven Heron, the liferenter, died on 23d June 1906.

The dividends received on the Dunfermline Corporation Stock (less the deduction provided for by the letter of guarantee), were regularly remitted to Mr Heron by the factor and law-agent of the trustees, accompanied by a statement shewing the details thereof. These remittances continued to be made up to the term of Whitsunday 1906, being the last half-yearly term before Mr Heron's death. From each half-yearly remittance of the said dividends $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent was deducted and retained by the factor and law-agent, this deduction being shewn in the statement as "sum set aside as sinking fund to meet premium paid on purchase of this stock in terms of letter of guarantee." At the date of Mr Heron's death the sinking fund accumulated from such deductions amounted to £213, 18s. 11d., including bank deposit interest. This sum was more than sufficient to meet the premium of 2 per cent originally paid on the stock, which amounted to £189, 4s.

Since the date when the investment in Dunfermline Corporation

Mar. 17, 1908. Stock was made, it had fallen in value in common with other Corporation stocks. At Mr Heron's death the market price was 89½, and it subsequently fell to 88½. The total depreciation at the latter date, on the price originally paid, was thus £1123, 7s. 6d., or, deducting the amount of the original premium, £934, 3s. 6d. In consequence of the death of Robert Methven Heron, the liferenter, the capital of the sum of £20,000, liferented by him, fell to be paid over to Mrs Beveridge, as residuary legatee of the testator. She intimated that she held Mr Erskine Beveridge, as sole surviving trustee, and the representatives of the deceased trustees, liable for the whole of the depreciation on the Dunfermline Corporation Stock. The surviving trustee, and the representatives of the deceased trustees, were willing to pay to the residuary legatee the premium of 2 per cent originally paid on the stock, amounting to £189, 4s., but they refused to pay the rest of the amount by which the stock had depreciated. A question in consequence arose as to whether, in the circumstances, the trustees incurred personal liability for the whole depreciation on the stock through making the investment. For the determination of this question a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The parties to the special case were—(1) the surviving trustee; (2) and (3) the representatives of James Beveridge and Robert Methven Heron, the deceased trustees; (4) Mrs Elizabeth Mary Beveridge, the residuary legatee.

The first, second, and third parties maintained that, in respect the premium on the purchase price of the stock issued by the Corporation of Dunfermline was paid by the liferenter, the stock was purchased by them at a price not exceeding the redemption value thereof; that the investment was accordingly one which the trustees were entitled to make, and did not fall within the prohibition imposed by the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, sec. 44 (2); that in any case, on a sound construction of the proviso in that subsection, it simply prohibited the payment of a higher price than the redemption value for such stocks, and created no liability except for the excess of the price paid above redemption value, provision for the repayment of which excess had in this case been provided for, and that there was therefore no liability on the trustees to make good the depreciation in value which the stock had suffered. In any event, these parties maintained that the investment was one which it was within their powers to make under the second codicil or in virtue of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Acts of 1884 and 1898, and particularly of section 3 (6) of the Act of 1884 and section 3 (b) of the Act of 1898.

The fourth party maintained that the first, second, and third parties were jointly and severally liable to make good to the trust-estate the whole depreciation on the Dunfermline Corporation Stock purchased by the trustees with the trust funds as above set forth; that the only authority which the trustees possessed for investing in that stock was derived from section 44 of the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891; that the trust funds were, at the time of the investment in question, funds in which two persons were successively interested, and the stock was purchased at a price exceeding the redemption value of the stock, without any authority to that effect in the testamentary writings under which the trustees acted; that the investment in said stock was accordingly one which, in view of subsec. (2) of sec. 44 of the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, it was ultra vires of the trustees to make, and that the first, second, and third parties were bound to restore to the trust-estate the whole amount of the depreciation thereon. Mar. 17, 1908.

Beveridge's
Trustee v.
Beveridge.

The first question of law was:—“(1) Are the first, second, and third parties jointly and severally liable to make good to the fourth party the difference between the redemption value of the said Dunfermline Corporation stock and the amount which it yields on realisation?”

The case was heard before the Second Division on 30th January and 7th February 1908.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the contentions of the parties.

At advising on 17th March 1908,—

LORD LOW.—At the time when the testamentary trustees of the deceased Mr James Adamson Beveridge invested part of the trust funds in Dunfermline Corporation stock, their only authority for so doing was the power conferred upon trustees to invest trust funds in such stocks by the 44th section of the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891. The power conferred by the statute is, however, subject to the following proviso:—“Provided that when two or more persons are successively interested in money left subject to a trust, no investment thereof shall be made in stock at a price exceeding the redemption value of the stock, unless the instrument creating the trust shall otherwise expressly provide.”

It is admitted that that proviso was applicable to the investment in question, because there were two or more persons—liferenters and fiars—successively interested in the money, and there was nothing in the trust-deed which authorised the trustees to go beyond the powers conferred by the statute. Now, it appears to me that the language of the proviso is unambiguous and imperative. “No investment shall be made in stock at a price exceeding the redemption value of the stock.” Nothing could be clearer than these words, and the fact is that the trustees did invest trust funds in stock of the kind referred to in the statute at a price of 102 per cent, while the redemption value was only 100 per cent. It is therefore clear that upon the face of the transaction the investment was one which the statute declares trustees shall not make, and was therefore ultra vires.

The trustees, however, say that although the full price was in the first instance paid out of trust funds, they made an arrangement with the liferenter whereby the excess of the price was restored to the trust-estate, with the result that ultimately, and before the expiry of the liferent, the investment had cost the trust-estate only 100 per cent, or the redemption value. They argued that the plain object of the proviso was to prevent trustees expending more money in the purchase of stock than the ultimate fiar would get back when the stock came to be redeemed, and that as the trust-estate had in fact only been diminished by the investment to the extent of the redemption value, the mischief struck at by the proviso had not arisen, and they (the trustees) could not be held to have contravened the enactment.

The argument is plausible, but I do not think that it is sound. The trustees unquestionably invested trust funds in the purchase of the stock at a price exceeding the redemption value, and they must, in my opinion,

Mar. 17, 1908. take the consequences. It seems to me that the arrangement which they made with the liferenter was for their own protection, and cannot be pleaded against the residuary legatee, seeing that not only was she no party to the arrangement, but that she expressly refused to consent to trust funds being invested in the stock at £102.

Beveridge's
Trustee v.
Beveridge.

Lord Low.

Accordingly the trustees are, in my opinion, in the position of having made an investment of trust funds which was ultra vires of them, and consequently they are liable to restore to the trust-estate the loss which it has thereby sustained. The first question therefore must, in my judgment, be answered in the affirmative.

(His Lordship then dealt with another question which is not reported.)

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur in the opinion which has just been read.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur in the opinion delivered by Lord Low, but I confess I have found the case to be one of some difficulty. I think it is obvious that the intention of the proviso of subsection 2 of section 44 of the Local Authorities Loans (Scotland) Act, 1891, was to prevent loss falling on the ultimate beneficiary when the stock came to be redeemed at par value in cases where persons were successively interested in an investment. Indeed, so far as I can see, the statute can have no other object, because it authorises the purchase of the same stocks at par value. Now, if any stock happens to stand at more than par value, the only inference to be drawn from that would be that it is a very good security and commands a premium because of its superiority to other stocks of the same description; therefore, so far as the safety of trust investments is concerned, there is no reason whatever for the provision of the subsection in question.

But I think it must be held that in dealing with statutes a Court of law is not entitled in considering a prohibition contained in a statute to inquire what the object of the prohibition is, and should the object be the prevention of a loss of some kind, to hold that if the possibility of that loss is obviated the prohibition of the statute may be disregarded. Such a method of reasoning, if generally applied, would make wild work with the application of statutes, and, in my opinion, is not permissible.

I think that in this case we must confine ourselves to a consideration of the plain question whether the investment made by the trustees in Dunfermline Corporation Stock was an investment which, as trustees, they were entitled to make at the time and at the price they did. To this there can be only one answer, to the effect that it was not. The result is that the trustees' actings must be held to have been ultra vires, and that they are liable for all loss resulting therefrom, and are not entitled in response to the fourth party's request for payment of £20,000 to tender as part thereof the investment in question, but that they are bound to replace in the trust the price originally paid for the said stock.

I therefore concur in holding that the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

(His Lordship then dealt with the other question.)

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur.

Harbour—Rights and Obligations of Harbour Commissioners—Dock—Access—Use of Lock—Special charge for use of lock—Ultra Vires—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. cap. 27), secs. 2, 3, 33, 51, 52, and 83—Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxxvii.), secs. 4, 58, 59 and 60, and Schedule (B).—Held that in virtue of sec. 33 of the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, incorporated with the Leith Harbour and Docks Acts, 1875 and 1892, and of sec. 58 of the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892, a shipowner was entitled to have access to and egress from any of the docks included in Leith Harbour for any of his vessels free of any charge other than the rates payable under sec. 58 and Schedule (B) of the special Act of 1892 at all times when such access and egress could be given with safety, either by means of the locks giving access to such docks or otherwise, and when accommodation was available, but subject to the right of the harbour-master to give directions for all or any of the purposes set out in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and also subject to the right of the Leith Docks Commissioners to make bye-laws as allowed by that Act or either of their special Acts of 1875 and 1892; and that sec. 60 of the Leith Harbour Act of 1892 entitling the Commissioners to make "reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and use of plant," &c., applied only to special facilities (the use of cranes, &c.), asked for and received after the vessel had got access to the harbour and docks.

ON 8th September 1905 the Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith, incorporated by the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. cap. clx.), sec. 6 (in this report referred to as "the Commissioners"), by minute of that date, passed a resolution in the following terms:—" (1) Locking in and out of vessels * should be allowed in the Albert and Imperial Docks; (2) locking should be limited to two hours after high-water; (3) no locking should be allowed when the water on the Imperial Dock sill is less than 21 ft. 6 in.; (4) no vessel should be locked unless arrangements have been timeously made with the dock-master, according to regulations to be issued by the superintendent; (5) the dock-master should have power to decline to lock in or out any vessel without giving reasons; (6) a charge of £2 for each locking should be made against each vessel arranging to be locked in or out, £1 to be returned in the event of a ship arranging to be locked in or out and not taking advantage of the arrangement." This resolution was subsequently modified by minute of the Commissioners, dated 13th July 1906, by which the charge for locking vessels in and out of the Imperial and Albert Somerville v.

Leith Docks
Commissioners.

In November 1906 Robert Somerville, shipowner, Dalkeith, and others, the owners of a fleet of steamships trading regularly between Leith and other ports, brought an action against the Commissioners in which they concluded, inter alia, for declarator "that the pursuers, upon payment of the rates made payable by section 58 of . . . the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892, and by Schedule (B) to the said Act, are entitled to have access to and egress from the harbour and docks of Leith given to all ships, vessels, barks, boats, or lighters belonging to them or any of them, free of any rate or charge other than the rates made payable by section 58 and Schedule (B) of the said Act, and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety either by means of the locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and when accommodation is available"; and for declarator "that the defenders have no legal right or title to . . . exact from the pursuers or any of them or their managers or agents any dues or charges other than the rates made payable as aforesaid for any ships, vessels, barks, boats, or lighters belonging to the pursuers or any of them obtaining access to or egress from the said harbour and docks by means of the locks through which the said docks or any of them are approached."*

* The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. cap. 27), incorporated, as regards the sections quoted infra, with the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1875, and with the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892, by these Acts respectively enacts:—

Sec. 2. "The expression 'the special Act' used in this Act shall be construed to mean any Act which shall be hereafter passed authorising the construction or improving of a harbour, dock, or pier, and with which this Act shall be incorporated; . . . the expression 'the harbour, dock, or pier' shall mean the harbour, dock, or pier, and the works connected therewith, by the special Act authorised to be constructed."

Sec. 3. "The word 'rate' shall mean any rate or duty or other payment in the nature thereof payable under the special Act."

Sec. 33. "Upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods and the embarking and landing of passengers."

Sec. 51. "The undertakers may appoint such harbour-masters as they think necessary (including in such expression dock-masters and pier-masters, as hereinbefore defined), and from time to time, as often as they think fit, may remove any such harbour-master."

Sec. 52. "The harbour-master may give directions for all or any of the following purposes; (that is to say),

For regulating the time at which and the manner in which any vessel shall enter into, go out of, or lie in or at the harbour, dock, or pier, and within the prescribed limits, if any, and its position, mooring, or unmooring, placing and removing, whilst therein."

Sec. 4. " . . . The expression 'Harbour and Docks' means and includes the Port and Harbour of Leith, and the harbours, docks, quays, piers, and whole other works and property included in the undertaking defined and vested in the Commissioners by this Act, and all future additions thereto and extensions thereof."

This definition is incorporated by reference with the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892, by sec. 4 of that Act.

The Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxxvii.), enacts:—

Sec. 58. On 21st June 1907 the Lord Ordinary, after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, viz., that the pursuers, upon payment of the rates made payable by section 58 of an Act of Parliament entitled the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. cap. clxxvii.), and by Schedule (B) to the said Act, are entitled to have access to and egress from the harbour and docks of Leith given to all ships, vessels, barks, or lighters belonging to them or any of them, free of any rate or charge other than the rates made payable by section 58 and Schedule (B) of the said Act, and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety, either by means of the locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and when accommodation is available."*

* "OPINION.—The pursuers are owners of a fleet of steamships trading regularly between Leith and ports in England and on the Continent. The defenders are the Commissioners for the Harbour and Docks of Leith incorporated by the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict. c. clx.). The main (if not the only) question is whether or not the pursuers, upon payment of the rates made payable by section 58 of the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. clxxvii.), and Schedule (B) to said Act, are entitled to have access to and egress from the harbour and docks of Leith given to their ships and other craft, free of any other rate or charge, 'and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety either by means of the locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and when accommodation is available.' This question is one of importance to the parties, but I have not found it to be attended with serious doubt or difficulty. It relates, as explained in the condescendence, really to the three docks known as the Albert, the Edinburgh, and the Imperial respectively, which are, like most modern docks, approached through locks. These three docks are the largest in Leith Harbour, and are suitable for, and used by, the pursuers' vessels. It may be convenient at the outset to explain the general nature and character of the various docks at Leith, all of which are shewn on the small hand-map with which I was furnished at the discussion. The old docks (East and West) were opened about 1806. They were constructed under the autho-

The defenders reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 31st January and 5th and 6th February 1908. Mar. 17, 1908.

The arguments of parties sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.¹ Somerville v
Leith Docks
Commissioners.

At advising on 17th March 1908,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The harbour and docks of Leith are under the administration of a body of statutory commissioners, whose powers and duties are regulated by two local Acts (of 1875 and 1892), with which is incorporated a public Act—the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act of 1847. By the latter Act, section 33, it is provided that “upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other ity of an old Act, and were, as the map indicates, approached by a lock; but I am informed that, as matter of fact, this lock has not been used for a long period—more than forty years. The Victoria Dock was constructed about 1852, without the authority of any special Act of Parliament. It has a gate, but no lock. The Albert Dock was opened in 1869, without the authority of any special Act. It is approached by a lock, and is now connected by waterway with the Imperial and also with the Edinburgh Docks. The Edinburgh Dock was opened in 1881, and was among the works authorised by the said Act of 1875. It lies to the east of, and is approached from, the Albert Dock, through an open passage spanned by a swing bridge. The Imperial Dock was authorised by the said Act of 1892, and was opened in 1902. Its entrance lock is mentioned in section 22 (2) and (3) of the Act.

“The question now in dispute was sharply raised when the defenders passed, on 8th September 1905, a resolution—varied later by a resolution dated 13th July 1906—by which the defenders, for the first time, imposed a pecuniary charge for the locking in or out of vessels going to or from the three docks with which this case is concerned.

“The substantive case stated for the pursuers is based upon the following statutory enactments. By section 33 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 Vict. cap. 27), it is provided that ‘upon payment of the rates made payable by this and the special Act, and subject to the other provisions thereof, the harbour, dock, and pier shall be open to all persons for the shipping and unshipping of goods and the embarking and landing of passengers.’ By section 2 of the same Act ‘the expression “the harbour, dock, or pier” shall mean the harbour, dock, or pier, and the works connected therewith, by the special Act authorised to be constructed’; and section 3 provides that ‘the word “rate” shall mean any rate or duty or other payment in the nature thereof payable under the special Act.’ Section 4 of the special Act of 1875 (repeated by section 4 of the special Act of 1892) enacts that ‘the expression “harbour and docks” means and includes the port and harbour of Leith, and the harbours, docks, quays, piers, and whole other works and property included in the undertaking defined and vested in the Commissioners by this Act, and all future additions thereto and extensions thereof.’ Section 58 of the said Act of 1892 authorises the Commissioners to levy and collect, inter alia, ‘from the owners of every ship, vessel, bark, boat, or lighter coming into or going out of the harbour and docks or precincts of the port aforesaid, or the agents

The rates here referred to, so far as applicable to rates on vessels, are those specified in section 58 of the special Act of 1892, and Schedule B appended thereto. It is proper to add that by section 59 of the same special Act the Commissioners have power from time to time to vary the rates thereby authorised to be levied by reducing or raising the same to such an extent as they may deem expedient or necessary, under a certain restriction as to the amount of such increase, and with a proviso that such rates shall at all times be charged equally to all persons in respect of vessels of the same class or description, and also that before any increase on the rates shall take effect, at least twenty-one days' previous notice thereof shall or managers of such owners, the rates on vessels specified in Schedule (B) to this Act. . . .

"Upon a construction of these sections, the pursuers argue that their vessels are entitled, upon payment of the rates prescribed by section 58 and Schedule (B) of the special Act of 1892, to free access to and egress from the whole harbour, docks, and piers of Leith, including those parts of the same which are accessible only by locks, at all times when such access or egress can be accomplished with safety, and when accommodation is available. As to these last conditions, they concede that the discretion must lie with the defenders' harbour-master, so long as he exercises it fairly and in bona fide. I should here explain that the parties agreed in stating that, for two or three hours before high water at each tide, the gates of the locks lie open, and that for some hours thereafter (as to the number of these the parties were not in agreement) the operation of locking a vessel in or out can be carried on with perfect safety; but the defenders say that, if the pursuers' contention is given effect to, they 'will be obliged to keep a large staff of experienced men on duty day and night for the purpose of working the lock gates, and will thus be involved in heavy additional expense.' The matter is thus one of expenditure, pure and simple. I am of opinion that the pursuers' argument is well founded. I think that the statutory provisions to which I have referred give shipowners and others an absolute right, upon payment of the rates prescribed, to demand access to or egress from all parts of the harbour or docks, to or from which such access or egress can be afforded with safety, and due regard to accommodation. A contrary hypothesis might, I think, result in anomalies. In the case, for example, of a harbour to which access can only be obtained by the opening of gates, it would seem that vessels could not demand right to enter the harbour at all, except on payment of some extra charge over and above the rate. But the defenders argued, in the first place, that the pursuers' construction of the Acts would violate the obligation which is admittedly incumbent upon harbour commissioners to treat all classes of shipping upon equal terms. They explained, and it was not disputed, that many vessels—even of the larger classes—coming to Leith do not in fact go into docks at all, but take up their berths in the harbour outside the docks; that others are in use to resort to the Victoria Dock, or to the Old Docks; that others, again, are content to obtain entrance to or exit from the three docks in question at the times above referred to, when the lock gates are lying open; and that some of the vessels which frequent the port of Leith are, owing to their great length, unable to enter these locks at all. The defenders put their case so high as to say that they would not be legally entitled, looking to their duty of equal treatment, to afford to the pursuers' ships the privilege of entry to and exit from the docks in question at times when it was necessary for that purpose to work the lock gates, without some special charge being made over and above the prescribed be given in at least one newspaper published in Edinburgh or Leith. It is Mar. 17, 1908. further proper to add that by section 60 of the same special Act power is given to the Commissioners "to make all reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and use of plant, machinery, or appliances provided by them for the dispatch of business at the harbour and docks, or the convenience of shipmasters, merchants, and others concerned with the traffic thereat, in so far as such charges are not expressly provided for by this Act."

Somerville v.
Leith Docks
Commissioners.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

The pursuers are owners of a fleet of steamships trading regularly between Leith and ports in England and on the Continent. They complain of a certain resolution passed by the Commissioners on 8th September 1905 by which, for the first time, as regards the three newest and largest docks in

'rates.' In my judgment, this argument is fallacious. It is no doubt true that at all ports there are different classes of shipping, with different habits, capacities, and requirements. But if the pursuers' view of this matter is right, as I think it is, all vessels (including those belonging to them) which desired, and were physically able, to enter these docks, would require to be equally dealt with; and it is, I think, nothing to the purpose to say that there are other ships at Leith which either cannot or do not desire to enter the docks at all times when it would be possible to do so with safety, and having regard to accommodation. Then, the defenders relied strongly upon section 76 of the Act of 1875, which is practically repeated by section 60 of the Act 1892. These sections authorise the defenders to 'make all reasonable charges for work done, services rendered, facilities afforded, and use of plant, machinery, or appliances provided by them . . . in so far as such charges are not expressly provided for by this Act.' But, if the pursuers' view as to the policy of the Acts, and the construction of the sections previously dealt with, is correct, as I think it is, getting in or out of these docks, at all times when the gates can with safety and propriety be opened, does not appear to me to be a matter of 'work done,' or 'services rendered,' or 'facilities afforded,' or 'of use of plant, machinery, or appliances provided.' It is matter of right upon payment of the 'rates.' These sections seem to me to have reference not to anything done in the exercise of that right, but to special facilities which may be asked and received after the vessel has obtained due access to the harbour and docks. This view is, in my judgment, confirmed by the total absence in the Acts (with the exception of section 22 (2) and (3) (description of works) of the Act of 1892) of any reference to locks and of any express right on the Commissioners' part to charge for locking vessels in or out. Such operations must, I think, be regarded as mere incidents in that free access to the harbour and docks which is to be had by vessels upon payment of the rates. The defenders also referred to sections 51 and 52 of the General Act of 1847. But I can find nothing there to authorise the Commissioners or their harbour-master to impose an extra charge for locking operations, as they bear to do by their 'resolutions,' quoted upon the record. The defenders have power to pass bye-laws for various purposes, and under certain conditions—section 83 of the General Act of 1847, and section 71 of the special Act of 1875—but, for obvious reasons, they shrank from saying that the desired result could be achieved in that manner; and I do not think that it could.

"Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the pursuers' argument is substantially right, and that they are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of their first crave of the summons. Their counsel stated that, if I should be of that view, they would not press for the further declarator sought."

 LdStormonth-Darling. Leith, a change was attempted to be made in the practice of the Commissioners with respect to the admission of vessels to and from these docks, by limiting the locking in and out of vessels to two hours after high-water, by imposing a charge of £2 (afterwards reduced to £1) against each vessel arranging to be locked in or out, and by making other less important changes. These resolutions are said to have been passed without notice in any newspaper, without being posted up as a rate in some conspicuous part of the harbour, and without having been embodied in any bye-law. On the whole matter, it is pleaded that the Commissioners being bound, on a just construction of the statutes, to afford the pursuers' vessels access to and egress from the whole harbour and docks on payment of the statutory rates, are not entitled to make these new and unauthorised charges, and that the resolutions proposing to allow them are illegal and ultra vires. The Lord Ordinary has sustained this view, and I think he is right. In pronouncing decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, his Lordship has adopted the final words of that conclusion, "and that at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety, either by means of the said locks in the said harbour or otherwise, and when accommodation is available." That is a qualification in favour of the defenders, but they say there ought to be a further qualification in order to save the right of the harbour-master to give all lawful directions, and also the right of the defenders themselves to make bye-laws. It may be said that these rights are sufficiently secured by statute (particularly secs. 52 and 83 of the public Act of 1847). But Mr Clyde for the pursuers did not object to these rights being expressly reserved, and I think that our decree should contain some such additional words as these,—"And without prejudice to the right of the harbour-master to give directions for all or any of the purposes set out in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and also without prejudice to the right of the defenders to make bye-laws as allowed by the same Act or by either of the special Acts."

The defenders do not attempt to explain why the statutes give no express right to charge for locking vessels in or out, nor why it was not till 1905 that they themselves attempted to impose such a charge. They say a good deal about the additional expenditure which they will have to incur if the pursuers' contention is given effect to, in wear and tear of dock gates, and in keeping a large staff of experienced men to work those gates. But they say nothing to displace the pursuers' argument upon the statutes—an argument which, I think, Mr Macmillan put very tersely when he maintained that once the pursuers had paid their rates under section 58, they were enfranchised of the whole harbour. At least the only counter argument which the defenders urge upon the statutes is to refer to section 60 of the special Act of 1892, which I have already recited. Now, the Lord Ordinary's contention on section 60, with which I entirely agree, is that it deals only with charges for special facilities which may be asked for and received after the vessel has obtained due access to the harbour and docks and for which (I may add) no charges are expressly provided by the Act. One has only to look at the schedules appended to the Act of 1892 to see how many different kinds of special facilities are afforded in these docks, for all of which there are special rates. I need only mention graving dock, cranes, rails, steelyards, and sheds for different kinds of goods. For all of these it is quite right that special rates should be provided, because only special ships require to make use of them. In like manner, according to the progress of mechanical invention, new kinds of appliances may come into use, for which it may be reasonable that the Commissioners should make a special charge, as, for instance, if they make a new installation of electric lighting in a particular part of the docks, and allow its use for the convenience of merchants concerned with the traffic thereat. That is the kind of charge which section 60 contemplates, and not the use of a lock, which is truly part of the dock accommodation, and is intended for "all persons" who may frequent the docks on payment of the scheduled rates.

Somerville v.
Leith Docks
Commissioners,
LdStormonth-
Darling.

If the Lord Ordinary is right as to the first declaratory conclusion, it was not contended that the rest of the interlocutor could be successfully challenged, and I am therefore for adhering (with the addition which I have suggested), with expenses.

LORD ARDWALL—I agree with the opinion which has been delivered by Lord Stormonth-Darling. There is certainly an appearance of equity in the defenders' resolution of 8th September 1905, because undoubtedly the entrance or egress of vessels to and from the docks by means of the locks after the lock gates have been closed for the time imposes work upon the defenders' servants beyond that which is necessary when the locks are open for three hours before each high tide, when of course vessels pass in and out without causing any more trouble than is involved in the regular opening of the dock gates previous to high tide once every twelve hours or thereby. But this fact does not necessarily entitle the defenders to make an extra charge in respect of the passage of vessels in or out of the docks by means of the locks after the level of the water in the outer harbour has fallen below the level of the water in the docks. They must shew that the pursuers are obtaining some privilege over and above the rights conferred on them by statute in return for payment of harbour dues, or otherwise they must shew that there is a special provision in the Harbour Acts entitling them to make the extra charge of £1 per vessel.

In considering this case it must be observed that the locks and gates are part of the harbour works specially authorised to be made in virtue of the powers contained in the Acts empowering their construction just as much as are the docks themselves, and the water lying between the two gates of the locks is as much part of the harbour as the water in the outer harbour or the water in the docks. This being so, I think it follows that all vessels are entitled to the use of the locks and the water therein on payment of the statutory harbour dues entitling them to the use of the harbour in terms of section 33 of the Harbours Act of 1847.

The defenders obtained powers to make these docks and locks presumably with the view to making the harbour of Leith more available for commerce and more attractive to shipping, and, inter alia, to shipping consisting of steamers sailing as regular liners at stated periods to and from Continental ports, and I think it is contrary to the policy of the Harbour Acts as well as to sound considerations of public policy that the advantage afforded to

Mar. 17, 1908. steamers of a certain size of being able to get in and out of the docks at any suitable state of the tide should form the subject of a special impost. I am of opinion that it must be held that such extra labour as may be necessary for working the dock gates is labour necessary to render available the ordinary harbour waterways, and therefore should not form the basis of a claim for an extra charge on vessels taking advantage of the convenience afforded by the locks.

Somerville v.
Leith Docks
Commissioners.

Lord Ardwall.

Defenders' counsel, however, founded strongly upon section 76 of the Leith Harbour and Docks Act, 1875, and section 60 of the subsequent Act of 1892, which are in similar terms, and which authorise certain charges to be made. In my opinion these sections do not apply to a charge such as the present, but to charges for work done, services rendered, and facilities afforded, and the use of plant, after a vessel has got to her berth in the harbour, and do not apply to the use of the harbour itself or any of the waterways forming part thereof. I accordingly think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded, but I agree with the opinion that both the conclusion of the summons and the portion of the interlocutor are too wide when they declare that the pursuers are entitled to have access and egress "at all times when access to and egress from the said harbour and docks can be given with safety, either by means of locks in the said harbour or otherwise."

Nothing is said in this case as to the engineering questions involved in the use of the locks for the passage of vessels when the level of the water in the outer harbour has fallen to a certain number of feet below the level of the water in the respective docks, or whether the locks may be safely used at all states of the tide, provided there is water sufficient in the outer harbour for the passage of vessels, and so on. These matters are not before us, and in fact it was not until the debate had proceeded a considerable length that the Court were given to understand that there was really any question at issue except the right of the defenders to make the extra charge of £1 for the right of passage through the locks when they were not open at any rate. I accordingly concur with Lord Stormonth-Darling that there should be a qualification inserted in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in case of possible difficulties in the working of the locks at all times of the day and night.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the judgment of Lord Stormonth-Darling.

LORD LOW was absent at the hearing.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the reclaiming note: Adhere to the . . . interlocutor reclaimed against, with the following addition thereto, viz., 'but without prejudice to the right of the harbour-master to give directions for all or any of the purposes set out in the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, and also without prejudice to the right of the defenders to make bye-laws as allowed by the same Act or by either of the special Acts'; and with the foregoing variations affirm the said interlocutor reclaimed against, and decern."

Charitable and Educational Bequests and Trusts—Constitution—Uncertainty—"Foreign Missions"—Executor.—A Scottish testator, by his holograph general settlement, provided,—“The residue of my property I give and bequeath for the benefit of foreign missions in India, China, Africa, and South America, or any other in the foreign field suitable. I appoint the Rev. W. Watson, Kiltarn, as my executor, at a remuneration of £20 sterling.”

Held that the bequest was a bequest for charitable purposes, and was not void from uncertainty, the bequest being to a definite class, coupled with the appointment of a person (the executor) having power to select the objects falling within the class on whom the benefit of the bequest was to be conferred.

Dundas v. Dundas, Jan. 27, 1837, 15 S. 427, followed.

THE pursuer and real raiser in this action of multiplepointing was the executor-nominate of Donald Allan, M.D., Evanton, Ross-shire, who died on 24th August 1906, leaving a holograph will in the following terms:—“I, Donald Allan, M.D., Evanton, in the county of Ross and Cromarty, make the following disposition of my property, moveable and heritable:—I hereby give, devise, and bequeath [certain legacies]. The residue of my property I give and bequeath for the benefit of foreign missions in India, China, Africa, and South America, or any other in the foreign field suitable. I appoint the Rev. W. Watson, Kiltarn, as my executor, at a remuneration of Twenty pounds stg.”

1st Division.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The fund in medio was the residue of Dr Allan's estate.

The claimants were (1) Robert Allan and others, the whole next of kin of the testator and the whole parties interested in his intestate succession, both heritable and moveable; (2) the Very Rev. John M'Murtrie, D.D., and others, being the Foreign Missions Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and (3) the Rev. Alexander Miller, D.D., and others, being the Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland.

No claim was lodged by the executor.

The claimants Robert Allan and others claimed the whole fund in medio, and pleaded;—(1) The bequest of the residue of the deceased's estate contained in his said holograph will being void from uncertainty, the said residue has fallen into intestacy. (2) The claimants, being the parties entitled to succeed to the deceased's estate ab intestato, are entitled to be ranked and preferred on the fund in medio in terms of their claim. (3) The Foreign Missions of the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church of Scotland being, neither of them, sufficiently identified as the missions to which the deceased intended to bequeath the residue of his estate, the claims stated on behalf of these missions should be repelled.

The claimants the Foreign Missions Committee of the Church of Scotland averred that they were the foreign missions designated by

Mar. 17, 1908. the testator, and stated the grounds upon which their contention was based.*

Allan's
Executor v.
Allan.

They claimed (1) to be ranked and preferred to the whole of the residue absolutely, or otherwise, to the whole of the residue, subject to such directions with regard to distribution among the claimants' foreign missions as may be directed by the pursuer and real raiser. (2) Alternatively, to be ranked and preferred along with the claimants the Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland to the whole of the residue in equal portions absolutely, or otherwise, to the whole of the residue in equal portions, subject to such directions with regard to the distribution of the said equal portions among the claimants' foreign missions and those of the United Free Church of Scotland as may be directed by the pursuer and real raiser.

They pleaded;—(1) The claimants' missions being those designated by the testator as his residuary legatees, are entitled to be ranked and preferred absolutely in terms of the first alternative of the first claim, or otherwise, to be ranked and preferred in terms of the second alternative of their first claim, subject to such directions as the pursuer and real raiser may give with regard to the appropriation thereof among the particular missions of the claimants' Church. (2) Alternatively, the foreign missions of these claimants' Church, and those of the claimants the Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland, being those designated by the testator as his residuary legatees, are entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole residue in equal portions absolutely, or otherwise, to the whole of the residue in equal portions, subject to such directions with regard to the distribution of the said equal portions among the claimants' foreign missions and those of the United Free Church of Scotland, as may be directed by the pursuer and real raiser.

The claimants the Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland averred that they were the foreign missions designated by the testator, and stated the grounds upon which their contention was based.*

The claim and the pleas for these claimants were in the same terms as those stated for the Foreign Missions Committee of the Church of Scotland.

On 21st November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) allowed a proof before answer.†

* The nature of these averments is stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

† "OPINION.—This is a multiplepinding with reference to the residue of the estate of the late Dr Allan, Evanton, Ross-shire, who died on 24th August 1906.

" . . . The next of kin maintain that this bequest of residue is void from uncertainty, and that they are accordingly entitled to succeed as heirs ab intestato.

"Claims have been lodged by the office-bearers of the Foreign Missions Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and also by the joint secretaries of, and as such representing, the Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church of Scotland, and the joint general treasurers of the United Free Church of Scotland, who, as such, are joint treasurers of the Foreign Missions Committee. These two sets of claimants originally claimed that each was entitled to the whole of the residue, but these claims are not insisted in, and they now make common cause against

Mar. 17, 1908.

The case was argued before the First Division on 21st January 1908.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The Lord Ordinary's judgment could not be supported on the ground stated by him. This was not a case of a bequest to a definite person insufficiently designated. The terms of the bequest were so vague that no proof was competent to shew whom the testator meant to benefit. Nor could the respondents take advantage of the rule stated in Crichton v. Grierson,¹ approved in Blair v. Duncan,² and applied in Dundas v. Dundas,³ the rule, namely, that a bequest was valid if made in favour of a definite class, with power to a person named to select the objects within that class. Both of these essentials were lacking, for there was neither a definite class nor a person with power to select.⁴ The disjunctive clause "or any other" would include missions of any kind existing or not existing at the testator's death. This was not a charitable bequest, the next of kin. Their claims are alternative—(First) each claims to be ranked and preferred along with the other to the whole of the residue in equal portions absolutely; or otherwise, they claim to be ranked and preferred to the whole of the residue in equal portions, subject to such directions with regard to the distribution of the said equal portions among the foreign missions as may be directed by the pursuer and real raiser, the executor. No claim is lodged by the executor.

"The first alternative is based upon the argument that, on a sound construction of the settlement, the bequest of residue was not for the benefit of the purposes of foreign missions, but was for the benefit of certain definite foreign mission schemes; that is to say, the Churches put their claim upon the ground that this is a bequest to definite legatees insufficiently designed, and that, under the authorities, they are entitled to prove who the testator intended to benefit—Scottish Missionary Society, 20 D. 634; Wilson's Executors, 8 Macph. 233. It is averred that the testator was born in the parish of Kiltearn, and practised medicine in Bonar Bridge for about twenty years; that he then, about 1886 or 1887, left Bonar Bridge and settled at Evanton, where he lived until his death, and practised to a limited extent. He was thus a domiciled Scotsman, and had been a member of the Church of Scotland all his life. In the claim for the Foreign Missions Committee of the Church of Scotland it is averred—'At the date of his death the testator was in full communion with the Church of Scotland, having for the last six years prior to his death attended his brother-in-law's church in the parish of Kiltearn. During that period he gave general contributions to the parish church at Kiltearn, and through that church, to the schemes of the Church of Scotland, including the foreign mission scheme of that Church. Prior to December 1900 the testator had been a member of the old Free Church of Scotland, but, upon the union of that church with the United Presbyterian Church, he attended and became a member of the Church of Scotland, and continued to be so until his death.'

"The Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church aver:—'He regularly contributed to the foreign missions of the Free Church of Scotland, at Bonar Bridge, and thereafter in Kiltearn, the parish in which Evanton is situated, up to the date of the union of the Free Church and United Presbyterian Church in 1900. After that date, as there was no United Free Church in his district, the testator, in December 1900, became a member of the Church of Scotland at Kiltearn, of which his brother-in-law, the pursuer, was and is minister. The foreign missions formerly carried Argued for the respondents the Foreign Missions Committees of the Church of Scotland and of the United Free Church of Scotland;—There was a definite legatee to whom the bequest had been left. The only difficulty arose from the insufficiency of the designations, and the exact identity of the legatee was a proper matter to be remitted to proof.³ In any event, the bequest fell to be sustained as being a bequest to a definite class combined with a power of selection in a person named by the testator. "Foreign missions" had a definite meaning, which would give validity to the will, and the Court would accordingly assume that that was the meaning intended by the on by the Free Church of Scotland are now, and have been since the union of that Church with the United Presbyterian Church, carried on in their entirety by the United Free Church of Scotland.' Each of these claimants avers that the foreign missions of the claimant's Church are those designated by the testator as entitled to his residue, or, alternatively, that the residue falls to be equally divided between them. It is also averred that the Church of Scotland and 'the United Free Church of Scotland are the only two Churches in Scotland who have foreign missions of an organised character. They both have extensive missions in India, China, and Africa, as well as in other places.' These averments appear to me to be sufficient to entitle the claimants to a proof.

"The alternative contention for the Churches is founded upon a proposition well settled in law, and which is thus stated by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst) in Crichton v. Grierson, 3 W. & S. 329—'According to the authorities in the law of Scotland it is quite clear that a man may, in the disposition of his property, select particular classes of individuals and objects, and then give to some particular individual a power after his death of appropriating the property or applying any part of his property to any particular individuals among that class whom that person may select'—Blair v. Duncan, 4 F. (H. L.) 5.

"If, however, the testator did not intend to bequeath his residue to certain foreign mission schemes—if he intended to bequeath it for the benefit of foreign mission purposes generally—I am unable to hold, in view of the decided cases, that this was a sufficient selection of particular classes of individuals and objects. Assuming that the term foreign missions occurring in a will such as this is necessarily confined to religious missions and excludes all others, e.g., medical missions, the case seems to me to fall directly under the case of Macintyre v. Grimond's Trustees, 6 F. 285, 7 F. (H. L.) 90, for the reasons given by Lord Moncreiff in the Court of Session, which were expressly approved by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords. I am of opinion that Dr Allan's bequest, if it is so interpreted, is not sufficiently specific to be supported. A bequest for religious purposes is not, in Scotland, construed as meaning a bequest for charitable purposes.

"Even if it could be held that the testator had selected particular classes testator.¹ The clause "or any other," extended the field, but did not render the class of objects more vague. There was an appointment of an executor to whom the testator had delegated the duty of selecting the objects, and this distinguished the case from those in which no such appointment had been made and where the bequest had been held void.² This was a holograph will, not prepared by a lawyer, and in such a case the Court were willing to overlook the absence of legal form in order to ascertain and give effect to the wishes of the testator.³ Further, this was, in effect if not in name, a charitable bequest, and as such entitled to favourable consideration. Provided the general intention were clearly indicated, the Court would always give effect to such a bequest, if necessary, by preparing and approving of a scheme.⁴

LORD KINNEAR.—The question in this case is whether a certain bequest is void by reason of uncertainty. The will is a very simple one, and whatever doubt may arise as to the efficacy of the bequest in dispute its mere interpretation, in my opinion, does not present any serious difficulty.

The testator leaves certain legacies of no great amount to relations, and a legacy of £10 to a servant, and then he proceeds,—“The residue of my property I give and bequeath for the benefit of foreign missions in India, China, Africa, and South America, or any other in the foreign field suitable. I appoint the Rev. W. Watson, Kiltarn, as my executor, at a remuneration of £20 stg.” It appears to me that there can be no uncertainty as to the meaning of these words. I cannot think it doubtful that “foreign of individuals and objects, he has failed to give to some particular individual power after his death of appropriating the residue. It is to be observed that there is here no trust. The bequest of residue is a direct bequest. The testator's brother-in-law is appointed as his executor. It is said that under the Executors (Scotland) Act, 1900, section 2, the term executor is equivalent to trustee. In my opinion, this does not affect the point of importance, which is that no discretionary power of selection is given to anyone under the will, nor do I think that such a power can be implied—Low's Executors, 11 Macph. 744. As is pointed out by Lord M'Laren in Robbie's Judicial Factor, 20 R. 363, the appointment of hæres fiduciarius with a power of selection is essential to the existence of such a bequest, because, in the absence of such a grant of power of selection, the legacy would fail from uncertainty.

“If the claimants represent the foreign missions which the testator intended to benefit, they do not need to be selected by the executor in the exercise of any discretionary power. (On the mere question of relevancy, I do not find it stated on record that he has selected them.) If the claimants require to be selected by the executor before becoming entitled to anything under the residue clause, then they are obliged to found upon a bequest which, as I have already said, is not sufficiently definite. The duty which would, according to the claimants' argument, be placed upon the executor would be the definition of a class, not the selection from a class defined.”

Mar. 17, 1908. missions" in the mouth of a Scottish testator means an enterprise conducted by some Church or association in this country for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts. The bequest therefore, is, in my opinion, very clearly a bequest for the benefit of foreign missions. But then the testator does not define the particular missions which are to be benefited, nor the particular Church or association by which these missions are to be conducted. It is a bequest in favour of foreign missions in general; and so considering it, I should agree with the observation of the Lord Ordinary that it is not sufficiently specific to be supported unless the testator has given a power to a trustee acting for him to select among the class of foreign missions those to which the bequest is to go. But then immediately following the bequest to the foreign missions there is the appointment of the Rev. Mr Watson to be the testator's executor. This is a will in ordinary language, written by a layman, and in ascertaining what he means by appointing an executor I do not think that we are concerned at all with any technical difficulties arising from the distinction, if there be such in the present state of the law, between the office of a trustee and the office of an executor strictly so called. What the testator means is to appoint somebody who is to carry out the purposes of his will, and as mere matter of construction it appears to me that when he says, "I give certain legacies to certain people, and give the residue for foreign missions, and appoint Mr Watson to be my executor," he means that Mr Watson is to execute all the provisions of the will, not only by paying the legacies to the persons named, but also by carrying out what is really in point of money the largest interest in the will, and so giving effect to the provision for the benefit of foreign missions.

As matter of construction that appears to me to follow, because I cannot imagine that the testator intended to appoint an executor to carry out the provisions of his will, and to exclude from the provisions which are so to be executed any one of those which the will contains. He is to carry into execution the will and every part of it, and that imports, in my opinion, a power to the executor to do whatever is requisite in order to carry out these provisions. I put this as mere matter of construction, but I add that since the passing of the Executors Act of 1900,¹ the argument founded upon the difference between trustee and executor is no longer maintainable, because under that Act an executor has all the powers of a trustee.

The point, however, appears to me to be directly decided in the case of Dundas v. Dundas,² which I think is entirely in point. In that case, after leaving certain legacies, the testatrix provided as follows:—"Any money left after paying all expenses I wish may be laid out on charities. I leave and bequeath to my nephew, John Dundas, the sum of £200 sterling, with power to see this will executed." It was held that the bequest, when combined with the appointment of the defender as executor, imported a discretionary power on his part to select the charities upon which the benefit was to be conferred. Lord Fullerton (Ordinary) says—"In sound construction this must be held to import a discretionary power in the executor to make that selection of charities without which her will in regard to the immediately preceding legacy could not be carried into effect." Then he adds—"This construction, of course, brings the case within the rule established in the case of Crichton v. Grierson.¹" Following that decision it appears to me that the question we have to determine is whether the bequest to foreign missions, with an appointment of executor, which implies the power to carry out all the directions of the will, does or does not fall within the rule which the Lord Ordinary cites in Crichton v. Grierson,¹ where the Lord Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst) says—as quoted in *Blair v. Duncan*²—"According to the authorities in the law of Scotland it is quite clear that a man may in the disposition of his property select particular classes of individuals and objects, and then give to some particular individual a power after his death of appropriating the property or applying any part of his property to any particular individuals among that class whom that person may select." The Lord Ordinary observes that, giving effect to that rule, the bequest in question is not sufficiently specific to be supported, and adds—"A bequest for religious purposes is not in Scotland construed as meaning a bequest for charitable purposes." There can be no doubt that these two words have different significations, but they are not mutually exclusive. A bequest for religious purposes may very well be a bequest for charitable purposes, and if there were any question as to the meaning of the words it appears to me that that is not a question which requires to be considered in this case. It is not necessary that we should define either the one or the other of these expressions exactly. If it were necessary, I myself think that since the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Pemsel,³ I should not be able to admit that the meaning of the word "charity" has been in this country so narrowed by popular usage as the learned Judges who decided the case of *Baird's Trustees v. The Lord Advocate*⁴ held that it was. But then, as I have said, I do not think that is a question we need to determine. It may very well be that a bequest for religious purposes in general could not be sustained as sufficiently specific even although a bequest for charitable purposes could be made effectual. But it does not follow that a will for a special purpose is the less capable of being sustained because that special purpose falls within the general description of religious purposes. The rule for the application of the doctrine laid down in *Crichton v. Grierson*¹ appears to me to be found in a comparison of the recent decisions of the House of Lords—the cases of Blair v. Duncan,⁵ Macintyre v. Grimond's Trustees,⁶ and Murdoch v. Weir.⁷ In the first of these cases the rule is stated with great precision by Lord Robertson, who says—"What has been established as regards the intervention of a trustee is thus stated by Lord Lyndhurst in Crichton v. Grierson,¹ and the passage touches the very core of the present case." His Lordship then goes on to cite the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary, and adds—"This is the rule which is to be applied in the present case, and the question is, Has this testatrix done what Lord Lyndhurst describes—

Mar. 17, 1908. has she selected a particular class or particular classes of objects among which her trustee is to select?" Applying that test to the will before them
 Allan's Executor v. Allan. in which a bequest had been made for charitable or public purposes, Lord Robertson was of opinion, and the House was of the same opinion, that in making this bequest "this testatrix has done nothing like selecting a particular class or particular classes of objects. She excludes individuals, and then leaves the trustee at large, with the whole world to choose from. There is nothing affecting any community on the globe which is outside the ambit of his choice." Therefore, in the application of the rule to that case, the bequest was held to be too wide, because there was nothing approaching the particularisation of the class to be benefited.

A similar decision was given in the later case of Macintyre v. Grimond's Trustees.¹ The question concerned a bequest for religious purposes, which was also held to be too wide as embracing a great variety of possible objects without particularisation of the class. On the other hand, in the last case of all, in Murdoch's Trustees v. Weir and Others,² the House of Lords came to a different decision, and the bequest was sustained, the Lord Chancellor putting the rule in this way,—he says with respect to the criticisms which are applied to charitable bequests,—“All that can be required is that the description of the class to be benefited shall be sufficiently certain to enable men of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator.” That is, therefore, the rule which is held to be established by *Orichton v. Grierson*³ and the subsequent cases, and the question to be put in each particular case is whether the description of the class to be benefited is sufficiently exact to enable an executor of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator. I cannot entertain any doubt that an executor of reasonable common sense and reasonable knowledge of such affairs as the will deals with will have no difficulty in determining whether any particular purpose is or is not a purpose falling within the class to be benefited by the bequest to foreign missions.

It is said that in order to have the benefit of the general rule the bequest must be what has been described as a charitable bequest. I do not think that is the true deduction from the leading decision of Orichton v. Grierson,³ because the Lord Chancellor in examining the whole series of the decisions cites a great number of cases which have no relation to charity at all. But if there be any particular favour which the law requires Courts to shew in construing charitable bequests, then I am of opinion that this particular bequest now in question falls within that class. I think that is the necessary conclusion from the judgment of Lord Watson in the case of Pemsel,⁴ where his Lordship, after narrating the considerable number of legislative provisions, goes on to say, “that Scotch trusts which are ejusdem generis with trusts falling within the statute of Elizabeth (in England) are charitable in this sense that they are all governed by the same rules which are applicable to charitable trusts in England.” That a trust for the benefit of foreign missions falls within the description of “pious and godly uses,” which, Lord Watson says, is equivalent to charitable uses, seems to me beyond all reasonable doubt.

But I think that has been directly decided by this Court in the case of Mar. 17, 1908. Wilson's Executors v. The Scottish Society for the Conversion of Israel.¹ The precise question to be determined in that case was different from that with which we are now concerned, because the testator had certainly designated the particular association to be benefited by the bequest, and did not merely bequeath, as I think this testator does, to a class of associations among which his trustee is to select. But the point for which I cite the decision is that in considering how far effect should be given to the evidence adduced for the purpose of identifying the particular society as that which the testatrix intended to benefit, the Lord President treated the case as a charitable bequest, and upon that ground only finds it possible to give weight to evidence which, if he were dealing with another class of bequests, he would not have thought sufficient. His Lordship says,—“Having arrived at the conclusion that the testatrix, in making a charitable bequest of this kind, intended to give her money to some society for promoting the conversion of the Jews, and that there are several societies more or less nearly answering to the description in the will, it is the duty of the Court to decide which of them she meant, even although they are not all claiming in this process, and although we can only arrive at a decision by reasonable conjecture as to her probable meaning”; and on that principle, which, in the next sentence of his opinion, he says is not entirely satisfactory to his mind as a lawyer, he nevertheless founds his judgment. It is to be observed that notwithstanding the somewhat restricted meaning which he found it necessary to put upon the word “charity” in construing the Income-Tax Act, the Lord President has no hesitation in describing the bequest for the conversion of the Jews as a “charitable bequest,” and on that ground he thinks it proper to follow the course of the decisions requiring bequests for charities to be favourably interpreted by the Courts.

I think we ought to follow the same rule in this case, and that we must therefore find that the residuary bequest of the testator, when it is combined with the appointment of the real raiser as executor, imports a discretionary power on his part to select the missions on which the benefit of the bequest is to be conferred. He is of course to exercise his discretion as a trust committed to him, and not merely according to his own favour for one or other association for prosecuting foreign missions. It is a discretion which, as I read the will, the testator intended to confer upon him, and which he is therefore empowered to exercise. Taking this view, I think it follows that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled. The Lord Ordinary has allowed parties a proof of their averments. Now, the averments to be proved are averments made by the Established Church of Scotland on the one hand and the United Free Church on the other as to certain circumstances in the history of this testator which are supposed to indicate a favour on his part either for the Established Church or for the United Free Church. If the question were whether this testator intended to benefit one or other of these Churches to the exclusion of the other, or to the exclusion of other missionary associations, I am not persuaded that the facts specified would aid the Court very much in forming a judgment upon that question. They

Mar. 17, 1908. would come to nothing more than evidence which might suggest to the mind of a Judge a conjecture in favour of one or other of the Churches. But since Allan's Executor v. Allan. I hold that the testator did not intend to favour either Church to the exclusion of the other, but foreign missions generally, it is obvious that the proof Lord Kinnear. allowed could not assist the Court in coming to a conclusion.

I do not think it would be proper at this stage to repel the claims of these two Churches. While each has stated its own case they have combined to state a case as against the next of kin in support of the validity of the bequest, however it is to be administered, and I think it would be premature to pronounce any judgment which would put them out of Court at any further stage which must be reached before final judgment can be given.

I suggest that it would be proper to recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and to remit to him to allow the real raiser, if so advised, to lodge a claim in order that the trusts of the will may be executed, and thereafter to proceed as shall be just. The parties are in Court, and I think they ought to be allowed to remain in the process until we see what course the real raiser may be advised to take.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree entirely with the opinion which Lord Kinnear has just delivered, and I only propose to add a very few words. It is impossible, in my opinion, to read the will and to suppose, as the Lord Ordinary has done, that this is a case of a certain scheme or schemes insufficiently designed, and that the claimants are entitled to prove whom the testator intended to benefit. My reason is that the phrase "or any other in the foreign field suitable" clearly points, I think, to a power of selection somewhere. Accordingly I cannot agree with the propriety of allowing a proof to substantiate the averments to which Lord Kinnear has alluded, because I do not think it would forward the case one iota. The general question is whether the bequest shall stand. Now, as to the general rule, of course there is no doubt. It is the rule laid down by the Lord Chancellor in Crichton v. Grierson.¹

But then it was argued that this bequest fails in two particulars. It was said that there was not a selection of a particular class of objects—not a sufficient specification. I think there is, because I agree with what Lord Kinnear says, that foreign missions in the mind of a Scottish testator has a perfectly well understood meaning. It does not seem to me to help the matter to introduce the discussion which was handled by the House of Lords in *Blair v. Duncan*² and Macintyre v. Grimond,³ because there is here no question as to the interpretation of "religious." Of course it has now been decided that a bequest for "religious purposes" is too wide to be given effect to. That does not mean that you may not have a perfectly well defined purpose which might be properly characterised as a religious purpose. And accordingly it seems to me that a bequest to foreign missions is sufficiently defined, and that it is not hurt by saying that it is a religious purpose. Then comes the second alleged defect, that there is here no power of selection. But there is the appointment of an executor. It is quite true that it is not said that that executor is to do the choosing, but then there comes in the other canon, namely, that the Court Mar. 17, 1908. will always help the execution of a charitable bequest. There again I agree with Lord Kinnear that a bequest of which it is possible to say that it is a religious bequest may also be a charitable bequest. I have no doubt that this is a charitable bequest, and if that is so, then the Court will be helpful, so far as machinery is concerned, to have the purpose carried out. In other words, we have a direct application of the old authority of the Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris,¹ the case of a Dundee charity, and, I think, the very recent case of Murdoch v. Weir.² Accordingly I concur with what your Lordship has proposed. But in case there is any doubt about it, I should like to explain that the pursuer and real raiser should be allowed to lodge a claim, and it follows that if he does lodge a claim in accordance with the judgment pronounced, his claim will be sustained. It is not because there is any doubt about that that Lord Kinnear proposes at this stage not to repel the claims of the two Churches. It is only because one cannot force Mr Watson to make a claim, and it would not be right to have the multiplepounding disappear altogether. Should Mr Watson not do so, it would then be for the Churches to make some other proposition, such as to move for the appointment of a judicial factor. There is no doubt that the effect of this judgment is that if Mr Watson puts in a claim his claim will be sustained.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree in the judgment proposed. Apart from the power of selection, I should not have been disposed to sustain the bequest to foreign missions as sufficiently precise to satisfy the rule which has been laid down in many cases, that there must be not only a specification of a definite class representing the objects of the trust, but also a power of selection amongst the various bodies professing to carry out the object which the testator had in view. I should have great hesitation in expressing an opinion which differs from that of Lord President Inglis, but so far as his Lordship, in the case relating to the Society for the Conversion of Israel,³ professes to apply the principles of interpretation applicable to charitable trusts to a society whose object was solely the conversion of people from one form of religion to another, I should wish at all events to reserve my opinion, first, because his Lordship says that these considerations were not altogether satisfactory to his own mind; and, secondly, because it does not appear to me that the case in question was one in which the principle of the special construction of charitable trusts would arise. It was a case of the identification of a particular society which was described in general terms, and was not a case of the determination amongst a class of objects indicated in general terms of the particular object to which the fund was to be appropriated.

While I should not be of opinion that a bequest for purely religious purposes was entitled to the benefit of the benignant construction accorded to charitable trusts, it may very well be that the objects indicated are partly charitable and partly religious, or partly secular objects other than charity. I suppose it is generally known that the foreign missions of the Scottish Churches have education as one of their principal motives, and in Africa

Mar. 17, 1908. especially they have been very successful, whether for good or harm, in educating the Kaffir races to the ordinary standard of education which prevails amongst the European population. It may very well be that so far as the educational purpose is concerned a bequest of this kind might receive Lord M'Laren. favourable interpretation, and I should certainly not hesitate to say, where the primary object was charity or education, such as a school or college, that the institution would be entitled to the benefit of the "charitable" rule of construction although it was required that there should be religious services conducted, or even a chaplain appointed. Each case must, of course, depend upon its special circumstances, and the character of the body or class of bodies indicated by the testator. In the present case I think there is no difficulty whatever, because missions in the sense in which the testator has obviously used the word are a sufficient limitation of a definite class; and then, of course, there is the appointment of an executor which is equivalent to the power of selection. I therefore agree that if a claim is put in by the executor it must be sustained.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to allow the real raiser, if so advised, to lodge a condescendence and claim in order to the execution of the provisions of the will, and thereafter to proceed as accords."

Jeffrey, a salesman for Crichton & Stevenson, coalmasters, having asked Honeyman, a shipbroker, for an order, Honeyman told him that he had a ship coming in for which he would require bunker coal, and that he had been using Auchlochan unscreened coal. Jeffrey told him that his firm could supply Slamannan coal from Strathaven Colliery, unscreened, which he thought would suit if Auchlochan suited. Honeyman expressed his willingness to give an order, but said that the order must be given through Love, a coal merchant with whom he dealt. Honeyman communicated this conversation to Love, and at a subsequent meeting between Love and Jeffrey the latter received an order for Strathaven coal, and was told the name of the ship for which it was intended, both parties knowing that the order had reference to the coal which Honeyman had agreed to take. The coal when delivered proved quite unfit for the purpose of bunkering the ship, and was rejected.

In an action by Crichton & Stevenson against Love, for the price of the coal, held (1) that the conversation between Jeffrey and Honeyman was in the mind of both parties when the order was given, and formed part of the transaction, (2) that considering the transaction thus, the buyer had made known to the seller the particular purpose for which the coal was required, and had relied on the seller's skill and judgment in the matter, (3) that the warranty as to fitness thereby implied had not been fulfilled, and that the buyer was not liable for the price of the coal.

Gillespie Brothers & Company v. Cheney, Eggar, & Company, [1896] 2 Q. B. 59, approved.

CRICHTON & STEVENSON, coalmasters, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Robert Love, coal and ore merchant, Glasgow, concluding for payment of £52, 13s. 5d., being the price of 140 tons of Strathaven steam coal, put on board the s.s. "Dalbeattie" in Glasgow Harbour by the pursuers in implement of an order received from the defender.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The defender averred that the "Dalbeattie" belonged to a company in Norway for which Messrs Honeyman & Company, Glasgow, were agents. That in March 1906, on the pursuers applying to Messrs Honeyman for an order "Mr Honeyman explained to the pursuers that he was in the habit of purchasing Auchlochan bunkers for the 'Dalbeattie,' as they had found from experience that this class of bunker coal was very satisfactory, and on the pursuers guaranteeing that their Strathaven unscreened coal was as good a bunker coal quite suitable for the 'Dalbeattie,' and would give as good results as the Auchlochan bunkers which the 'Dalbeattie' had been using, Mr Honeyman agreed to purchase the bunker coals for the 'Dalbeattie,' at the same time, however, explaining to the pursuers that he, Mr Honeyman, purchased all his bunker coals through the defender, and that they would require to arrange to put the order through the defender." That the defender was advised of the arrangement, and the pursuers agreed to pay him a commission. "In the transaction the pursuers were perfectly well aware that the defender was merely Messrs Honeyman & Company's agent."

The defender further stated:—(Stat. 6) "The s.s. 'Dalbeattie' sailed from Glasgow on 30th March 1906, bound for Brest, the coal supplied by the pursuers being used for the bunkers, the purpose for which they were bought, and which was well known to the pursuers. On proceeding on the voyage it was discovered that this coal would not keep up steam, that it was dirty, and the captain, for the safety of the vessel and all concerned, had to come to an anchor at the Tail of the Bank."

The defender pleaded;—(2) The defender being agent for a disclosed principal, is not liable to the pursuers in the sum sued for, and decree of absolvitor should be granted, with costs. (3) The pursuers, having sold a coal for bunkering steamers, and being aware of the purpose for which the coal was supplied, were bound to supply an article suitable and reasonably fit for the purpose, and having failed to do so, decree of absolvitor should be granted, with costs. (4) Separatim, the order having been given on the assurance that the coal would be as suitable as Auchlochan coal was for the "Dalbeattie," and the coal supplied being entirely unsuitable and useless, absolvitor should be granted, with costs.*

Mar. 19, 1908.

Crichton &
Stevenson v.
Love.

The facts out of which the controversy arose, as ascertained after a proof, were as follows:—

In March 1906 Robert Jeffrey, a coal salesman in the employment of the pursuers, approached Messrs Honeyman & Company, ship-brokers, Glasgow, in order to obtain an order for coal, and had an interview with Mr Honeyman, a member of the firm. After a conversation, the import of which is stated in Jeffrey's evidence,* Honeyman told Jeffrey that he did not usually deal direct, but that he gave his coal orders through Robert Love, the defender, and that he would be willing to give him an order, but that it must be done through Love. Honeyman communicated this conversation to Love, and an interview then took place between Jeffrey and Love, at which Love gave an order for 150 tons of Strathaven unscreened steam coal. At the interview Jeffrey was informed by Love that the coal was intended for bunkering the "Dalbeattie," and reference was made to the conversation between Jeffrey and Honeyman.†

In fulfilment of this order 140 tons of Strathaven unscreened steam coal were delivered on board the "Dalbeattie" in Glasgow harbour about the end of March 1906. On trial the coal supplied proved to be of a very inferior quality, and quite unfit for the purpose of raising steam, and it was accordingly put on shore, and its rejection intimated to the pursuers.

On 30th March 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe), after a proof, repelled the defender's pleas, and gave decree against the defender as craved.‡

14. "Subject to the provisions of this Act and of any statute in that behalf there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale except as follows:—(1) Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose. . . ."

* In his evidence Jeffrey said:—"In March 1906 I met Mr Honeyman in the corridor which leads to the office. His office is next door to ours. He mentioned he had a boat coming in, and he could give us an order now he thought. He asked the name and price of the coal. I told him it was Slamannan coal. I mentioned it was Strathaven Colliery. I said it was unscreened steam coal. The price I quoted was 7s. 6d. f.o.b. Glasgow. He told me it was for bunkers. (Q.) Was there anything said about the coal he had been buying previously? (A.) He said he had been using some Auchlochan. He did not say anything about the name of the vessel. He did not say where he had used Auchlochan coal. I said I thought if Auchlochan suited him that ours would suit him."

† In his evidence Jeffrey said:—"When I met defender in the Exchange he told me the boat the coal was wanted for. He informed me that it was for Honeyman & Company the coal was for. . . . Defender told me that it was Mr Honeyman's order I was getting, that that was the order that Mr Honeyman spoke to me about."

‡ "NOTE.— . . . The defender's case therefore resolves itself into the general plea that the coal delivered not having been reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was supplied, defender was entitled to reject it.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Mar. 19, 1908.

The case was argued before the First Division on 24th and 25th January 1908.

Crichton &
Stevenson v.
Love.

Argued for the appellant (on his third plea, the other pleas being abandoned);—The buyer having made known to the sellers in this case the particular purpose for which the coal was required, and having relied on their skill and judgment to supply him with the requisite quality of coal, there was an implied warranty as to the fitness of the coal, under section 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.¹ The Sheriff-substitute had erred in limiting the application of this section to manufactured goods: on the contrary it extended to every class of goods, and included such products as coal.² [Counsel for the respondents intimated that he did not propose to maintain the view as to the scope of the section taken by the Sheriff-substitute.] It was not necessary for the buyer to shew that he had expressly

“There is no doubt about the facts (1) that what was sold was ‘Strathaven unscreened coal’; (2) that its intended use was, within the knowledge of seller and buyer, for bunkering a steamer; (3) that Strathaven unscreened coal was put on board the ‘Dalbeattie.’ The case is not that one thing was bought, and a different thing was put aboard ship, but rather that the thing bought was, when used on board the ship, unfit for its only purpose of raising steam.

“In this case, as in all such cases, section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act is pressed upon my attention. I often think in looking at section 14 (1) that the most significant phrase in it is the parenthetical phrase ‘whether he be the manufacturer or not.’ In framing this subsection (1) of clause 14, what seems to me to have been before the mind of the draughtsman, and probably the only thing before his mind, was the sale of manufactures. I don’t think that he had in contemplation at all the sale of a product such as coal, and I cannot but think that, if it does apply to products, this entire clause 14 assumes different aspects when applied to manufacturers and to products. If a seller sells such a thing as—say a locomotive engine—the ordinary buyer must obviously rely on the seller’s skill and judgment, and so it is quite reasonable that under clause 14 the responsibility of the articles sold turning out fit for the purpose for which a locomotive is required shall rest with the seller. But when we come to such a product as unscreened coal—that is practically coal as it is dug out of the earth—I don’t think this applies. No skill or judgment of the seller is, or can be, exercised to fit the subject of sale for a market. If it is not in itself fit for its purpose, nothing the seller can do can make it fit.

“The same considerations apply to clause 14 (2). I much doubt whether this subsection either was intended to cover a product such as coal. I think it also contemplated only manufactures. I do not think that coal brought up from the bowels of the earth falls within the term ‘goods,’ as used in this subsection, and so I do not think that, in the statutory sense, any question here arises upon merchantable quality, or buyer’s examination.

“It is not suggested that there was any express warranty given that the coal pursuers sold would attain such and such a result, and if I am right that the statutory implied warranty is not applicable to a product known to the intending buyer, such as coal from a named coalfield, then we get clear of the technicalities of the statute, and are thrown back upon the common law obligations of seller and buyer.

“So regarded, the single question seems to me to be—did pursuers do contracted with reference to the purpose for which the coal was required: it was sufficient that in point of fact this purpose was known to the seller.¹ It was not enough for the respondents to say that the appellant got what he asked for, namely, "Strathaven steam coal." This was not a case of the sale of a specified article by a trade name, and in general when goods were bought under a descriptive name, and the purpose for which the goods were required was known to the seller, the mere delivery of goods answering to that description was not enough, unless they were fit for the purpose.² In proving that the respondents knew the purposes for which the coal was intended, and that the order was given in reliance on the skill and judgment of the respondents, the appellant was entitled to refer to the previous interview between Honeyman and Jeffrey, for it was with express reference to what had passed at that interview that the order had been given. The unfitness of the coal supplied for bunkering purposes could not be disputed. *Gillespie Brothers & Company*³ was directly in point.

Argued for the respondents;—A buyer was only entitled to the benefit of section 14 (1) when he could prove that he had made known the purpose of the purchase in such a way as to shew that he relied on the seller's skill and judgment. In the present case the evidence fell far short of this. The most that could be said was that the appellant had informed the respondents' agent that the coal was intended for bunkering the "Dalbeattie." There was nothing to shew that he did this in such a way as to shew that he relied on the respondents to select for him the appropriate quality of coal. On the contrary, he expressly ordered a particular kind of coal—Strathaven steam coal—and he got what he asked for. It was irrelevant to consider the prior communings between Jeffrey and Honeyman. It was more than doubtful whether Honeyman had said anything to shew reliance on Jeffrey's skill and judgment, and in any event it was not Honeyman who gave the order, but Love. The cases relied on by the respondents were distinguishable. In *Wallis*⁴ the question was whether the selection had been left to the seller. In *Gillespie Brothers*³ there was express reliance on the seller's skill and judgment. In *Jacobs*² the only question which was decided was that it was part of the contract that the goods should be up to a certain standard. The Sheriff-substitute had accordingly arrived at a right conclusion.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an appeal from the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, in which a firm of Crichton & Stevenson, who are coalmasters, sue Robert for defender what they contracted to do for him—that is to say, deliver to him what he had bought from them. Now, defender, it is clear from the proof, knew what 'Strathaven unscreened coal' meant, for he had bought it before. What he contracted that pursuers should do for him was—that they should dig out of the bowels of the earth a certain quantity of the coal lying in Strathaven pit, and on his account put that on board the s.s. 'Dalbeattie.' This pursuers did, and that as it seems to me ends the whole matter, as in a question between pursuers and defender."

Love, a coal merchant, for the price of a cargo of coals supplied by them to him. It is admitted that the coals were supplied; but the defence is that the coals were not suitable for the purpose for which they were supplied. Mar. 19, 1908.
Crichton &
Stevenson v.
Love.

Two defences were originally proponed in the Sheriff Court, neither of which was given effect to in the Sheriff Court, and neither of which was insisted in before your Lordships' bar; and, therefore, I merely mention them in order to get rid of them. It is said, first, that the principal defender, Love, was not really the person who bought the coals, but that he was an agent for a disclosed principal. The Sheriff was against that contention, and the learned counsel, very rightly, did not attempt to interfere with that finding. The other defence was that there had been a special guarantee given of these coals, and that also was not insisted in before your Lordships' bar. The whole matter, therefore, came to turn upon the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, to section 14 of which I shall presently more particularly advert.

But I should first mention that the findings upon which the learned Sheriff-substitute gave decree for the pursuers were these: That in March 1906 the defender ordered from the pursuers about 150 tons of Strathaven unscreened coal at a certain price; that the pursuers delivered the coals; that the defender has not paid the price—all of which facts are not controverted—and then that the defender has failed to establish his pleas. Two pleas I have already dealt with. The third plea, that rested on the section of the Sale of Goods Act, the learned Sheriff-substitute held was not established, for this reason, that he held that the Sale of Goods Act, section 14 (1), did not apply to such things as coals. He does not think that the Act has in contemplation the sale of a product such as coal, and, accordingly, he holds that the Act does not apply. And, then, taking the matter as one at common law, he finds that there was no warranty given of the coal being fit for any particular purpose.

The learned counsel for the respondents did not see their way to support the learned Sheriff-substitute's judgment upon the grounds on which he had put it, and I do not wonder, because I do not think that the grounds can be supported, and certainly it is absolutely in the teeth of an authority which, although not binding, must certainly be treated with respect. The case of Gillespie Brothers & Company v. Cheney, Eggar, & Company,¹ which is a decision of the late Lord Chief-Justice of England (Lord Russell of Killowen), could not have been quoted to the Sheriff-substitute or, I think, he would have dealt otherwise with the matter. The facts in that case were that the plaintiffs were commission-merchants and the defendants coal-agents. The plaintiffs received from their correspondents in Barbadoes a letter in these terms:—"We have now decided to order a cargo of coal, and will ask you kindly to look after same. . . . We will take whatever kind of coal you think it best to send us, after satisfying yourselves of its suitability for the purposes we require, viz., the bunkering of steamships and ships of war, and, of course, it must stand well upon the British and Foreign Admiralty lists." This letter was taken by the plaintiffs to

Mar. 19, 1908. the defendants, and shewn to and left with them. And following upon Crichton & that the following contract was entered into:—"Memorandum of Agree-Stevenson v. ment.—That Messrs Gillespie Brothers & Company agree to buy and Messrs Love. _____ Cheney, Eggar, & Forrester agree to sell a cargo of coal deliverable at Barbadoes, per ship 'Enrichetta M.' now at Swansea, on the following conditions, viz., that the quantity is to be about 500 tons; that the coal is to be of the description known as Cyfartha Merthyr or Hills, Plymouth; that the price, including cost, freight, and insurance, is to be 18s. 6d. per ton.
 . . . " Well, on the arrival of the coal at Barbadoes it was found, as alleged by the plaintiffs, to be wholly unsuitable for the bunkering of steamships and ships of war, and accordingly the action was raised. Now, that, I need scarcely say, is of course a decision absolutely in point, so far as it raises the question of the statute applying to articles of this sort, and the judgment is a very valuable one upon the construction of the statute altogether.

The section of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, upon which the whole matter depends is section 14, which says:—"Subject to the provisions of this Act.
 . . . there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale except as follows:—(1) Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose, provided that in the case of a contract for the sale of a specified article under its patent or other trade name there is no implied condition as to its fitness for any particular purpose. . . ." Now, the first portion of that section was clearly applicable in the case of Gillespie Brothers & Company.¹ There was no question that the buyer there had made known to the seller the particular purposes for which the coals were required. They were required for bunkering, and they were to be of such bunkering as was suitable for steamers and ships of war. There is no question also that he had done it in such a way as to shew that he relied on the seller's skill or judgment, because in the letter he said,—“After satisfying yourself as to the suitability for the purpose we require.” But it was contended in that case that there might be a defence under the proviso as to the sale of an article by its “patent or other trade name.” I remind your Lordships that in the contract which was made the coal was to be of the description of Cyfartha Merthyr or Hills, Plymouth, and there was no question that that coal had been supplied. The Lord Chief-Justice deals with that in this way: after reading the proviso he says (p. 64),—“That, obviously, is intended to meet the case not of the supply of what I may call for this purpose raw commodities or materials, but for the supply of manufactured articles—steam-ploughs or any form of invention which has a known name, and is bought and sold under its known name, patented or otherwise. I am clearly of opinion that the proviso does not apply to this case.” Now, ¹ [1896] 2 Q. B. 59.

I humbly agree with that ; and, although I have had to bring it in at this Mar. 19, 1908. moment, the application of it will be apparent in a little.

I now go in detail to the facts which raise the controversy in this case—[His Lordship narrated the facts and quoted the portions of Jeffrey's evidence, ut supra].

Crichton &
Stevenson v.
Love.

Ld. President.

Now, the order that he gave him was undoubtedly an order for a cargo of Strathaven coal. Well, the Strathaven coal was supplied. It was put in the boat, but the performance going down the river was so bad that they anchored off Greenock Pier, and eventually the coal was put out upon the quay at Ardrossan and rejected. But before it was finally rejected they had another trial of it. They had tried it in the boat, but they also had a trial of it in a tug. I am not going into this matter closely on the evidence. I wish simply to state the result at which I have arrived, because it is a result at which I have arrived without the slightest doubt. This is not the difficult part of the case. I am clearly of opinion, as a jury matter; that this coal was de facto unfit. It behaved very badly in the vessel going down, and I think it got a perfectly fair trial in the tug, and was proved to be unsuitable coal for bunker coal. I do not say that with boilers of a particular construction, with forced draught, it might not be possible to get this coal to burn, and the analysis probably shews that it has the constituents of heat in it. But that is not the question. The question is an ordinary jury question, and if I was in the trade I should hold without the slightest hesitation that this particular cargo of coal was a bad cargo, and was not good enough to raise steam.

Well, now, I come to the application of the statute to these facts. I hold in fact that these goods were not reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were supplied. As the Sheriff-substitute says in his note,—“There is no doubt about the facts (1) that what was sold was ‘Strathaven unscreened coal’; (2) that its intended use was, within the knowledge of seller and buyer, for bunkering a steamer; (3) that Strathaven unscreened coal was put on board the ‘Dalbeattie.’” I think those findings are quite correct. There was no question, therefore, that, in the words of the statute, the buyer had made known to the seller “the particular purpose for which the goods were required.” But the real difficulty and, I confess, delicacy of the case—because I have not found the matter unattended with difficulty—the real difficulty comes with the application of the next words. It is not enough to shew that the buyer “makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required,” but it must be “so as to shew that the buyer relies on the seller’s skill and judgment.” Now, that is where the difficulty of the case comes in, because it is certainly true that Love ordered Strathaven coal and he got Strathaven coal, and the point is—in ordering that, although he knew it was for bunker work, did he rely upon the seller’s skill or judgment?

We had a very excellent argument from Mr Murray in which he treated the matter as one of clear logic. He said that the chain was broken. He said no doubt it might be that in what I may call the touting interview Jeffrey clearly conveyed to Honeyman that if he would order Strathaven bunker coal it would be a good enough coal for steaming purposes; but, he said, Honeyman, having taking his chance of that, then goes to Love and

Mar. 19, 1908. says to Love "Order me a cargo of Strathaven coal," and that consequently when Love came to Jeffrey to make the bargain which was made, Love Crichton & did not really rely on Jeffrey at all, that really what Love did was simply Stevenson v. Love. to order a specific article, not concerning himself with whether that specific Ld. President. article was fit or was not, because all that had already been settled by Mr Honeyman—that Mr Honeyman made up his own mind and must take his chance. As I say that is a very powerful argument and a very logical one. But, upon mature consideration, I do not think it is sound. I think, when you are to inquire if the buyer relies on the seller's skill and judgment, you must take the transaction as a whole; and I think, therefore, that you can really in this matter wrap up Love and Honeyman in one.

I have purposely gone upon Jeffrey's evidence and not upon Love's, because, of course, the pursuer cannot complain of his own evidence being taken. I have already read that passage in which Jeffrey said he knew that it was Honeyman's order he was getting. Now, it seems to me that inasmuch as he knew that Love at that moment was passing on, so to speak, Honeyman's order, not as an agent—I am not raising any question as to that, it was really to serve Honeyman that Love was giving it—and that he also knew that it was bunker coal, it seems to me to import his own conversations with Honeyman; and that consequently the real justice of the matter is to hold that in the whole transaction Love and Honeyman together were relying upon the seller's skill or judgment, namely, that the coal should be fit for the purpose for which he was supplying it.

Accordingly, upon these grounds I am of opinion that, the defence of unsuitability being made out, there was under the terms of the Sale of Goods Act an implied warranty in this case, and that, accordingly, the defence is a good one against paying the price of the article supplied.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordship, for the reasons given.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the difficulty in this case arises from the form in which the transaction was carried out. I think it is necessary to go beyond the form in order to reach what was the substance of the transaction. It is no doubt true that Love bought this coal because Honeyman had made up his mind, that Love did not trouble himself about the order, and that the contract was not influenced by the previous supplies to Love of coal of the same description. But when one says that Love had bought the coal because Honeyman had made up his mind, that, I think, makes it necessary, in order to get at the substance, to ask this question—Why was it that Honeyman had made up his mind to take this particular coal? No doubt the subject that was being dealt with was a specific subject, but then it is equally true that Honeyman had no previous opportunity of examining the coal that he was buying; and, according to the admission of the pursuers' salesman, Jeffrey, Honeyman told him that he knew nothing about their coal—that is to say, Strathaven coal. It is further matter of admission—and in regard to this matter I prefer to take the evidence from the witnesses of the pursuers—it is matter of admission that Jeffrey knew the particular purpose for which the coals were required; and also that Jeffrey told Honeyman that in his opinion they were as good for that purpose as the Auchlochan coal which they had been previously using.

I am of opinion that it is established, as a matter of fact, that Honeyman Mar. 19, 1908. relied on Jeffrey's skill and judgment; and, therefore, if it was a question Crichton & Stevenson v. Love. between Honeyman and Jeffrey, I should have no doubt that section 14 (1) Love. of the Sale of Goods Act applied. The difficulty is in taking the next step. I think that the bridge, if I may use the expression, is supplied by Jeffrey's Lord Mac- evidence that he knew perfectly well that the order he was getting was not, kenzie. in any proper sense, Love's order, but was Honeyman's order. Accordingly there is sufficient in the case to enable one to hold that Jeffrey knew that Love was just standing in Honeyman's shoes, and that, therefore, subsection 1 of section 14 is pleadable against Jeffrey as in a question with Love, just as it would have been in a question with Honeyman.

On the question whether the coal was suitable or unsuitable for the purpose for which it was supplied I am entirely of the same opinion as your Lordship.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute dated 30th March 1907: Find in fact (1) that in March 1906 the defender ordered from the pursuers about 150 tons Strathaven unscreened coal at 7s. 6d. per ton, delivered f.o.b. at Queen's Dock, Glasgow, for the purpose of being used as bunker coal in s.s. 'Dal-beattie'; (2) that the defender made known to the pursuers the purpose for which said coal was required, viz., for use as bunker coal on an ordinary steamer, and that he relied on the pursuers' skill and judgment in this matter; (3) that the pursuers delivered 140 tons 9 cwt. of coal purporting to be in fulfilment of said order; (4) that the coal so delivered was not reasonably fit for the purpose above mentioned: Find in law that the defender is not liable to pay for said coal: Therefore assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern."

Zugg v. J. & J. Cunningham, Limited.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 4 (1)—Subcontracting—Work "undertaken" by the Principal.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 4 (1), under the rubric Subcontracting, enacts, that where any person (the principal), in the course of or for the purposes of his trade or business, contracts with any other person (the contractor) for the execution by or under the contractor of the whole "or any part of the work undertaken by the principal, the principal shall be liable to pay" compensation to any workman employed in the execution of the work as if he had immediately employed him.

A firm of chemical manufacturers contracted with a certain person to tar the outside of tanks used in their business to protect them from the weather,

May 14, 1908. and a workman in the employment of the contractor was killed by an accident while engaged on the works.

Zugg v. J. & J. Cunningham, Limited.

In a claim for compensation by the workman's widow, held that the work of tarring the tanks was not part of the work "undertaken" by the chemical manufacturers, within the meaning of section 4 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and that they were not liable to pay compensation.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, at the instance of Mrs Isabella Dickson or Zugg, widow of the deceased Alfred Dennis Zugg, labourer, against J. & J. Cunningham, Leith, the Sheriff-substitute (Guy) awarded compensation, and on the crave of the defenders stated a case for appeal.

The following facts were stated to be admitted or proved :—“(1) The appellants are manufacturers of sulphuric acid, chemical manures, and feeding stuffs, at their works in Salamander Street, Leith, of which they are the owners as well as the occupiers; (2) part of said works consists of large chambers which are used in the manufacture of sulphuric acid, enclosed and protected by corrugated iron and wood; (3) it is necessary to have the corrugated iron and wood tarred over about once in every two years for the purpose of preserving them from the weather, and keeping the chambers within wind and water-tight, the tarring of one half being done one year and of the other half the following year; (4) the chambers are about 20 feet in height and about 40 feet from the ground level, and the said work of tarring is done by workmen who use a hanging scaffold; (5) the appellants have never had this work done by any of their servants, but have always contracted for it to be done at so much a square yard; (6) in the month of July 1907 the appellants contracted with James Aimers who had had a similar contract with the appellants during the years 1902, 1903, and 1905, to do a portion of this tarring work, he being paid one penny per square yard—Aimers supplying the tackle and scaffolding and the appellants supplying the tar; (7) Aimers employed a man George Laing to assist him in the work, and authorised Laing to employ Alfred Dennis Zugg, who was accordingly employed and paid wages at the rate of 7d. per hour; (8) on 14th August 1907 a rope accidentally slipped from the hanging scaffold on which the said George Laing and Alfred Dennis Zugg were working, with the result that Zugg fell to the ground, and was so injured that he died in Leith Hospital on the same day.”

It was also admitted or proved that the respondent was the widow of the said Alfred Dennis Zugg, and was wholly dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death, and was the only person so dependent; that if compensation was payable the amount thereof was £245, 14s.

On these facts the Sheriff-substitute held in law that within the meaning of said Act (1) the appellants were principals in relation to said work; (2) that the said work was undertaken by the appellants in the course of and for the purpose of their trade or business; and (3) that Zugg was a workman within the meaning of said Act, and that the said accident arose out of and in the course of his employment as such; and (4) that the respondent was entitled to compensation from the appellants under the said Act in the said sum of £245, 14s., and he ordered the appellants to consign said sum with the Sheriff-clerk, and found the appellants liable in expenses.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were :—“(1)

Whether the work contracted for was work undertaken by the appellants as principals in the course of or for the purposes of their trade or business all within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906? and (2) whether the appellants are liable to the respondent in compensation under the said Act?" * May 14, 1908.
Zugg v. J. & J. Cunningham, Limited.

The case was argued before the First Division on 14th May 1908.

Argued for the appellants;—The work in the course of which the accident occurred was not work "undertaken by the principal" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act.

The Court intimated that they did not desire to hear further argument for the appellants, and called upon counsel for the respondent.

Argued for the respondent;—Section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, had a wider application than the corresponding section in the Act of 1897, inasmuch as it did not contain the proviso excluding the liability of the principal in the case of work which was merely ancillary or incidental to the work carried on by the principal. The cases under the Act of 1897 in which compensation had been refused had been decided on the ground that the work was merely ancillary and incidental.¹ The present case resembled rather those decisions where it had been held that the subcontract formed part of the undertaking.² The appellants' business could not be carried on unless the sulphuric acid chambers were properly tarred, and the work of tarring was, on a fair construction of the section, part of the work undertaken by the appellants.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This stated case sets forth that the appellants, chemical manufacturers, have in their works certain structures enclosed and protected by corrugated iron and wood. These structures require protection against weather just as other parts require slates or paint. The business of the appellants is not that of painters or slaters, but that of manufacturers of sulphuric acid, chemical manures, and feeding stuffs. Therefore, when from time to time these structures require re-tarring the appellants have to employ for that purpose one whose business it is to do such work. Indeed, the Sheriff-substitute finds in fact that "the appellants have never had this work done by any of their own servants, but have always contracted for it to be done at so much a square yard." Accordingly, in July 1907 the appellants did contract with Aimers to do a portion of this work at a penny

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 4, subcontracting (1), enacts:—"Where any person (in this section referred to as the principal), in course of or for the purposes of his trade or business, contracts with any other person (in this section referred to as the contractor) for the execution by or under the contractor of the whole or any part of the work undertaken by the principal, the principal shall be liable to pay to any workman employed in the execution of the work any compensation under this Act which he would have been liable to pay if that workman had been immediately employed by him."

Cunningham, who was accordingly employed upon the job. Unfortunately, whilst Zugg was so employed he fell from the scaffold on which he was working, Limited.

Ld. President. and was killed. Zugg's widow brought this claim for compensation against the chemical manufacturers. There is no question that Zugg was not the servant of the appellants, and accordingly the claim is brought under the 4th section of the Act. Section 4 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, provides:—[His Lordship quoted sec. 4 (1)].

Now, the Sheriff-substitute, after finding the facts as above narrated, holds in law "that the said work was undertaken by the appellants in the course of and for the purposes of their trade or business." I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has misunderstood the section. The whole point turns on whether this was work "undertaken" by the appellants. It is not out of the way to consider what is the place of the section, that is to say, what is its position in the scheme of the Act, and for this purpose it is perfectly proper to look at the rubric. You may look at the rubric of the section in examining the position of the section in the Act, though you cannot do so in order to put an interpretation upon the actual words of the section. Now, the rubric is "subcontracting." The Act had dealt with the ordinary relations between employer and employed; it goes on to provide for cases where a middleman or subcontractor is introduced. It seems to me that what is in the section is clear enough. Where a person has undertaken as principal to perform a piece of work, and then enters into a contract with another for the performance of the whole or part of the work he will be liable to the workman employed by that other contractor, but always provided he has undertaken to perform the work. Now, undertaking as a principal must mean undertaking on the order of someone else, i.e., a customer. In other words, to get the state of affairs contemplated by the section there must be an undertaking by A to perform the work for B, and a subcontract between A and C (whose immediate servant the workman is), to perform the work undertaken. Now, when we come to look at the facts here we find that there was no undertaking by the appellants, and no subcontract. The appellants ordered the work for themselves, and it was Aimers, and Aimers alone, who "undertook" to perform the work. Accordingly, there is no room for the application of the section. The absurd length to which the opposite doctrine would lead may easily be seen. I suggested the illustration of a doctor who for the purposes of his practice required that an electric power installation should be fitted up in his consulting room, and who employed a firm of electrical engineers to fit the installation. The idea that he should be liable for injuries received by a servant of the firm so engaged shews the absurdity of such a view of the section. Such a construction would be entirely foreign to the central idea that prompted the Workmen's Compensation Acts, namely, that injuries to workmen should be looked upon as part of the expenses of the work which their employers carried on. I have no difficulty in holding that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong, and that there is no claim against the appellants. I accordingly think that both questions should be answered in the negative.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. If Zugg had been directly employed I take it he would have had no claim against Messrs Cunningham, because "workman" is so defined in the Act of Parliament as to exclude people who are merely casual labourers. The applicant's claim accordingly is founded on the fact that there was an intermediary, to wit, Aimers. To establish the claimant's argument it is necessary in the first place to put a construction on the word "undertaken." I think that word may receive some shade of colour or meaning from the word "undertaking," which is used in other clauses of the statute. To illustrate what I mean, take the case of a railway company which arranges to build its own engines or to lay out its own sidings. In such a case the company would be held to have undertaken the work, though it was under no contractual obligation to do so. Similarly where a builder by profession has undertaken to erect or repair a building, it may be for his own occupation, if he delegates the whole or a part of the work to another he would be liable to pay compensation in the event of an accident happening to one of the subcontractor's workmen.

In the present circumstances I am unable to see that the work of tarring the building in question was work undertaken by the appellants, whose business is not the erection or repair of structures but the manufacture of chemicals. I am therefore of opinion that the fourth section of the Act is inapplicable, and that the determination of the Sheriff should be reversed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with your Lordships.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT answered both questions in the case in the negative, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute as arbiter, and remitted to him to proceed accordingly.

At the request of the pursuers the Sheriff-substitute stated a case.

The case stated :—"The arbitration petition craved a review of the weekly payments to the defender and an order that the same might be ended as at 1st November 1907, and was presented in this Court on 21st December 1907. . . . At the diet of proof the defender did not appear, and evidence was led by the pursuers, as a result of which I found the following facts proved, namely :—That the defender on 2d July 1907 sustained personal injury by accident while in the employment of the pursuers; that liability in compensation for said injury was admitted by the pursuers, and that compensation calculated on a basis of an average weekly wage of £1, 7s. 8d. was paid by the pursuers to the defender down to 1st November 1907; that no memorandum of said agreement was recorded; that on 1st November 1907 the defender having recovered from the effects of his injury, resumed work, and has since been engaged in the pursuers' employment, and has been earning full wages; that the defender refuses to discharge the pursuers from his claim for compensation; that the wages at present received by the defender are greater in average weekly amount than those received by him before the accident, being £1, 9s. 4d. as contrasted with £1, 7s. 8d."

The questions of law were :—"1. Was the arbitrator right in holding that he could terminate the compensation only as from the date of his interlocutor? 2. Ought he to have terminated the compensation as at the date of the presentation of the application for review? Or, 3. Ought he to have terminated the compensation as at 1st November 1907?"

The case was argued before the First Division on 14th May 1908.

Argued for the appellants ;—Compensation should have been ended as from 1st November, when the workman's incapacity ceased. The Sheriff in finding that it was only ended as from the date of his interlocutor, had considered himself bound by the decisions in *Steel v. Oakbank Oil Co.*¹ and Pumpherson Oil Co., Limited, v. Cavaney.² These cases were distinguishable. They dealt with agreements of which a memorandum had been recorded, and the legal consequences of which were very different from those where an agreement was only inferred from payments de facto made under the Act. But if it should be considered that this case was ruled by these decisions, the question should be remitted for reconsideration by a Court of seven Judges in view of the dissenting opinions in *Steel*¹ and Cavaney,² and of the fact that in England the question had been decided differently.³

² June 23, 1903, 5 F. 963.

³ Morton & Co., Limited, v. Woodward, [1902] 2 K. B. 276.

There was no difference under the new Act with regard to this question, because sec. 16 of the First Schedule of the Act of 1906 re-enacted sec. 12 of the First Schedule of the Act of 1897.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This stated case touches the fringe of a question on which there seems to be a considerable amount of difference of judicial opinion. But I do not think it imposes upon us the necessity of taking either of the two courses which otherwise would have been alone open to us. That is to say, either to have sent the case to a Court of seven Judges or to the whole Court for consideration of the differing judicial opinions which have been expressed in the case of *Steel v. The Oakbank Oil Company*¹ in the other Division, in the case of *Cavaney v. The Pumpherston Oil Company*² in this Division, and in the case of *Morton*³ in the English Court of Appeal—or to have treated the matter as decided as it has been by a majority in both Divisions, leaving to the unsuccessful party the remedy of going to the House of Lords. I do not think we are driven to choose between these two alternatives, because I think this case presents in one particular so important a difference that it takes it out of the class of cases which I have just mentioned. The point is, where a person has been paid compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for a certain period, and then there has been an application to the arbitrator—in this case the Sheriff-substitute—under the 16th section of the First Schedule of the Act for review of the payment—whether the arbitrator in making the review should make the date of the new condition of circumstances—that is to say, the affirmance that payment should stop altogether—(a) the time at which he holds in fact that the real change in circumstances occurred; or (b) the time at which the person asking review presented the petition; or (c) the date of the judgment or interlocutor giving effect to the Sheriff-substitute's views. Where the payments that had been made were made under something which is equivalent to a judgment—that is to say, in respect of a recorded memorandum—is one state of affairs. But where there was no compulsory warrant for the payment is another state of affairs. I do not propose to go into the arguments that were used in these cases; and, in particular, I reserve my own personal opinion as to whether I agree with the Judges of the majority here or with the Judges of the minority here who agreed with the Judges of the English Court. But I say this, that it is perfectly evident that the whole of the reasoning of the majority here, who decided that the date must be the third of the dates I have specified, depended upon the fact that there was an operative judgment ordaining a certain sum to be paid weekly to the workman, and that until that judgment was got rid of, it must continue to have effect. When we come to the facts of this case it is otherwise. Here no memorandum of agreement was ever recorded. All that happened was that there was a de facto payment from 2d July 1907 down to 1st November 1907; that on 1st November 1907 the employers ceased payment; and then, as the workman would not admit that he had no claim for compensation, the employers presented a petition to the Sheriff to bring the payments to an end. On

May 14, 1908. that petition the Sheriff-substitute has found as matter of fact that on 1st November 1907 the workman was completely recovered, and that he had recovered was evidenced by the fact that at that moment he was in full employment with a wage actually higher than he had earned before. In other words, the Sheriff-substitute has found that de facto the ceasing of payment was perfectly right. Then, in addition, we are face to face with the fact that there is no decree in existence, nor any decree which can ever be called into existence, which would affirm that the employers were under obligation to pay anything after 1st November 1907. Accordingly it seems to me here that the arbitrator was not right. I think that he, perhaps not unnaturally, thought that he was bound by these cases, but I think he ought, in the circumstances, to have terminated the compensation as at 1st November 1907, and that we should so determine. I am quite clearly of opinion that it is not necessary for the decision of this case to decide the difference of judicial opinion in the cases I have cited.

Ld. President.

LORD M'LAREN.—If I had to consider the result at which I would personally arrive in regard to this question in its various forms I should say that my opinion, as expressed in the case of Cavaney,¹ is unaltered. But then I was in a minority in that case, and I must accept the decision of the Court unless and until that decision is overruled by a competent authority. Therefore I am very glad to be able to concur in the judgment proposed, regarding it, if I may say so, as a bridge by which I may more quickly arrive at my destination than I should in the former case. I agree with your Lordship that it is impossible to read the opinions of the Judges constituting the majority without seeing that in their opinions it was a very important element—certainly in the case of *Cavaney*¹—that there was a recorded agreement, or an award in an arbitration, which set up an obligation indefinite as regards duration in time. Such obligation would naturally continue until it was brought to an end by some means as effectual as the agreement or award, and their Lordships came to the conclusion that the agreement would subsist until the decision of the case. I should have thought myself that, following the analogy of ordinary legal proceedings, reductions, or any other mode of terminating an agreement, the effect of the decision would draw back at least to the date of the initial writ of the case. But then in this case we have no award, we have no recorded agreement, and the most that can be said is that there is an inferential agreement to continue to pay, because as a matter of fact the employer has paid compensation substantially on the basis of the statute during the period of incapacity. But then it seems to me to follow that, as there is nothing to set aside, you can only infer an agreement to pay during incapacity and no longer. Therefore when the Sheriff-substitute has found the date when incapacity ceased, that seems to me to be the date when payment would necessarily terminate. I agree that the question should be so answered.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think that this case is clearly distinguishable on the ground your Lordship has stated from the cases of *Steel v. The Oakbank Oil Company*² and of Cavaney v. The Pumpherton Oil Company.¹ Upon its own merits, I concur with what your Lordship has said, and that we May 14, 1908. must answer the question as proposed.

v. Goodwillie.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Appeal—Competency—Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 68), secs. 9, 10, 32.—In a petition under the Burial Grounds Act, 1855, for the designation of a burial ground, the decision of the Sheriff-substitute cannot competently be appealed to the Sheriff.

ON 23d October 1907 the Parish Council of the parish of Strichen presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen, under section 9 of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, craving to have a certain piece of land designated for the purpose of a burial ground.*

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Aberdeen, Kincardine, and Banff.

The petition was opposed by the Rev. Richard Goodwillie, minister of the parish of Strichen.

ON 15th November 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Young) granted the prayer of the petition.

Mr Goodwillie appealed to the Sheriff.

ON 22d February 1908 the Sheriff (Crawford) dismissed the appeal as incompetent.†

* The Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. cap. 68), enacts:—

Sec. 9. " . . . If a majority . . . of the parochial board shall resolve that a burial ground shall be provided under this Act for the parish, such new burial ground shall be provided in the same manner as if an old burial ground had been closed by Order in Council.

Sec. 10. " Whenever any burial ground shall have been closed by Order in Council " the parochial board " may apply by summary petition to the Sheriff to have a suitable portion of land designated for the purpose of a burial ground . . . provided always that due intimation shall have been given of not less than ten days to the owner of such lands, that he may be heard for his interest before such designation is actually made, subject always to an appeal to any of the Lords Ordinary of the Court of Session, whose decision shall be final, such appeal always being presented within fourteen days of the date of the Sheriff's judgment."

Sec. 32. " No interlocutor or deliverance of a Sheriff under this Act, excepting as herein provided, shall be in any way subject to review, or to be set aside by reason of any defect of form therein, or in the procedure on which it followed."

† " NOTE.—This is an appeal against a decree of the Sheriff-substitute, pronounced in a petition by the Parish Council of Strichen, presented under section 9 of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855. I am of opinion that the appeal is not competent, and that I have no jurisdiction to entertain it. By the statute a certain jurisdiction is conferred, and a corresponding duty laid upon the Sheriff. It was conceded, and could not successfully have been disputed, that the word 'Sheriff,' as used in the statute, includes Sheriff-substitute, as it always does, unless the contrary is expressed, and that the petition was competently presented to the Sheriff-substitute and dealt with by him. Now, clause 32 of the Act is in these terms:—'No interlocutor or deliverance of a Sheriff under this Act, excepting as herein provided, shall be in any way subject to review, or to be set aside by reason of any defect of form therein, or in the procedure on which it followed.' The words of that section, according to their plain meaning, appear to me to exclude an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff. The words 'excepting as herein provided' make that all the more evident. The exception refers to an appeal which is allowed in certain cases under section 10 to a Lord Ordinary of the Court of Session. That appeal must be presented within fourteen days of the date of the Sheriff's judgment. That would not leave time for an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, and I do not think it possible to interpret the words 'Sheriff's judgment' as meaning a judgment on appeal from the Sheriff-substitute.

"The statutes are now numerous in which a new jurisdiction and duty are conferred and laid upon the Sheriff for the purposes of the statute different from his jurisdiction as Judge Ordinary. The procedure prescribed in these statutes varies very much in detail, and each must be interpreted by its own terms. Where there is room for holding that 'Sheriff' means the Sheriff Court with its ordinary procedure, then the appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff will remain, and any different intention must be clearly and unmistakably expressed. Such a case was The Magistrates of Portobello v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, 9th November 1882, 10 R. 130, in which the language of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act made it clear that the ordinary procedure of the Sheriff Court was to be followed, and the subject-matter of the petition to the Sheriff was similar to that of an ordinary Sheriff Court action. There is, however, a series of statutes which differ from each other in detail, some of them, though not all, imposing upon the Sheriff a duty which is rather ministerial than judicial, but agreeing in this, that the purpose of the statute is to be worked out under a procedure marked by more speedy finality and greater dispatch than an ordinary litigation would afford. One feature common to such Acts is that they provide for a single decision in the Sheriff Court, which in some cases is final, while in others there is a single limited appeal. In some statutes, especially of late years, that object is attained by limiting the jurisdiction to the Sheriff-principal. But a single decision may be contemplated without such limitation. An early case of that kind was Balderston v. Richardson, 20th February 1841, 3 D. 597, arising under the Bankrupt Act. Lord Gillies observed, 'The Sheriff in the statute means either the Substitute or the Principal, but not both,' and that observation is equally applicable to the present case. The case of Fulton v. Dunlop, 31st May 1862, 24 D. 1027, arising under the same statute as the present, is very nearly a direct precedent. It was there stated by the Sheriff-substitute, and assumed throughout, that there was no appeal from him to the Sheriff. It also appears from the report that a year or two previously another application had been made under the Act by the Parochial Board, and that the Sheriff had dismissed an appeal to him from the Sheriff-substitute as incompetent. The same point has been raised in other cases, such as Fleming v. Dickson, Dec. 19, 1862, 1 Macph. 188; Leitch v. The Scottish Legal Burial Society, Oct. 21, 1870, 9 Macph. 40; and Bone v. The Sorn School Board, March 16, 1886, 13 R. 768. Those cases decided that the Sheriff-principal may take up the case though the petition has been presented to the Sheriff-substitute, and he has dealt with preliminary pleas, and that even when

Argued for Mr Goodwillie *;—The Sheriff had erred in refusing to entertain the appeal from the Sheriff-substitute, such appeal being competent and not excluded by the terms of the statute.¹

Counsel for the respondents (Sleigh and others) was not called upon.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not see any difficulty in this case, and I think the judgment of the Sheriff is right. It is impossible to read the provisions of the Burial Grounds (Scotland) Act, 1855, without seeing that the only appeal allowed is an appeal to the Lord Ordinary under certain limited conditions, and that there is no appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff. The Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute here are not acting in their ordinary capacity, and are both equally available as a Court of first instance.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I entirely agree with your Lordship. I think that the Sheriff has refused the appeal on perfectly right grounds; and that he has stated correctly the distinction between Acts of Parliament conferring an exclusive jurisdiction on the Sheriff, to be exercised either by the Sheriff-depute or the Sheriff-substitute, and those which give a new jurisdiction to the Sheriff Court to be explicated according to the ordinary course of procedure.

the Sheriff has done so under the mistaken impression that an appeal to him was competent. He can intervene so long as no final decision has been pronounced. But all these cases agree in this, that only one decision in the Sheriff Court is contemplated. A recent case was decided by the First Division under section 57 of the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, affirming a judgment by which I held that an appeal to the Sheriff was incompetent. The clause of finality was in similar terms to those of section 32 above quoted, and I cannot distinguish between the two cases. The case which was mentioned during the debate (and Mr Duncan, the agent of one of the parties in this case, was engaged in it) is not reported. The name was, I think, Aberdeen District Council v. Milne, and the year 1901.

"I have thought it desirable to refer to some of the cases in which a similar question has been mooted, and which seemed to me valuable as illustrating the present case. But as I have said, each statute must be interpreted by its own terms. In the case of Fulton we have what almost amounts to a direct precedent, and even without the help of that case I should have come to a clear conclusion that I have no jurisdiction to entertain this appeal."

* Between the date on which the petition was presented and the date on which the appeal was taken to the Sheriff, the Parish Council of Strichen was re-elected. The majority of the new Parish Council was opposed to the petition, and joined with Mr Goodwillie in maintaining the appeal and moving that the petition be refused. The petition was supported and the competency of the appeal objected to by John Sleigh and others, ratepayers, who compared and were sisted as parties to the action.

No. 121.

 Maclean v.
 Maclean's
 Executrix.

ALEXANDER MACLEAN, Pursuer (Respondent).—MacRobert.
 FLORA MACLEAN (Mrs Maclean's Executrix), Defender (Reclaimer).—Chree.

Succession—Legacy—Specific or General—Ademption.—By a general disposition and settlement a testatrix bequeathed her whole estate to her daughter F., "with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son A. has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself." At the date of the settlement A. had in his possession a sum of £300 belonging to his mother on which he paid interest to her. This sum he subsequently repaid to her before her death.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that the legacy to A. was a specific legacy of a sum of £300 in his hands at the date of the settlement, and that as there was no sum in his hands at the death of the testatrix the legacy must be held to have been adeemed.

2D DIVISION.
 Lord Mac-
 kenzie.

ALEXANDER MACLEAN, wine and spirit merchant, Glasgow, brought an action against Miss Flora Maclean, Ardgay, Ross-shire, executrix-nominate of the deceased Mrs Flora M'Leod or Maclean, Ardgay, as such executrix and as an individual, in which he concluded, inter alia, for payment of £300 as the amount of a legacy bequeathed to him by Mrs Maclean.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(5) Said legacy of £300 having been adeemed, the defender is entitled to absolvitor from the conclusion for payment thereof.

The parties renounced probation as regards all matters bearing on the defender's fifth plea in law.

The facts as appearing from the documents produced and the averments of parties were as follows:—The pursuer and defender were brother and sister. The deceased Mrs Flora M'Leod or Maclean was their mother. She died on 31st July 1901 leaving a general disposition and settlement dated 13th June 1898, by which she provided, inter alia:—"I, . . . do hereby appoint my daughter Flora Maclean to be my sole executrix; and I give and dispose to the said Flora Maclean my whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, with the exception of Three hundred pounds stg. of mine which my son Alick has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself. . . ."

At the date of the settlement the pursuer had in his hands a sum of £300 belonging to his mother, on which he paid interest to her. In 1901, before his mother's death, the pursuer wrote a letter dated "Friday, 1901," in which he said:—"If mother is strong enough, Flo, please tell her that I don't want to have this £300, as I am not in need of it, and don't want people to think I am in debt to you or mother, and to oblige me tell Mr M'Callum to alter the will and allow me to return this £300, and since you are to be trustee, Flo, I wish to be straight. I won't take one cent, and I only kept this cash safe for you and mother, and it will do fine in the bank for you. . . ."

Thereafter, on 7th March 1901, before the death of his mother, the pursuer repaid to her the sum of £300 belonging to her which he had had in his hands.

On 6th July 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the . . . 5th plea in law for the defender . . . finds that the legacy of £300 bequeathed to the pursuer under the will of the said Mrs Flora M'Leod or Maclean, dated 13th June 1898, has not been adeemed . . . Grants leave to reclaim." *

The defender reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 16th May 1908.

Maclean v.
Maclean's
Executrix.

Argued for the defender and reclaimer;—This was a specific bequest. The subject of it had ceased to exist at the date of the testatrix's death, for at that date there was no longer any sum in the pursuer's hands. The bequest had consequently been adeemed.¹

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—This was a general and not a specific legacy.² It was a legacy of a sum of money. The reference to the investment of it was demonstrative merely, and not taxative. In the case of a bequest of a sum of money the presumption was that a reference to the investment of it was demonstrative merely.³ If the legacy was general, then the sum bequeathed was payable out of the general estate. The cases cited for the reclaimer were distinguishable. They related to bequests of sums due under some particular document—bond, bill, deposit-receipt, or policy.

At advising on 23d May 1908,—

LORD LOW.—The first question in this case appears to me to be whether the legacy of £300 left to the pursuer by his mother was a special legacy. The Lord Ordinary has answered that question in the negative, holding that "the expression of the bequest points rather to the amount of the fund than to the designation of it as a specific corpus." I confess that I am unable so to read the bequest. The testatrix left to her daughter her whole means and estate "with the exception of £300 sterling of mine which my son Alick has invested for me, and which I do hereby leave and bequeath to himself." The parties have renounced probation, but it appears from the pleadings that they are agreed that at the date of the will the pursuer had in his hands £300 belonging to his mother, which he subsequently repaid to her.

The pursuer's argument was that the words "which my son Alick has

* "OPINION.— . . . The first question is whether the legacy of £300 was a special legacy. Unless it is held to be a special legacy the question of ademption does not arise. In my opinion the expression of the bequest points rather to the amount of the fund than to the designation of it as a specific corpus. In such a case the legacy is general, to be made good out of the general fund though the money should have been uplifted—Bell's Prin., sec. 1886. None of the cases cited by the counsel for the defender were like the present. In all of them there was either a specific subject or, in the case of money, a particular bond, bill, deposit-receipt, or insurance policy. Here the bequest is of money, which at the time happened to be in the pursuer's hands, but which he subsequently handed back. That, I think, is different from the case of a specific investment. I am accordingly of opinion that the defender's 5th plea in law should be repelled, and that there should be a finding that the legacy has not been adeemed."

May 23 1908. invested for me," are to be regarded as being no more than a statement of the reason which led the testatrix to fix the amount of the legacy at £300. That argument is ingenious, but I do not think that it is in accordance with the natural meaning of the language used. No doubt the fact that the pursuer had £300 of his mother's money in his hands when she made her will was the reason why she bequeathed that sum to him, but the bequest was of the very sum which he had in his hands, and no other. It cannot be assumed that if the pursuer had not had the £300 in his hands his mother would have left him a legacy of that amount, or of any amount.

Maclean v.
Maclean's
Executrix.
Lord Low.

Now, of course, a will speaks at the date of the testator's death, and the question comes to be whether at Mrs Maclean's death there was any sum of £300 answering the description in the will? Plainly there was not, and accordingly I am of opinion that the pursuer's claim to the legacy cannot be sustained.

LORD ARDWALL.—The only question argued in the debate on this reclaiming note is whether the legacy of £300 bequeathed to the pursuer under the will of Mrs Flora M'Leod or Maclean, dated 13th June 1898, has or has not been adeemed. In this case it is not the facts constituting ademption, and the legal effect of these, that are in dispute so much as the question whether this legacy was or was not susceptible of ademption, and the solution of this question depends on the further question, viz., whether or not the legacy was a general or a special legacy.

I am of opinion that the legacy was a special legacy of a specific sum of money. The parties have renounced probation, and I think it unfortunate that they have not adjusted a minute of admissions of facts which must be known to both of them, and which could not admit of dispute, the admission of which would have tended to simplify the discussion and the determination of the case. From the words of the deed itself, in so far as they designate the subject of the bequest, neither party takes much benefit. On the one hand it tells in favour of the defender's contention that the sum bequeathed is excepted altogether from the universitas of the testatrix's estate disposed to Miss Maclean. For the pursuer, again, it may be urged that the description, "which my son Alick has invested for me," seems to point to this, that the testatrix regarded the £300 as simply a portion of her estate which had been invested on her behalf and in her name by her son, the legatee. But the question whether a legacy is a legacy of a specific sum or not is one of fact, and on the record as it stands the facts appear to be as follows: At the date of Mrs Maclean's settlement a sum of £300 belonging to her was in the hands of her son, the pursuer. The income of this sum was then being paid by the pursuer to his mother. It is an inference in fact from the statements of parties, and the terms of the letter, dated "Friday 1901," that the pursuer had not invested this sum in his mother's name, but either invested it in his own name or made use of it in his business. But this fact is clear, that it was a sum which was in the pursuer's hands at the date of the will and which he was bound to account for and pay to his mother if requested to do so. It was thus a sum due by the pursuer to his mother, and thus constituted a debt due by him to her. Accordingly on 7th March 1901 the pursuer paid to his mother the said sum of £300, apparently in cash or its equivalent, and not by transferring shares May 23, 1908. or other investments to her.

On these facts I am of opinion that the legacy was the bequest of the specific sum of £300 due to the testatrix by her son at the date of the execution of her will. This being so, the subject of the bequest ceased to exist by the payment of the £300 to the testatrix and the merging of it in her general estate. Then at the death of the testatrix, the subject of the bequest being no longer in existence, the legacy must be held to have suffered ademption.

*Maclean v.
Executrix.*

Lord Ardwall.

The question as to whether a legacy has been adeemed or not is purely one of fact. This has been settled in a variety of cases both in Scotland and England, several of which were cited to us at the debate. They are reviewed in Lord Ormisdale's judgment in the case of Anderson v. Thomson,¹ who, in referring to the judgment of Lord Thurlow in the cases of Ashburner v. M'Guire,² and Stanley v. Potter,³ says that it is firmly established in England "that the test of ademption is whether the specific thing bequeathed by a testator continued to exist at his death, or had been converted into something else, and this independently altogether of the animus adimendi, a consideration which has been discarded on the ground that it is calculated to create confusion and uncertainty," and he thereafter points out that there are Scotch cases to the same effect.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, in so far as it finds "that the legacy of £300 bequeathed to the pursuer under the will of the said Mrs Flora M'Leod or Maclean, dated 13th June 1898, has not been adeemed," ought to be recalled, and that the Court should find that said legacy has been adeemed, and remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed therewith.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concur.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the . . . interlocutor reclaimed against, in so far as it repels the fifth plea in law for the defender, and also in so far as it finds that the legacy of £300 bequeathed to the pursuer under the will of Mrs Flora M'Leod or Maclean, dated 13th June 1898, has not been adeemed: Sustain the said fifth plea in law for the defender, and find that the said legacy has been adeemed. . . ."

Vallery v. M'Alpine & Sons, 1905, 7 F. 640, followed.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Guthrie.

HENRY CASS, insurance manager, Edinburgh, as tutor and administrator-in-law for his pupil son William Henry Duncan Cass, brought an action against the Edinburgh and District Tramways Company, Limited, in which he concluded for payment of £2500 as damages for personal injuries sustained by his said son, through being run over by a cable car belonging to the defenders.

The pursuer averred that about four o'clock on the afternoon of 16th November 1907, when it was broad daylight, his son, who was four years and eight months old at that date, was returning from Inverleith Terrace, where he had gone to buy nuts, and was in the act of walking across Inverleith Row to reach his father's house in Eildon Street, when he was suddenly knocked down and run over by one of the defenders' cable cars, which was running along Inverleith Row from the south towards Goldenacre, and sustained serious injuries through the wheel or wheels of the car going over his legs; that no bell was rung or other warning given of the approach of the car, and the pursuer's son did not and could not hear it approaching because of a strong head wind which was at the time blowing against it, and because, the day in question being damp, the rails were greasy, and the car made less noise than usual; that the "accident was caused through the fault of the defenders or of their servant the driver of said car," for whom they were responsible; that the stair leading to the roof of said car was built on a dangerous and obsolete system; "it starts from the left front of the platform, and in gradually rising to the level of the top of the car it passes obliquely in front of the driver of the car in such a manner as to completely obscure his vision to the front and left front of the direction in which the car is travelling. Further, the said car . . . was provided with a guard in front, which is intended to prevent any obstruction which may be encountered by the car on the street from passing under the car or its wheels. The guard on the car was quite out of date and ineffective for that purpose, for it allowed the boy's legs to pass freely underneath it, and so allowed the wheels to pass over them. Or otherwise, if it was at all possible for the driver to see what was in front or to his left front, he negligently and culpably failed to keep a proper lookout when the car was travelling. . . . As it was the driver did not and could not see the boy, or know that he was there, till the car was upon him. . . . The said accident was thus due either to the faulty and dangerous construction of said car, . . . or to the culpable failure of the driver to keep a good look-out and warn foot-passengers crossing the street of the approach of his car. . . . Further, the regulations and bye-laws of the Board of Trade relating to defenders' tramways provide that every car shall be so constructed as to enable the driver to command the fullest possible view of the road, and also that every car shall be fitted with a suitable lifeguard. May 23, 1908.

 . . . The said car was so constructed as to prevent the driver from commanding the fullest possible view of the road, and was not fitted with a suitable lifeguard; and defenders, in continuing to use said car as presently constructed, acted knowingly or negligently in violation of said regulations.”

Cass v.
 Edinburgh
 and District Tramways
 Co., Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer's averments being irrelevant and insufficient to support his pleas, the action should be dismissed. (3) The pursuer's son's injuries having been caused or materially contributed to by either (a) his own fault, or (b) the fault of his parents, decree of absolvitor should be pronounced.

The pursuer proposed an issue for the trial of the cause by jury.

On 6th March 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard counsel on the proposed issue for the pursuer, and considered the question as to the mode of proof to be allowed in this cause, finds that the cause is more suitable to be disposed of by way of proof before his Lordship than by jury; Therefore disallows the issue; repels the defenders' first plea in law; allows to the parties a proof of their averments on record.”*

* “OPINION.—The pursuer's case is alternative. Either the car, which knocked down and ran over his pupil son, was so badly constructed that the driver could not have seen the child, so as to avoid knocking him down and running him over, or, if these averments are unfounded, then the accident was due to the driver's failure to keep a proper look-out. I do not think the pursuer is entitled so to state his case. The faulty condition of the car was of a permanent nature; and the identical car, according to him, is still running unaltered, as well as seven others of the same construction. His experts must know whether it is the fact, as alleged by him, that the stair of the car is so constructed ‘as to completely obscure his (the driver's) vision to the front and left front of the direction in which the car is travelling,’ and that ‘the driver did not and could not see the boy, or know that he was there, till the car was upon him.’ If permission to examine and test the car was refused, the pursuer could have got an order. The right to state alternative cases must be subject to some limitation. Obviously a pursuer would not be entitled to say, in the case of an existing and unaltered carriage, that it had no brake, or, if it had a brake, it was not applied. For the same reason, namely, that the alternatives are mutually inconsistent, I hold the pursuer to his primary averment of bad construction of the car, completely obscuring the driver's vision to his front and left front, so that he did not and could not see the boy, or know that he was there, till the car was upon him. If that averment is well founded, the accident could not have any connection with want of proper look-out on the driver's part, and the case made on record against the defenders, as being responsible for the driver's want of look-out, is irrelevant on the pursuer's averments.

“In the absence of any specialty, the result would be to send the case to jury trial, on the question of the faulty construction of the car. But the defenders maintain that, on the pursuer's averments, properly construed, it is clear that the proximate cause of the accident was, first, the action of the parents in allowing so young a child to go about unattended, and second, the action of the child in stepping in front of a moving car. They found on the averment in cond. 2 to the effect that the child, going unattended, after walking some distance along the pavement on the west side of Inverleith Row, left the pavement and was ‘in the act of walking across Inverleith Row,’ when he was knocked down by a car travelling northwards, but not at excessive speed, on the westmost pair of rails. As stated in cond. 2 the

Argued for the pursuer and reclaimer;—This was an action of damages for personal injuries. It was, therefore, one of the class of causes enumerated as appropriate for jury trial both under the original enumeration in section 28 of the Court of Session Act, 1825,¹ and under the more restricted enumeration in section 49 of the Court of Session Act, 1850.² In the case of such an action the pursuer had a right to jury trial unless special cause was shewn to the contrary.³ Here no such special cause was shewn. Special cause meant exceptional grounds.⁴ There was nothing special, or exceptional, or complicated about this case. The averments were not alternative in the sense of being mutually exclusive. The pursuer did not plead the Board of Trade Regulations. He founded upon them merely as strengthening and emphasising his case at common law. There was no question as to the interpretation of bye-laws. Contributory negligence was a question of fact. The existence of a question as to contributory negligence did not constitute special cause even where it arose with regard to a child or its parents.⁵ Nor was the fact that expert evidence would be required a sufficient ground for refusing to send the case to a jury, where, as here, there was nothing specially complicated. Actions laid alternatively at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, were usually sent to a jury although legal complications were involved.⁶ The fact that a question of law, or even a difficult question of law, was involved, was not special cause shewn for sending the case to proof instead of jury trial.⁷

averments, so far as any explanation is given of the conduct of the child, resemble the facts as they came out in the case of Fraser v. Edinburgh Tramways Co., 10 R. 264. But the pursuer explains that the child did not walk straight across, but was going in a slanting direction, the result being that the car was coming up behind him, so that he could not see the car, nor could he hear it, through the strong north wind, and the noiseless running of the car produced by the greasiness of the rails. The pursuer, who declined to amend, thus seems to me to table a case of such doubtful relevancy that, although with his counsel's explanation I am not prepared to throw it out, I think it ought to be sent to proof and not to jury trial. The reason for sending the case to proof is strengthened by these circumstances—first, the delicate nature of all questions of contributory negligence in the case of children; second, the effect of the Board of Trade regulations relied on by the pursuer, if they go beyond a mere statement of the defenders' common law liability; and third, because the question of the proper construction of cars, depending as it does on expert evidence, is better fitted for trial before a Judge than for jury trial."

of law and not of fact. In the case of *Cooke v. Leith Harbour and Dock Commissioners*² there was a cumulation of grounds for sending the case to proof.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—The Lord Ordinary had a discretion as to the mode of trial, and the Court would not interfere with what he had done in the exercise of that discretion.³ This rule applied in the case of an action of damages for personal injuries.⁴ But apart from that the Lord Ordinary was right. This was an action of doubtful relevancy in respect both of the nature of the allegations of fault and of the question as to contributory negligence on the part of the child or its parents which was raised by the pursuer's own averments.⁵ The contributory negligence of the parent might be imputed to the child.⁶ [LORD LOW.—The case cited was not at the instance of the child but of the parent.] Doubtful relevancy was a sufficient special cause for refusing to send a case to a jury.⁷ [LORD ARDWALL referred to Govan v. J. & W. McKillop.⁸] The case of *M'Intosh v. Commissioners of Lochgelly*⁹ had not been followed in practice. The case of *Edinburgh Railway Access and Property Company v. John Ritchie & Company*¹⁰ was an example of the rule that the Court would not interfere with what the Lord Ordinary had decided as to the mode of trial.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I concede that this case as being “properly and in substance an action of damages” is prima facie one for jury trial, and that special cause requires to be shewn before any other course can be followed. But the Lord Ordinary has applied his mind to the question of how the case should be tried, and he has decided that the mode of inquiry should be by a proof before himself, the date of which he has fixed. Now, I think we should do wrong to interfere with that which I think is in reality the exercise of a discretion. It may be said with some force that it is not the exercise of a discretion, and that the Lord Ordinary is practically bound to allow a jury trial unless he can shew something which is clearly a special cause; but in the case of Vallery v. M'Alpine,⁴ it was held by Lord Pearson, and approved by this Division of the Court that doubtful relevancy is a sufficient “special cause”; and accordingly, when the case came here, I find

I do not say that there might not be cases in which the Court would interfere, but it would require to be on very strong grounds.”

Case v.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

A similar course was followed in the other Division in the case of Jack v. Rivet, Bolt, and Nut Company, Limited,¹ and therefore I think we should not interfere with the discretion which the Lord Ordinary has exercised after a very full and careful consideration of the whole matter. This is a case, I think, of doubtful relevancy, both because there are two alternative grounds of liability averred, and because there is a question as to the application of the law of contributory negligence in the case of a child. That is always a matter of some delicacy; and on the whole matter I am of opinion that the interests of justice will be better served by following the course of the Lord Ordinary's judgment than by sending the case to a jury.

LORD LOW.—I have felt this case to be attended with great difficulty. I confess that if I had been sitting here as a Judge of first instance I should have been disposed, after the argument which we have heard, to allow an issue. But, very properly I think, the Inner-House has always been slow to disturb the conclusion arrived at by the Lord Ordinary on a question of this sort, which, after all, is really a question of procedure, and I quite recognise that there is a great deal to be said for the view that a right result is more likely to be reached in this case if it be tried by way of proof and not by a jury.

Accordingly I agree that we should not disturb the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT adhered, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary.

George v.
Glasgow Coal
Co., Limited.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1 (2) (c)—Serious and Wilful Misconduct—Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), secs. 51 and 52—Breach of Special Rule.—By the Additional Special Rules in force in a coal mine, under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1887, it was provided, Rule 3:—“ The bottomer at a mid-working in a vertical shaft . . . shall not open the gate fencing the shaft until the cage is stopped at such mid-working.”

A bottomer at a mid-working in that mine, who required a cage, signalled for a cage at the bottom of the shaft to be sent to the mid-working. He did so by the ordinary method in use in that mine, viz., by calling to the bottomer at the foot of the shaft, who thereupon signalled to the engineman at the surface to draw up the cage. On receiving such a signal the engineman usually stopped the cage in the course of its ascent at the mid-working, but was not bound to do so, and did not invariably do so. On the signal to raise the cage being given the bottomer opened the gate, and, without ascertaining whether the cage had really stopped, went behind a hutch to push it into the cage, but the cage on the occasion in question had not been stopped at the mid-working, and the hutch fell to the foot of the shaft, drawing the bottomer with it, whereby he was injured, but not seriously and permanently disabled.

May 27, 1908.

George v.
Glasgow Coal
Co., Limited.

In an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the arbitrator found that the injuries were attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of the workman, and assolized the defenders. In an appeal, held that the facts found proved were sufficient to entitle the arbitrator to arrive at that conclusion, and appeal dismissed.

JOHN GEORGE, bottomer, Wishaw, having claimed compensation for personal injuries from his employers, the Glasgow Coal Company, Limited, mineowners, Carmyle, the matter was referred to the arbitration of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, at Airdrie (Glegg), who assolized the defenders, and, at the request of the claimant, stated a case for appeal.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The case set forth,—“The following facts were proved:—(1) John George, aged twenty-one, was a bottomer in the employment of the Glasgow Coal Company prior to 22d August 1907. . . . (2) George's working place was at the ell coal seam bottom, which is a mid-working, and is situated 40 feet above the main coal bottom. (3) His duties were to take off empty hutches from the cage, and to put on full hutches. (4) There is no light at the ell coal except that supplied by miners' lamps. (5) Where the ell coal opens from the shaft there is no gate or fence which protects the opening automatically when the cage is not opposite the opening, but there is a gate which is opened and shut by the bottomer as required. (6) According to the customary working of the cage it stopped at the ell coal without a special signal when ascending empty from the main coal bottom, the engineman usually being able to tell from the pull on his engine when the cage was empty. (7) It was restarted on its ascent from the ell coal by a signal given from there. (8) The bottomer at the ell coal could also obtain the cage by signalling by bell when the cage was passing or had passed the ell coal, when it was stopped and sent back to the ell coal. (9) If the bottomer at the ell coal required a cage, and it was not obtainable at the time in the way last mentioned, he called down the shaft to the main coal bottomer who signalled to the engineman to raise the cage, when it would be stopped at the ell coal, either with or without a farther signal as above described. (10) The engineman, however, on receiving a signal from the main coal bottomer to raise the cage, was entitled, unless stopped by a farther signal, to raise the cage to the pithead, and sometimes he did so without stopping at the ell coal. (11) . . . (12) On the occasion in question George called to the bottomer at the main coal to send up the cage, and the latter did so, George hearing the signal given for raising; the time required to raise the cage from the main to the ell coal was a little over two seconds. (13) George expected that the cage would stop at the ell coal level, without any further signal being given, and acting on this assumption he, without ascertaining whether it had stopped, opened the gate, went some three

May 27, 1908. yards along the level behind a full hutch and pushed the hutch forward to the shaft. (14) The cage had passed the ell coal level without stopping, and George pushed the hutch into the shaft and fell with it to the bottom. (15) He sustained a severe scalp wound and had his right tibia and fibula fractured. . . . (19) At present George is still suffering from the effects of his injury to his leg to such an extent as to be totally incapacitated for work. (20) The ell coal level is a working to which Rule No. 3 of the Additional Special Rules under the Coal Mines Regulations Acts, 1887 to 1896, applies.* (21) George previously opened the gate fencing the shaft when the cage had not stopped, and he had been warned about this a day or two prior to the accident. On these facts I found that George had not been seriously and permanently disabled in consequence of his accident,† and that his injuries were attributable to his serious and wilful misconduct. I therefore assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

George v.
Glasgow Coal
Co., Limited.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Is the applicant, in view of the above findings, barred from recovering compensation for his injury in respect that it is attributable to his serious and wilful misconduct?"

The appeal was heard before the First Division on 27th May 1908.

Argued for the claimant and appellant;—The facts proved here did not justify a finding of serious and wilful misconduct. The real cause of the accident was, not the fault of the workman, but the fault of the respondents in not having a proper system of communication established in the mine, as they were required to have by section 29, Rule 25, of the Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1887.¹ The bottomer had to work with this defective system, and he naturally assumed, as he was entitled to assume, that the cage would stop, as it habitually did, at the mid-working. The factor of wilfulness was entirely absent here, for the workman never intended to push the hutch into the open shaft. He had duly signalled for the cage, and his further acts were done from a mistaken belief, the mistaken belief that the cage had stopped. The case was therefore clearly distinguished from M'Ghie,² where the workman had never even signalled. What had happened here might be negligence, but negligence without the element of wilfulness was not sufficient to set up the statutory exclusion.³ Even if in some circumstances negligence might amount to wilful misconduct there were no such circumstances here. This was clearly a case of one of the exceptions referred to by Lord M'Laren in the case of

* Rule No. 3 was as follows:—"The bottomer at a mid-working in a vertical shaft not provided with an appliance which constantly fences the shaft, being a mid-working in use for the regular passage of workers or the drawing of minerals from the mine, shall not open the gate fencing the shaft until the cage is stopped at such mid-working, and he shall not signal the cage away until he has closed the gate, and shall not permit any other person to open the gate while he is on duty."

† The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 1 (2) (c), enacts:—"If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of that workman any compensation claimed in respect of that injury shall, unless the injury results in death or serious and permanent disablement, be disallowed."

to serious and wilful misconduct. Further, the duty here was not so paramount as in Dobson,¹ for there the rule was for the protection of George v.
all in the mine, while here it was chiefly for the protection of the Glasgow Coal individual workman. Co., Limited.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

LORD M'LAREN.—In deciding this case it is proper to refer to the variation in the law introduced by the Act of 1906, which provides that the objection of serious and wilful misconduct does not apply where death or serious and permanent disablement results from the accident, but still continues to apply in the case of lesser injuries. But whilst this provision limits the scope of this objection, it does not alter the nature of serious and wilful misconduct as it has been decided under the Act of 1897. There have been many cases in England dealing with this question, and the last was the case of Bist v. The London and South-Western Railway Company.² In that case the noble and learned Judges were agreed in stating that the question which they had to consider on appeal was whether the facts amounted to evidence that raised the question of serious and wilful misconduct for the decision of the County Court Judge who had heard the case. They do not give their own opinions as to whether the facts amounted to serious and wilful misconduct, but they think that the breach of a rule made by a railway company, and intended for the protection of their servants from injury, was prima facie a serious and wilful act, and that it was for the person who had broken the rule to displace the presumption. That, I think, is also the principle of the decision of this Court in the case of Dobson v. United Collieries, Limited,¹ and in that case the Lord President said that the infraction of a colliery rule, intended for the protection of life and property, was prima facie serious and wilful misconduct unless it was explained. Other Judges gave their opinions to the same effect.

Now, the present case is the case of a breach of a colliery rule, and the rule referred to is the third supplementary rule, which provides—I do not read the whole of it—that the bottomer shall not open the gate until the cage is stopped at the mid-working. In this case I do not think it is necessary to comment upon all the findings with reference to the practice existing in this mine regarding signalling for sending the cage up or down. But it results from all these findings that means existed by which the injured man, John George, who was a bottomer in the mid-working, could communicate with the engineman and desire that the cage should be stopped at the mid-working. On the occasion in question he wished the cage sent up because he had some loaded hutches which were to be sent to the surface. He did communicate in a manner which is not said to be inconsistent with the rules. I think he called down the shaft, and his communication was heard by the bottomer and signalled to the engineman, and the cage was sent up. Now, it results also from the Sheriff's findings that the engineman on getting such a message might, without any breach of duty,

George v. Glasgow Coal Co., Limited.
Lord M'Laren. Under these conditions it is quite plain that when a signal has been given by the person in charge of the gate at the mid-working to send up the cage, it is not a matter of absolute certainty that the cage will stop there. I have no doubt that in nine cases out of ten it will. But, then, rules are just made for the purpose of guarding against exceptional occurrences or mistakes. And this rule, if observed, was certainly a very effective way of preventing such an accident as occurred, because it provides that the bot-tomer shall not open the gate until the cage is there. Of course, if he had complied with the rule, it is conceivable that in a certain case the cage might start again without waiting for the hutchies, and, if an accident occurred, the man at the gate, of course, would not be responsible. But that was not the case here. The case was that the cage had passed him, and that he opened the gate without ascertaining whether the cage was standing there. Then, just assuming that the cage was there, he went back and pushed the loaded hutchies over into the shaft, and, being drawn over with them, fell and received the injuries from which he is suffering.

In these circumstances, if we apply the criterion of the decision of the highest Court, and consider whether there was evidence upon which the Sheriff as arbitrator could find that the accident was due to serious and wilful misconduct, I may say that in my opinion there was such evidence. It is not necessary that we should say how we would have decided the case. Indeed, we could not give a personal opinion upon it without having the evidence before us, because in a question of misconduct, and above all whether that misconduct is of such quality and degree as to fulfil the condition of being regarded as serious and wilful, it is impossible to proceed upon a dry statement of facts such as we have before us. We should need to know what George said on the subject when he was examined, and what sort of excuse he attempted to make for his action, before we could pronounce that he was excusable. I certainly do not feel that we have materials to decide that matter, and it is not at all necessary that we should, because we are only judges of law, and not judges of questions of fact. The materials before us are sufficient to satisfy me that there was a breach of the rule which, if unexplained in a manner consistent with innocence, would entitle the arbitrator to come to the conclusion which he has reached, and, therefore, my opinion is that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff has found that the injuries of which this man complains were attributable to his serious and wilful misconduct. That is a finding in fact, and we have no jurisdiction to review the Sheriff's judgment upon a mere question of fact. But it has been held, and I do not myself doubt, that the question whether the facts found by the Sheriff will support his decision as to the liability of the employers for compensation is within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal. But, then, I think, considering the statement that the Sheriff has given us here, there is no fault in point of law in his decision.

I concede that in order to bring the case within the statutory disability May 27, 1908. it is not enough to shew that a workman has been negligent, or that he has done something thoughtlessly that he ought not to have done. It is necessary to shew that the misconduct was wilful, which implies, in my opinion, that the thing was done, not by mere inadvertence, but with intention to do it. In this case the special rules of the mine laid upon the bot-
George v. Glasgow Coal Co., Limited.
Lord Kinnear.

Now, as to the element of wilfulness in that, I do not see that there can be any doubt upon the statement that what the man did was wilful. It is not suggested that the gate fell open by accident. He opened it on purpose, without performing the duty of ascertaining in the first place that the cage was stopped. I agree with the Sheriff that that justified a finding that there was a deliberate breach of the duty laid upon the man by the special rules of the mine. I think it was misconduct, and serious misconduct, because it was a breach of a rule intended for the safety of life and limb. The seriousness is obvious enough from the accident which followed, because he opened the gate and drove a hutch into the shaft so that the hutch and he following it fell down the shaft instead of entering the cage. The consequences to himself unfortunately are serious, and they might have been serious to others in the shaft below. But to the question whether it was or was not a wilful act in the sense of the statute the answer is plain. It was, because it was a deliberate breach of a rule which he knew, and which he ought to have observed.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree with your Lordships. I think that the facts found, and especially the facts contained in the 13th paragraph of the case, were amply sufficient to justify the learned Sheriff-substitute in reaching the conclusions that he did.

At the close of the advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—I may add that, if it is necessary that we should consider whether the Sheriff's finding is correct, I should agree with what Lord Kinnear has said. I think that the act of the man George was serious and wilful misconduct; but I think it is sufficient for me to say that there were materials from which the arbitrator could draw that conclusion.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT answered the question of law in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

THE REVEREND WILLIAM BORLAND AND OTHERS (Minister and Kirk-Session of Dunbar), Petitioners.—R. S. Horne.

May 29, 1908.

Kirk-Session of Dunbar.

Charitable Trust—Alteration of Scheme—Bursary for natives of a town—Extension to those born elsewhere—Nobile Officium.—A testator bequeathed a sum of money to trustees for the purpose of founding a bursary to be granted by them "to any deserving young man, being a native of Dunbar, attending college in the prospect of becoming a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, or as a missionary." The trustees received payment of the bequest in 1888. In 1907 they presented a petition in which they stated that, although full publicity had been given to the bursary by advertisement and by intimation in the local schools, no application for it had ever been made, and craved the Court to empower them, failing application from natives of Dunbar, to grant the bursary to otherwise qualified applicants born in the Presbytery of Dunbar, or failing such applicants to otherwise qualified applicants without conditions as to nativity.

The Court granted the petition.

By his trust-disposition and settlement the late James Simson, accountant, Edinburgh, directed his trustees, on the death of the life-rentrix of his estate, to pay the following legacy, viz.:—"To the Minister and Kirk-Session of the Parish Church of Dunbar the sum of Five hundred and sixty pounds sterling, which shall be laid out by them on heritable security at interest, and the annual rent or interest thereof applied as a bursary, to be called the 'Simson Bursary,' to be granted by said minister and kirk-session to any deserving young man, being a native of Dunbar, attending college in the prospect of becoming a minister of the Established Church of Scotland, or as a missionary going abroad, said bursary to be continued to each recipient for a period not exceeding three years. And I further declare, that it shall be in the power of said minister and kirk-session, if they shall see good cause, to withhold or withdraw the grant of said bursary to any young man that they may have selected, if his conduct does not meet their approbation." The life-rentrix died in 1888, when the kirk-session received payment of the bequest, the free annual income of which, available for the bursary, amounted to about £21.

On 20th November 1907 the minister and kirk-session of Dunbar presented a petition to the Court in which they set forth the above facts, and also stated:—"Full publicity has been given to the bursary for some years past. In particular, since 1901 it has been repeatedly intimated in the public schools of the parish, either by notice posted up on the walls thereof, or by the schoolmasters, who have informed their scholars of the bursary, and it has also been intimated in the local newspapers and in the calendars of all the Scottish Universities. No application for it, however, has ever been made."

They accordingly craved the Court to add to the existing terms of the scheme the following provisions, viz.:—"In the event of no applicant fully qualified in terms of the will claiming the bursary after due advertisement on or before the 1st day of September in any year, the Minister and Kirk-Session shall be empowered to grant the free income of that year, or any portion thereof, to any applicant born within the bounds of the Presbytery of Dunbar who shall in other respects fulfil the conditions of the testator's settlement, and, failing such an applicant, to any applicant of whom they may approve without condition as to nativity, so long as he is otherwise qualified in terms of the will; provided always that any grant of the bursary under these conditions shall be for one year only." They also stated that the Presbytery of Dunbar comprised nine parishes, viz., Belhaven (quoad sacra), Cockburnspath, Dunbar, Oldhamstocks, Prestonkirk, Spott, Stenton, Whitekirk, and Tynninghame and Whittinghame. May 29, 1908. Kirk-Session of Dunbar.

On 17th December 1907 the Court remitted to Lord Kinross, advocate, to inquire into the facts and circumstances and to report. In his report the reporter confirmed the statement of the petitioners as to the efforts made to obtain candidates, and the failure during the whole subsistence of the trust to receive a single application, and referred to the position of a similar bursary, The Clark Bursary, which was likewise confined to natives of Dunbar, for which, since its foundation in 1875 to the present time, no applicant had ever come forward. He also referred to the case of The Grigor Medical Bursary Fund Trustees,¹ where the Court refused the petition, and pointed to the distinction that, while in that case the only averment was that the trustees "experience difficulty" in obtaining candidates, here during the twenty years the trust had existed no candidate had ever come forward. He further stated:—"In view of the case of Mailler's Trustees v. Allan,² where the Court refused to extend the benefits of a bequest, destined to those born in two named counties, to persons born outside those counties, the reporter is doubtful whether an extension of the present scheme to those born within the wider area of the Presbytery of Dunbar can be said properly to fall within the expressed wishes of the testator."

On 26th May 1908 the Court, after hearing counsel for the petitioners, without delivering opinions, ordained the petitioners to lodge in process a copy of the scheme as proposed in the petition. The petitioners thereafter lodged a minute embodying the additional provisions craved for in the petition, as narrated supra, and on 29th May 1908 the Court pronounced this interlocutor:—

"APPROVE of said report and of the said scheme: Authorise and empower the petitioners to administer the bequest under their charge in accordance with the provisions contained in the scheme."

Bell v. Bell's Trustee.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Discharge—Failure to pay five shillings in the pound—Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 22), sec. 6, subsecs. (1) and (3).—Where a bankrupt has not paid 5s. in the £1, the question whether his failure to do so has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible is a question in the discretion of the Judge of first instance, and although his judgment is subject to review the Court will not interfere unless there are no reasonable grounds on which the judgment can be supported.

A bankrupt trader, more than two years after the date of his sequestration, applied for his discharge. Objections were lodged by the trustee in the sequestration and by the principal creditors of the bankrupt. The trustee

May 29, 1908. Bell v. Bell's Trustee. The trustee reported that the bankruptcy was caused by the culpable conduct of the bankrupt. It appeared that the bankrupt was a cattle-dealer; that his business had been throughout a period of twelve years a series of speculations in the market price of live stock; that his bank-book shewed a turn-over of £4000 a year; that at the end his liabilities were £1003 and his assets £156; that he had not kept proper business-books; and that he refused to assign to the trustee a spes successionis. No dividend was paid to the creditors, the assets recovered by the trustee, amounting to £156, having been lost by him in litigation.

The objecting creditors were a limited company, carrying on business as auctioneers and live-stock salesmen, the trustee was their secretary, and the bankrupt's operations had been carried on mainly at their auction mart. The Sheriff-substitute found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, but suspended the granting of the discharge for three months.

On appeal the Court (diss. Lord Ardwall) affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Perthshire.

ON 3d July 1905 the estates of John Wanliss Bell, sheep-dealer, Inveravon Bank, Perth, were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire, and William Finlayson, secretary to Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, Limited, auctioneers and live stock salesmen, Perth, was appointed trustee. Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, Limited, were the principal creditors in the sequestration.

In October 1907 the bankrupt presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire for his discharge.*

The report by the trustee under section 146 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, was produced with the petition.†

* The Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 22), enacts:—

Sec. 6. "Notwithstanding anything contained in the Bankruptcy Acts, the following provisions shall have effect with respect to bankrupts undischarged at the commencement of this Act, and to bankrupts whose estates may be thereafter sequestrated, that is to say—(1) A bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to be discharged of his debts, unless it is proved to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled:—(a) That a dividend or composition of not less than five shillings in the pound has been paid out of the estate of the bankrupt, or that security for payment thereof has been found to the satisfaction of the creditors; or (b) that the failure to pay five shillings in the pound, as aforesaid, has in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible. . . . (3) Any deliverance of the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff, as the case may be, under this section shall be subject to appeal in the manner provided in sections 171 and 170 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856: Provided always that the judgment of the Inner-House of the Court of Session on any such appeal shall be final and not subject to review. . . ."

† The report bore:—

"1. The bankrupt has made a fair discovery and surrender of his estate, except that he refuses to make available for his creditors,—(a) An estate belonging to him in expectancy, namely, his hope of succession on the death of his mother. . . .

"2. The bankrupt has attended the diets of examination.

"3. The bankrupt has not been guilty of any collusion so far as known to the trustee.

"4. The bankruptcy has arisen from culpable conduct on the part of the bankrupt. He carried on business from about the year 1894 as a dealer in live stock (chiefly sheep and cattle). His business appears to have been

On 22d October 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Sym) ordered intimation to be made to the creditors, and appointed a copy of the petition and of the trustee's report to be transmitted to the Accountant of Court in order that he might have an opportunity of reporting whether the bankrupt had fraudulently concealed any part of his estates, or whether he had wilfully failed to comply with any of the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856. May 29, 1908.
Bell v. Bell's
Trustee.

Notes of objections were lodged by the trustee and by Macdonald, Fraser, & Company.

On 5th November 1907 the Accountant of Court reported:—

"So far as regards the two points specified in the Sheriff's interlocutor, viz., 'fraudulent concealment,' and 'wilful failure to comply with any of the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' he has nothing unfavourable to submit.

"The trustee qualifies his report by a reference to the bankrupt's refusal to make available for his creditors (1) a spes successionis under a joint settlement of his parents, and (2) a portion of his salary as land steward or manager of a sheep farm."

On 19th December 1907 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the bankrupt's failure to pay a dividend of five shillings in the pound has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible: Therefore finds the bankrupt petitioner entitled to his discharge, but for the reasons stated in the subjoined note postpones the granting of the same till Friday, the 3d day of March 1908, at 2 P.M."*

throughout the twelve years a series of speculations in the fluctuations of market prices of such stock. He never at any time made up a balance-sheet, but his own story is that partly through the bad season of 1901 he was thenceforward embarrassed for money until he applied for sequestration in 1905. Yet he continued all the while to speculate as before.

"5. The bankrupt kept no proper business-books, and in particular no cash-book or account of money received and paid by him. When called upon to deliver his business-books to the trustee the bankrupt gave up as all he had three bank pass-books and three pocket diaries. The diary entries were not regular or complete, and ceased altogether in April 1904. He was then being pressed by his creditors more than before. His bank-book shews that his turnover was above £4000 a year. He said at his public examination that he had bought as much as £1000 worth of stock in one day. His liabilities at the date of sequestration according to his state of affairs amounted to £1003, 9s. 5d.

"6. No dividend or composition has been paid to the creditors. The assets, as stated by the bankrupt, were £142, 11s. 9d., but the gross sum recovered by the trustee was £156, 19s. 5d. This fund was lost in an endeavour by the trustee to recover the bankrupt's legitim from his father's testamentary trustee."†

* "NOTE.— . . . It is the duty of the Sheriff (Bremner, 2 F. 1114) to consider whether the failure to pay the creditors a dividend of 5s. per £1 is due to circumstances for which he is not responsible, even if the trustee give a not unfavourable report and the creditors do not oppose. A bankrupt is not entitled to his discharge on merely producing favourable reports.

"In this case the Sheriff's duty is increased. This trustee's report has unfavourable features. The Sheriff-substitute has thought it his duty to read carefully the report of the examination of the bankrupt, and to consider his conduct and the matters which have occurred since the sequestration.

Bell v. Bell's
Trustee.

The trustee and the objecting creditors appealed.

The case was heard before the Second Division on 22d February 1908.

Argued for the appellants;—The bankrupt was not entitled to his discharge unless he had paid 5s. in the £1, or had shewn that his failure to do so was due to circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible. The onus lay on the bankrupt to shew that he was not responsible for his failure to pay 5s. in the £1.¹ In the present case that onus had not been discharged. The bankrupt had indulged in a course of reckless speculation for a period of twelve years. During that time he had kept no business-books, and had thus been guilty of an offence for which he might have been prosecuted.² At the present time he was in possession of an asset which he refused to make available to his creditors. On these facts it could

“(1) The Sheriff-substitute takes first the matter of alleged reckless trading. The dealings of the bankrupt were chiefly in sheep, but also in cattle. They were at times considerable in amount. The great bulk of them was conducted at the mart of the objecting creditors. Now, this kind of business is often speculative, and when it is so it often consists very much in buying at a mart merely to speculate on the ‘turn of the market.’ The stock is bought to be immediately resold if the market rises, and often such a dealer knows that he cannot keep the stock and must sell at a loss even if the market falls. If there is a course of dealing of this kind to which in the circumstances rashness and improvidence causing loss to others must be attributed, then the Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the person so acting ought not lightly to be freed of his debts. In this case he is not of opinion that by any means all the bankrupt’s dealings were merely speculative and to be disapproved. It is true that the bankrupt admits that he was somewhat ‘hard hit’ in 1901, which was a bad season for the grazing trade, and it is true that he went on till 1905. But it is thought that on the whole his action does not deserve that he be kept in the status of an undischarged bankrupt for an indefinite time. The view taken is that, while there is always risk in such dealings, because the sheep market fluctuates according to weather and many trade causes (which are out of the power of these graziers to shelter themselves from, if they are doing business at all), the bankrupt did not act so rashly and unreasonably as to justify severe censure; on the contrary, that part of his dealing was wholesome, and would not have been discouraged by the objecting creditors.

“(2) Along with the matter just mentioned must be taken the fact that records of transactions kept by the bankrupt were at the very best most scanty and imperfect. It is not an answer to this to say that most of his transactions could be discovered in the books of Macdonald, Fraser, & Company, and so that the defects in his bank-books and little memorandum-books could be filled up. It is one’s own business to be able to give an account of one’s own affairs. The Sheriff-substitute does not leave out of view that the bank-book entries cease to give any aid after a date some time before the application for sequestration, and that no memorandum-book could be produced after 1904.

“Taking these two matters together the Sheriff-substitute does not consider that the discharge should be refused, but at most that it may for a brief time be suspended. . . .”

not be said the failure to pay 5s. in the £1 had arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt was not responsible. In any view, if the bankrupt were to be discharged it should only be on condition that he assigned his spes successionis to the trustee for behoof of his creditors.¹

May 29, 1908.
Bell v. Bell's
Trustee.

Argued for the petitioner;—The Sheriff was right. There was no good reason for refusing the discharge. The failure to keep books, while it might render the bankrupt liable to a statutory penalty,² was not relevant to the question of discharge. There was no evidence that the failure to keep books had brought the bankrupt down, or had resulted in a decrease of the assets. There was no case where discharge had been refused because proper books had not been kept. This was not a case of reckless speculation, but of legitimate trading. Although the bankrupt's turnover was £4000 a year, his total liabilities were only £1000. While the trustee's report was to a certain extent adverse to the petitioner, it did not reflect on his conduct as a bankrupt, and it must be remembered that the trustee could not be regarded as disinterested, he being the secretary of the principal creditors. The Sheriff-substitute had come to a conclusion favourable to the bankrupt, and his judgment should not be disturbed. There was no good reason for imposing the condition that the bankrupt should assign his spes successionis. There was no case where that course had been taken.³ The refusal to assign the spes was not a good ground for withholding the discharge. All the competent objections to the discharge were to be found in the Bankruptcy Statutes,⁴ and refusal to assign a spes successionis was not one of them.

At advising on 29th May 1908,—

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The discharge of a bankrupt is now regulated by section 6 of the Bankruptcy and Cessio (Scotland) Act, 1881, which provides that “a bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to be discharged of his debts unless it is proved to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled,” and the conditions are defined thus: (a) that a dividend or composition of not less than 5s. in the £1 has been paid, or security for it has been found; or (b) “that the failure to pay 5s. in the £1 as aforesaid has, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible.”

In this case no dividend has in fact been paid, and the onus of proving that the circumstances are not such as to render the bankrupt justly responsible for not paying 5s. in the £1 must lie on the bankrupt himself. But the puzzle remains, who is to be satisfied? Is it to be the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, whose opinion, as the case may be, seems to be made decisive

May 29, 1908. by the terms of subsection (b), or is it to be the Inner-House in either Division, to whom an appeal is allowed, and whose judgment is made final and non-appealable by the terms of subsection (3)? That is a real puzzle, which I think must be solved in some such way as that adopted by Lord President Inglis in the case of Millar.¹ There his Lordship had to deal with a somewhat similar difficulty created by the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1860. The third section of that statute made a change in the former law under which, if no opposition was raised on the part of creditors, the Court was bound to grant a discharge to the bankrupt. The change made rendered it no longer obligatory to grant the discharge, and the Act effected its object by giving a discretion to the Sheriff or the Lord Ordinary or the Court to refuse the discharge even though there was no opposition offered by creditors, "if it shall appear from the report of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, or other sufficient evidence, that the bankrupt has fraudulently concealed any part of his estate or effects, or has wilfully failed to comply with any of the provisions of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856." Now, it was with reference to this change in the law—which, be it observed, gives a discretion equally to the Sheriff or the Lord Ordinary in the first place, and to the Court in either Division in the second—that the Lord President used these expressions:—"I confess that in a matter of this sort I am not willing to interfere with the discretion of an inferior Judge, once exercised. The discretion of the Sheriff was appealed to, and the Sheriff has exercised his discretion, and has refused the application, and when a Judge has once exercised his discretion, and exercised it in such a way that it is impossible to say that he has done wrong, a superior Court will hesitate to interfere, even though looking at the matter independently they might feel inclined to come to a different conclusion."

It humbly seems to me that these observations are very relevant to the question how we are to reconcile the provision as to the question of the right of the bankrupt to discharge, being, in the first place, one for the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, with the provision that it shall be in the end one for the opinion of the Inner-House. Plainly the two provisions can never be reconciled by making that for appeal incompetent. This Court has a certain duty of review thrown upon it of which it cannot rid itself. The two provisions, as I read the cases, are only to be reconciled by the Inner-House not going against the opinion of the inferior Judge in a matter of discretion, unless it can say that he has gone clearly wrong. It is true that in Millar's case² the Sheriff had refused the discharge, while here the Sheriff has found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, but has merely postponed it to a day named, being less than three months from the date of his interlocutor. Nobody can say that that by itself makes any difference, because refusal of the discharge, or granting it, or postponing it, was equally within his competency if any one of these courses represented his real opinion. I should be prepared to follow Lord President Inglis' mode of dealing with a Sheriff's discretion all the more because the reference in section 6 (b) of the Act of 1881 to the "opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff" is an express reference, and not merely an implied one, as in the case of the Act May 29, 1908. of 1860, section 3. There is hardly any question which can more properly Bell v. Bell's be described as one of pure discretion than to determine whether a man's Trustee. conduct has or has not arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly LdStormonth-Darling. be held responsible. In *Millar's case*¹ the Court, agreeing both with the Sheriff and with the Accountant in Bankruptcy, thought the case "a very bad one indeed." Here, the Accountant of Court, to whom the matter was referred by the Sheriff, has nothing unfavourable to report of the bankrupt, i.e., nothing unfavourable about his conduct as a bankrupt; and in the case of Cooper v. Fraser & Scott,² where the Court decided that the bankrupt's discharge should no longer be delayed (although he had been convicted of embezzlement of trust funds and had suffered a sentence of three months' imprisonment), I observe that Lord Neaves (at page 42 of the report) distinguishes between a case where the bankrupt's conduct as a bankrupt has been unexceptionable, and a case where he may have acted culpably towards one or more of his creditors.

Now, there being nothing here to which exception can be taken in the conduct of the bankrupt as a bankrupt—no concealment of funds, or failure to comply with statutory requirements—the only thing to which the trustee or the objecting creditors can take exception is that his bankruptcy was brought about by what the trustee describes as "culpable conduct" in (a) carrying on business as a dealer in sheep and cattle from about the year 1894 as a "series of speculations" in the fluctuations of the market prices of such stock; and (b) in keeping no proper business-books. I do not say that the conduct of the bankrupt in either of these respects was to be applauded. But the Sheriff points out that the great bulk of his dealings was "conducted at the mart of the objecting creditors," and he is of opinion on the whole that his action does not deserve that he be kept in the status of an undischarged bankrupt for an indefinite time. I think that in characterising part of his dealings as "wholesome," though that is not a very apposite phrase, the Sheriff must be taken to mean that the objecting creditors who encouraged him to go on speculating by giving him credit are the last persons to complain of such dealing, because for their own purposes they encouraged it. I do not find that peculiarity in any of the cases which involved more or less reckless trading. In Clarke v. Crockett & Company,³ which was the first case in which the Court had to consider the effect of the Act of 1881, the bankrupt had lost £6000 by speculations on the Greenock Sugar Exchange, and at last had attempted to evade apprehension by absconding in female attire, and the Sheriff-substitute was against him on the question whether his failure to pay 5s. in the £1 arose from circumstances for which he was not justly responsible. The Court refused the appeal, thus agreeing with the Sheriff-substitute in the view that the bankrupt was entirely responsible for having incurred debts at all, and in not being able to discharge these debts. So that case affords no countenance to the view that the Court ought without some strong and compelling ground to overrule the opinion of the Judge of first instance when he has come to a conclusion, as the Sheriff does here, favourable to the bankrupt's right to a

May 29, 1908. discharge. A strong example of the unwillingness of a Court of review to interfere with the exercise of discretion of a local Judge, particularly when it is in favour of the bankrupt, is afforded by the case of Buchanan v. Wallace,¹ where the bankrupt had kept no books, and had speculated in house property and shares, with the result that he failed with liabilities over £19,000, and assets only £200, and the Lord President characterised his conduct as "extremely blameworthy"; and yet the Court refused to interfere with the discretion of the Sheriff-substitute, who had found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, but delayed extract for three months.

Now, I think that the case of *Buchanan v. Wallace*¹ establishes that, even where the Sheriff-substitute imposes a "very mild penalty" on the bankrupt (as all the Judges thought it was) for reckless trading or other misconduct, the matter is left to a great extent to the discretion of the Sheriff, and the Court will not interfere with his discretion except upon the strongest grounds. I think that this is especially so where the discretion of the inferior Judge is exercised in favour of the bankrupt's discharge, because "a somewhat penal statutory discretion" (as Lord M'Laren calls it in *Petition Shand*²) must always receive the milder construction, if that be at all possible. His Lordship therefore adopted that construction in holding that the bankrupt was only partly responsible for the failure to pay 5s. in the £1. It is true that in that case, where Lord M'Laren was Lord Ordinary on the Bills in vacation, and therefore exercising the functions of the statutory Court of review, he did not adopt the view of the Sheriff-substitute; but that was because he thought that the Sheriff-substitute, in refusing the discharge, had not acted on his own personal view of the evidence, but on a mistaken view of what the Act required. There is another case, Petition Boyle,³ which illustrates how strongly the Court leans to what may be called the more merciful view towards the bankrupt, because there the Sheriff-substitute had been against the bankrupt, and yet the Second Division granted the discharge. In short, I do not know a single case where the Court of first instance has been in favour of discharge (either immediately or after an interval), and where the Court has in the end refused it.

In the present case the Sheriff-substitute has found the bankrupt entitled to his discharge, but has postponed the granting of the same till Friday, 3d March 1908 (now past). It is impossible to read his note without seeing that what has weighed with him chiefly has been (1) that the objecting creditors were largely responsible for the speculative trading, and (2) that both they and the trustee (who is secretary of their auction mart) are trying to make available to the creditors what the bankrupt is not bound to assign—Reid v. Morison.⁴ I am of opinion that, although speculative trading and the non-keeping of business-books are to be condemned, they are not more to be condemned than the attempt to lay hands by a legal artifice on property which does not by law belong to the creditors. In short, I think that the Sheriff-substitute has properly exercised his discretion, and even if I disagreed with him as to his reasons for exercising his discretion in that particular way, I should be slow to disturb it. I cannot section 6 (b), and especially the words "cannot justly be held responsible." LdStormonth-

I am aware that the Act was passed at the instance of a private member of the House of Commons, and that its main intention was to make it more difficult for a bankrupt to obtain his discharge. But it was never intended to make that impossible, and the course of decision for the past twenty-six years does not shew that the statute has been very extensively used in the interests of creditors, for it still left a large measure of discretion in the hands of the Court, and particularly as I read the decisions, in the hands of the local Judge. I am further of opinion that the objections which are stated to the bankrupt's discharge truly represent only one interest, that of the conductors of the auction mart, and that those objections may and ought to be taken into account when they are put forward for the purpose of securing for a necessarily inadequate price property which has not yet vested in the bankrupt. The course followed by the Sheriff-substitute has already had the effect of leaving to the creditors nearly three months for the expectancy dependent on the bankrupt's survivance of his mother to become a vested interest, and, in my view, the creditors have had all, and possibly more than all, they were entitled to. I am therefore in favour of refusing the appeal, and finding that the bankrupt is now entitled to his discharge.

LORD LOW.—I have found this case to be attended with much difficulty. By section 6 of the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act, 1881, it is enacted that in order to entitle a bankrupt who has not paid a dividend of 5s. in the £1 to his discharge, it must be proved that his failure to do so has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible. Here the trustee has reported that the bankruptcy arose from culpable conduct on the part of the bankrupt, and that his business has been, throughout a period of twelve years, a series of special speculations in the fluctuations of the market prices of sheep and cattle. That is the purport of the trustee's report, and the bankrupt has led no evidence to shew that his failure to pay 5s. in the £1 has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible. The Sheriff-substitute refers to the report of the examination of the bankrupt. I have read a copy of that report, and I cannot say that, to my mind, it throws much light on the question. If I had nothing but the examination of the bankrupt before me, I should have difficulty in forming my opinion as to whether or not the bankrupt can be justly held responsible for his failure to pay 5s. in the £1.

In such circumstances it is very important to observe that the statute gives very great weight to the opinion of the Judge of first instance—the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff as the case may be. The enactment is extremely badly framed, and indeed, if read literally, is nonsense, but I think that what was meant, and what the enactment must be read as meaning, is that the bankrupt shall not be entitled to his discharge unless, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, he was not justly responsible for his failure

May 29, 1908. to pay 5s. in the £1. If that be the sound construction of the enactment, then, although an appeal is allowed, it gives such weight to the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff that the Court of Appeal is not justified in altering his determination unless it is so plainly wrong that there are no reasonable grounds upon which it can be supported. I am not prepared to go so far as that in this case. I read the Sheriff-substitute's note as meaning that his investigations into the case have led him to the conclusion that to a considerable extent the bankrupt's losses were due rather to misfortune than to a course of dealing which could properly be described as rash or reckless speculation. That being so, I concur, although I confess with much hesitation, in the result at which Lord Stormonth-Darling has arrived.

Bell v. Bell's
Trustee.

Lord Low.

LORD ARDWALL.—I am of opinion that in this case the bankrupt is not entitled to his discharge.

Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1860 the granting or refusing of a petition for discharge of a bankrupt was one entirely of discretion, and as was laid down in the case of Millar,¹ under that Act the Court would not on appeal readily interfere with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, but that case and others under the Bankruptcy Acts prior to 1881 have little application to the present question. By the Bankruptcy and Cessio Act of 1881 the law was altered and restrictions were placed on the right to discharge. By that Act, section 6 (1), it was provided as follows:—"A bankrupt shall not at any time be entitled to be discharged of his debts, unless it is proved to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, that one of the following conditions has been fulfilled: (a) That a dividend or composition of not less than 5s. in the £1 has been paid out of the estate of the bankrupt, or that security for payment thereof has been found to the satisfaction of the creditors; or (b) that the failure to pay 5s. in the £1, as aforesaid, has in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, as the case may be, arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible"; and by subsection 3 of the same section it is provided that "any deliverance of the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff, as the case may be, under this section shall be subject to appeal in the manner provided in sections 171 and 170 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, provided always that the judgment of the Inner-House of the Court of Session on any such appeal shall be final, and not subject to review."

It must be kept in view that the discretion reposed in the Lord Ordinary and the Sheriff under the Act of 1881 is much more restricted than in either of the previous Bankruptcy Acts so far as they related to the discharge of bankrupts; but yet I am of opinion that under these sections the Judge of the first instance may exercise a certain amount of discretion in granting or refusing the discharge, but that only where there is something in the report of the trustee or other evidence going to shew that the failure to pay 5s. in the £1 has wholly or partly arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible. An example of this is to be found in the case of Shand (Petr.),² where the deficiency was due in some measure to the bankrupt's fault, but in a greater degree to the forced realisation of his May 29, 1908. effects. In such cases I would agree with what has been said by your Lordships as to the undesirability of interfering with the decision arrived at by the Judge of the first instance on a balancing of evidence, but in my opinion the present is not a case of that sort at all. I must however say that I respectfully differ from the views expressed by my brother Lord Stormonth-Darling as to the duty of the Court of Appeal in considering such a case as is presented to us by the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor and note.

Bell v. Bell's
Trustee.
Lord Ardwall.

Before considering what the facts in this case are upon which the Sheriff-substitute has proceeded, I think it right to point out that the effect of the provisions of the Act of 1881 under consideration is not now being considered for the first time. In the case of Clarke v. Crockatt & Company,¹ the Court very clearly laid it down that the burden of proving that his failure had arisen from circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible lay upon the bankrupt himself. Lord President Inglis says,—“The enactment is that the bankrupt shall not be entitled to a discharge unless one of two things is proved—either that he has paid a dividend of 5s. in the £1, or that his failure to do so has ‘arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible’; and the statute further lays upon the bankrupt himself the burden of proving that the failure has arisen from such circumstances. The question therefore is, no dividend of 5s. having been paid in the present case, whether the failure so to pay has been proved by the bankrupt to have arisen from circumstances for which he cannot be held to be justly responsible.”

Then in the case of Neilson (Petr.),² Lord President Kinross expresses himself thus regarding the subsection in question :—“This subsection clearly lays upon the bankrupt the onus of proving that the failure to pay 5s. in the £1 arose from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible, because it declares that unless this or another condition has been fulfilled, he shall not be entitled to be discharged. That proposition must be established affirmatively by the bankrupt, and the question is, has it been so established in this case?” And Lord Adam says in the same case :—“I agree, however, that the onus is on the bankrupt of shewing that he cannot justly be held responsible for the failure to pay 5s. That was most distinctly stated by Lord President Inglis in the case of Clarke v. Crockatt & Company,¹ and I do not think that it is possible to maintain the contrary. Now it appears to me that this is a case of reckless, not perhaps trading, but of reckless speculation.”

No doubt in thus stating the import and effect of the Act the learned Judges above referred to had in view the terms of subsections (1) and (2) of section 6 of the Act of 1881, which very plainly by their terms lay upon the bankrupt the duty of submitting such evidence as will prove to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff that one or other of the conditions (a) and (b) mentioned in subsection (1) have been fulfilled.

Accordingly the question comes to be in the present case whether the bankrupt has proved that either of the conditions has been fulfilled.

The Sheriff-substitute has found in his interlocutor “that the bankrupt's

May 29, 1908. failure to pay a dividend of 5s. in the £1 has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible," yet he has not pointed out in his note any such circumstance. After some observations about the buying and selling of stock at auction marts, the Sheriff-substitute goes on to say in his note:—"The view taken is that, while there is always risk in such dealings, because the sheep market fluctuates according to weather and many trade causes (which are out of the power of these graziers to shelter themselves from, if they are doing business at all), the bankrupt did not act so rashly and unreasonably as to justify severe censure; on the contrary, that part of his dealing was wholesome, and would not have been discouraged by the objecting creditors."

It is not very easy to extract any definite meaning from this somewhat strangely worded paragraph. The Sheriff-substitute seems to think that the question he had to decide was whether the bankrupt acted "so rashly and unreasonably as to justify severe censure." That is not the question which he had to determine, the question was whether the bankrupt had discharged the onus lying upon him of shewing that his failure to pay 5s. in the £1 had arisen from circumstances for which he could not justly be held responsible? The Sheriff-substitute goes on to express the opinion that part of the bankrupt's dealings was "wholesome" (whatever that may mean), and would not have been discouraged by the objecting creditors. Here, perhaps, is an indication that the Sheriff-substitute blames the objecting creditors for having contributed to the bankrupt's failure, but of this there is no evidence. Taking the paragraph as a whole, it seems to imply that because occasionally graziers cannot "shelter themselves" from the fluctuations of the sheep market "according to weather and many trade causes," the bankrupt who has for twelve years carried on a series of speculations resulting in a sequestration shewing £1003, 9s. 5d. of liabilities and £156, 19s. 5d. of assets is to be held to have been brought into that position "by circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible." It need hardly be pointed out that every trade and business is liable to fluctuations, and that every trader is liable to losses of more or less magnitude from time to time owing to circumstances for which possibly he cannot be held responsible; but it is manifestly the duty of any such trader when such inevitable losses occur to circumscribe his operations till his estate has recovered from such losses, and not to go on adding to the deficit by continued persistence in the same kind of dealings as led to them.

I must therefore hold that the Sheriff-substitute's suggestion, made in the passage I have quoted, does not afford the slightest foundation for the finding above quoted from his interlocutor.

I now turn for a moment to the facts of the case as ascertained from the trustee's report. These, shortly stated, are that for the long period of twelve years the bankrupt carried on a series of speculations upon fluctuations in the market prices of stock—in short, his business for the most part was of the same character as that known as gambling for differences on the Stock Exchange; that he never made up a balance-sheet, and kept no proper business-books, not even a cash-book. Apparently the only books that he can produce are three bank pass-books and three pocket diaries. The entries in the diaries were neither regular nor complete, and ceased altogether in April 1904, about fourteen months before his May 29, 1908. sequestration.

It was pleaded that although failure to keep books might render the bankrupt liable to prosecution under the Debtors (Scotland) Act, 1880, section 13, subsection 6, yet it had no bearing on the present case. I must differ from this view, because it was just a piece of the bankrupt's reckless trading that he went blindly on, speculating with other people's money, without knowing at any one time how his affairs stood, so as if necessary to stop his speculative operations.

On the facts therefore as stated in the trustee's report, which under the Act is the proper evidence unless the Sheriff has required further evidence to be led, which apparently he has not done, I am of opinion that it has been shewn that the bankrupt's failure to pay 5s. in the £1 has arisen solely from circumstances for which the bankrupt, and the bankrupt alone, is responsible, and I have been unable to find in the whole proceedings any evidence to the contrary. But having regard to the dicta of the Judges in the cases of *Clarke v. Crockatt & Company*¹ and Neilson (Petr.),² the onus lies upon the bankrupt of shewing that the failure to pay 5s. in the £1 has "arisen from circumstances for which the bankrupt cannot justly be held responsible," and what has to be decided in this case is whether the bankrupt has discharged that onus.

I have been unable to find in the whole proceedings a tittle of evidence to justify the view that he has discharged it. I cannot find a single fact proved, or even, for that part of the matter, averred, which goes any length towards discharging that onus. The Sheriff-substitute's note, as I have shewn, does not shew that the bankrupt has discharged that onus, nor, so far as I have been able to follow them, do the opinions of your Lordships. There is no question of discretion here, the question is whether we are to affirm a finding which cannot be supported by a single fact in the case.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute has gone so far wrong in the present case and has so completely disregarded the requirements of the Act of 1891 as expounded in former decisions of the Supreme Court, that it is the duty of this Court as a Court of appeal to reverse his judgment and refuse the petitioner's discharge, on the ground that he has not discharged the onus lying upon him of shewing that his failure to pay 5s. in the £1 has arisen from circumstances for which he cannot justly be held responsible.

It is unnecessary in the view I take of the case to go into the question raised in the Sheriff-substitute's note regarding the spes successionis of the bankrupt.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have found the case very difficult, but I concur with the majority of your Lordships. The proceedings in a question of bankruptcy discharge have somewhat of a penal character, and the withholding of a discharge is a very serious matter for a bankrupt, the subsistence of his sequestration after a considerable lapse of time being like a chain around his neck, hampering him in any effort he may be making to

May 29, 1908. recover himself and make progress as a citizen. It is therefore, I think, a case in which, except upon the strongest grounds, the Court should not interfere with the decision of the Judge of first instance, where that has set the bankrupt free, even although his doing so may be held to go rather far in the exercise of his discretion. The present case is, I admit, not a very favourable one. But as the Judge of first instance has held that the door may open for the bankrupt to go free, I am not prepared to shut it in his face. I concur generally in what Lord Stormonth-Darling has said, and while I agree with much of the animadversion which Lord Ardwall has expressed, I cannot see my way to set aside the decision of the Sheriff, a course which should only be taken if there are no reasonable grounds for the decision.

Ship—Charter-party—Lay-days—Commencement—"Time for discharging to commence on being reported at custom-house"—Ship reported before being berthed.—By a charter-party it was provided that a vessel, after loading a cargo at Middlesborough, "should proceed to Savona or Genoa as ordered, . . . and there deliver the same, . . . time for discharging to commence on being reported at the custom-house."

The vessel having been ordered to Savona, anchored in the roads there on a Tuesday morning, and was reported at the custom-house at 3 P.M. on that day, but had to wait until a later date before she could get into the harbour, and until a still later date before she got into the berth where she discharged her cargo.

In an action for demurrage it was admitted that the roads were outside the geographical limits of the port of Savona and of what was known commercially as the port, and were the ordinary place at which vessels lay until there should be room in the harbour where alone discharging could be effected. The pursuers averred "that according to the custom of the port, vessels on arrival in the roads are reported at the custom-house, and are allotted berths in the harbour according to the order of reporting."

Held that, assuming the pursuers' averment to be accurate, the time at which under the charter-party the lay-days began was 3 P.M. on Tuesday, the hour of reporting at the custom-house, although the vessel had not then arrived at a place in the harbour where she could discharge.

Ship—Charter-Party—Lay-days—Demurrage—Computation—Whole days or Fractions.—A charter-party provided "cargo to be received at the port of discharge at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day. . . . Demurrage at the rate of £25 per running day." The cargo was 2850 tons.

Held (1) that the charterers were only entitled to lay-days amounting to seven days and three hours (the time actually required for unloading the cargo at the specified rate) and not, as they contended, to eight complete days; (2) that the vessel having been on demurrage for a period of six days and one and a half hours of a seventh day, the owners were only entitled to demurrage for six days one and a half hours, and not, as they contended, for seven complete days.

Ship—Charter-Party—Exception—Hands striking work—Regulations of Co-operative Societies of Labour.—Under a charter-party, dated January 1907, the charterers were bound to discharge cargo at a certain rate per day, "except in cases of riot, or any hands striking work."

For a certain period after her arrival in the port of discharge, the ship lay stern on to a quay until a berth became available at which she could lie broadside on. No cargo was discharged during this period, owing to a declaration of the presidents of the two co-operative societies of labour at the port that steamers were not to be discharged while moored end on to a quay. This declaration was published in November 1906, and was widely known and regularly acted upon. Held that this delay did not fall within the exception, and that the time during which the ship lay stern on to the quay must be counted in reckoning lay-days and demurrage.

By charter-party, dated 14th January 1907, and entered into between the agents of the Horsley Line, Limited, owners of the steamship "Dalmally," on the one part, and Messrs Roechling Brothers, iron merchants, Glasgow and Milan, Italy, on the other part, it was stipulated:—"That the said steamship . . . shall after discharging present cargo with all convenient speed proceed to Middlesbrough and there load . . . a cargo, and " . . . with all convenient speed proceed to Savona or Genoa, as ordered on signing bills of lading, and there deliver the same to the order of the said freighters, or their assigns . . ."

"Steamer not to be responsible for any loss, damage, or delay to cargo caused by strikes, lockouts, and/or combinations of officers, engineers, crew, dock labourers, stevedores, lightermen, or any other hands or agencies connected with the loading or discharging of the steamer. . . ."

"The cargo to be supplied at the port of loading as fast as the steamer can stow same, and received at the port of discharge at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day (Sundays and holidays excepted) except in cases of riot, or any hands striking work, or accidents to machinery which may impede the ordinary loading and discharging of the steamer. The reckoning for loading to commence when the steamer is berthed at the respective wharves, and notice given that she is ready to receive cargo.

"Time for discharging to commence on being reported at the custom-house.

"Demurrage at the rate of £25 per running day to be paid by the freighters or consignees for any detention in the loading and delivery, as above. Freighters' liability to cease on cargo being shipped, except as regards demurrage, if any, incurred in the loading. . . ."

"Finally, this charter in all its clauses to be binding on both parties, notwithstanding any and every custom of the port of discharge to the contrary. . . ."

The "Dalmally" proceeded to Middlesbrough, loaded there a cargo of pig-iron weighing 2850 tons, and proceeded therewith, as ordered, to Savona. She anchored in the roads there on 12th February 1907, and was reported at the custom-house at Savona at 3 P.M.

May 29, 1908. on the same day. Her discharge was completed on 27th February at 7.30 P.M.

Horsley Line,
Limited, v.
Roechling
Brothers.

The Horsley Line, Limited, brought an action against Roechling Brothers in which they concluded for payment of £175 as demurrage at the rate stipulated in the charter-party for seven days, reckoned from 6 P.M. on Thursday, 21st February, when the lay-days expired, the lay-days being counted from 3 P.M. on Tuesday, 12th February, and not including Wednesday, 13th February, which on account of the weather was not a "weather working day."

The defenders maintained that the lay-days did not begin to count until Wednesday, 20th February, the vessel not having arrived, as they alleged, where her cargo could be delivered until the evening of Tuesday, 19th February; and that consequently no demurrage was due.

The following joint minute of admissions was put in by the parties:—“(1) That the s.s. ‘Dalmally’ anchored in the roads at Savona at 8.40 A.M. on Tuesday, 12th February 1907. (2) That the s.s. ‘Dalmally’ was reported at the custom-house at Savona at 3 o’clock on the afternoon of 12th February 1907, and the same day was reported to the defenders’ agents at Savona as having arrived in the roads. (3) That the roads at Savona where the s.s. ‘Dalmally’ was anchored is an ordinary place of anchorage for vessels to lie while unable owing to the harbour being full to get into same and preparatory to their entering the harbour of Savona, where alone discharging and unloading is effected. (4) That the roads at Savona are outside of the geographical limits of the port of Savona and of what is known commercially speaking as such port. (5) That it is not the custom at Savona to discharge cargo from vessels lying in the roads. (6) That the s.s. ‘Dalmally’ lay in the roads until 3.25 P.M. on Saturday, 16th February 1907, when she entered the harbour of Savona and moored stern on to a quay at a discharging berth in the inner harbour, and that it could not be moored in any other way. (7) That, in November 1906, the presidents of the two co-operative societies of labour at the port of Savona published a declaration that from said month of November until further notice steamers were not to be discharged while moored end on to the quay in said inner harbour. (8) That this declaration, which has been regularly acted upon since its date, was published in the Italian newspapers, and wide publicity was given to same. (9) That the s.s. ‘Dalmally’ did not discharge any of her cargo while she was moored end on to the quay as aforesaid.”

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) “ . . . According to the custom of the port, vessels on arrival in the roads are reported at the custom-house, and are allotted berths in the harbour according to the order of reporting. . . . ”

The defenders denied this averment.

The pursuers also averred that after lying moored stern on to the breakwater from Saturday, 16th February, the “Dalmally” was placed in a berth at the quay on Tuesday, 19th February, at 10 A.M., and that the defenders did not actually commence unloading until 19th February.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) On a sound construction of the charter-party the lay-days commenced to count on 12th February when the vessel was reported at the custom-house. (3) The sum sued for being due by the defenders to the pursuers as demurrage under the charter-party condescended on, decree should be pronounced as craved.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The defenders fall to be assuizied in respect that the ship, after being an arrived ship, was discharged within the lay-days stipulated in the charter-party. (4) Upon a sound construction of the charter-party the lay-days do not commence to count until the ship has arrived at a usual and recognised place of discharge in the port of destination. (5) Upon a sound construction of the charter-party the unit by which the time falls to be computed is a day. (6) Separatim, any delay in the discharge over and above the lay-days having been occasioned by strikes or combinations of stevedores, the defenders fall to be assuizied in respect of the exemption of their liability for these causes of delay in the charter-party.

On 21st February 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) repelled the first and sixth pleas in law for the defenders, and allowed both parties a proof of their averments.*

* "OPINION.—In this action the pursuers, who are the owners of the s.s. 'Dalmally,' seek to recover from the defenders seven days' demurrage. Various questions are raised which mainly depend on a construction of the charter-party entered into between the pursuers and defenders, but there are also some facts in dispute, and although the parties have put in a joint minute of admissions (No. 10 of process) they have failed to come to an agreement as to what appears to me to be a vital part of the pursuers' case. The defenders, however, maintain that they have sufficient admissions from the pursuers to justify the action being dismissed as irrelevant, and I shall accordingly deal with the argument on this head.

"The 'Dalmally' was chartered on 14th January 1907 to load a cargo of pig-iron of about 2900 tons at Middlesborough, and to proceed to Savona and there deliver the same. The charter-party provided 'that the cargo should be received at the port of discharge at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day, except in cases of riot, or any hands striking work, or accidents to machinery which might impede the ordinary loading and discharging of the steamer. . . . Time for discharging to commence on being reported at the custom-house.' The facts admitted by the parties are as follows:—The 'Dalmally' anchored in the roads at Savona at 8.40 A.M. on Tuesday, 12th February 1907. She was reported at the custom-house at Savona at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of that day. The place where she anchored is an ordinary place of anchorage for vessels unable to get into the harbour, in which alone discharging is effected, but is outside the limits of the port. The pursuers further aver that according to the custom of the port vessels on arrival in the roads at Savona are reported at the custom-house, and are allotted berths in the harbour according to the order of reporting. (1) The first question in the case is: Are these facts relevant to infer that the lay-days under the charter-party in question commenced to run from 3 o'clock on the afternoon of 12th February? In my opinion they are.

"Practically the only argument submitted for the defenders was that the 'Dalmally' was not an arrived ship when she lay in the roads outside Savona, and they figured the case of a vessel being reported at the custom-house when she was still a long way from the port. I do not suppose such a thing would be commercially possible, but if it were I should of course not consider that the lay-days could possibly commence from the time of such reporting. The case is, however, quite different if it is the recognised custom of the port that vessels on arrival are reported at the custom-house, and are allotted berths according to the order of reporting, for I should then assume that the parties had this custom in view when they agreed on the terms of the charter-party. It may be noted that the defenders carry on business in Italy as well as in Glasgow; and shipowners, of course, make it

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The lay-days only commenced to run on the vessel's arrival in the port of Savona, of which, admittedly, the "roads" were not a portion. It was unnecessary to consider anything beyond the charter-party itself, seeing that its ruling clause was that the vessel was to proceed to Savona, and there deliver her cargo. Accordingly until Savona was reached the vessel was under no obligation to deliver, and the charterers were not bound to receive cargo. This conclusion further followed from the well-known rule of law that before lay-days could commence to run a vessel must have arrived at her destination, and be what was termed an "arrived" ship.¹ A vessel lying in "roads," which she might be compelled to leave at a moment's notice from stress of weather, was in no sense "arrived." The clause as to the custom-house report, on which the pursuers' case depended, was obviously qualified by the implied condition that the vessel must have "arrived." The date of their business to ascertain the customs of the ports to which they send their vessels. On this assumption, therefore, I think it is not a just implication that the running of the lay-days should be suspended until the vessel actually got into the harbour. I asked the defenders' counsel if the vessel was to report a second time at the custom-house after she had got into the harbour, and if there was any provision for such a report being received. I could get no satisfactory answer to either of these questions; but it appears to me that whatever assumption is made on these points the terms of the charter-party would be directly contradicted if the defenders' interpretation were adopted; for you would require to substitute for the quite unequivocal language used a clause such as this: 'The time of discharging to commence after vessel has arrived in the harbour, and has been reported at the custom-house.' I see no warrant for this. I recognise, of course, that if the contract does not state from what point of time the lay-days shall commence to run, they will not run until the ship has arrived in the port, and may not run until she is actually in a discharging berth, or at all events until such a berth is available. But there is nothing to prevent parties agreeing that the risk of the vessel's detention through the harbour being full shall be thrown on the charterer, and this—if the pursuers prove their averments—is what I think the parties truly intended.

"None of the reported cases seem to me to have any bearing on this question; but I note those to which I was referred: Jackson, 1838, 5 Bing. N. C. 71; The 'Machrahanish,' Shipping Gazette, 4th April 1906; The 'Katy,' [1895] P. p. 56, and La Cour, 1 R. 912.

"(2) If I am right in this, it follows that the lay-days commenced to run at 3 P.M. on 12th February, and must be reckoned as periods of twenty-four hours. The obligation of the defenders was to take delivery at the rate of 400 tons per day. The cargo consisted of 2850 tons; and the defenders claim that they were entitled to eight weather working days for unloading it, as it exceeded by fifty tons what they were bound to take out in the seven days. The only Scotch case cited by the defenders was that of Christie, 1896, 3 S. L. T. 284; but it has only a superficial resemblance. On the other hand I was favoured with a citation of two decisions in England—one supporting the pursuers' contention—(Yeoman), [1904] 2 K. B. 429, and the other (Houlder, [1905] 2 K. B. 267, at p. 271), which quite as clearly supports the defenders'. The latter was the decision of a single Judge, Channell, J., but was subsequent in date to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Yeoman's case, which it professed to distinguish. It was held by her entering the harbour was accordingly the earliest date from which lay-days could be counted. The "Machrahanish,"¹ founded on by the pursuers, was distinguishable, because in it there was an express contract as to when the ship was "arrived." (2) The cargo was fifty tons in excess of the amount which they were obliged to unload in seven days. Accordingly they were entitled to eight complete days as lay-days, the rule being that in calculating lay-days, days meant calendar days from midnight to midnight and not periods of twenty-four hours, and that a fraction of a day counted as a whole day.² Yeoman v. The King,³ at first sight an adverse authority, was distinguishable, because in that case the contract made it clear that the calculation was to be made in hours. (3) Lastly, they were not bound to receive cargo until the vessel obtained her proper berth alongside the quay. So long as she remained stern on operations were prevented by a state of matters

Channell, J., that if a fraction of a day is required for the completion of the discharge the charterer is entitled to the whole of that day.

"The clause here under construction is practically identical with that in Houlder's case. No reasons, however, are given for the judgment except that there is a general rule that for purposes of demurrage fractions of a day are not to be taken into consideration. That, however, must always yield to the intention of parties as deduced from the words used; and I am unable to see how a provision that a vessel shall be discharged 'at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day' is satisfied by the charterer receiving the cargo at the rate of 362½ tons. In Yeoman's case there were no doubt words which are not here, for demurrage was to be paid at 4d. per net register ton per day 'and pro rata'; whereas here the corresponding clause is 'demurrage at the rate of £25 per running day.' So far as I can judge, however, the majority of the Court of Appeal would have reached the same result on the language of the clause with regard to the average rate of discharge alone. I agree with Romer, L. J., when he says,—'I do not see why because the average rate mentioned does not work out to an exact number of days it should therefore follow that it does not apply to a portion of a day.' I think it also obvious that if the day is interrupted by bad weather—say, for three hours—the charterer would be entitled to the benefit of these three hours on the succeeding day; and the same with strikes or riots which interfered with the discharge of the vessel for less than a day. On the other view—that only whole days can be taken account of—either the charterer would fall to be debited with a whole lay-day if discharging took place during any part of it, although it had to be stopped through an excepted cause; or the charterer might take up the position that no day on which there was an interruption could be reckoned as a lay-day. In short, in my opinion the only way in which a commercial contract like this can be expiscated is on the assumption of the parties having had in view lay-days consisting of twenty-four consecutive hours, which would fall to be extended in proportion to the number of hours that the vessel's discharge was interrupted through the excepted causes.

"(3) The third question relates to the construction of the clause, 'except in case of riot or any hands striking work which might impede the ordinary discharging of the steamer.' The 'Dalmally' was taken into the harbour of Savona at 3.25 on Saturday 16th February, and was moored stern on to a quay at a discharging berth—there being no discharging berth available for her. She lay in this position without discharging any cargo until

Argued for the pursuers and respondents;—(1) In this case the parties had contracted that the lay-days were to commence at a fixed punctum temporis, viz., "on being reported at the custom-house." The general doctrine of the "arrived" ship was accordingly superseded, it being in fact the object of the contracting parties to steer clear of the many difficulties which that rule had given rise to. The "roads" at Savona were the customary place from which to report. There was nothing extraordinary or unusual in a contract that lay-days should commence prior to arrival in port.¹ (2) The defenders were not entitled to eight days as lay-days, but only to seven days and a fraction, days meaning periods of twenty-four hours, and not calendar days from midnight to midnight.² *Hough v. Athya & Son*³ and *Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton*⁴ were cases dealing with demurrage to which a different

Tuesday, 19th February, at 10 A.M., or—according to the defenders—till the morning of 20th February. The defenders claim to deduct this period from the 16th to the 20th in respect that until then they were prevented by a combination of stevedores from discharging the vessel. The facts upon which I am asked to decide this question are narrated in articles 7 and 8 of the joint minute of admissions, and come to this, that the presidents of the two co-operative societies of labour at Savona published a declaration in November 1906 that from that time steamers were not to be discharged while moored end on to the quay in said harbour; and that this declaration, which has since been regularly acted upon, received wide publicity. The charter-party, however, was entered into on 14th January 1907, and I think it is impossible to hold that this declaration, which merely settled the custom of the port as to discharging of steamers for the future, can be held to come under the clause dealing with riots or hands striking work. I was referred to the case of Richardson, [1898] 1 Q. B. 261, where it was said that the exception as to strikes and lockouts applies generally to labour disputes. I daresay it does; but so far as this discharge is concerned I see no evidence that there was any dispute—certainly none of any dispute arising with reference to the discharge of the 'Dalmally.' In fact I should not wonder if the declaration of the labour presidents had been published at the suggestion of the receivers of cargo, for it is they alone who have an interest in reducing the expense of discharge.

"(4) The last question relates to a period of one and a-half hours on the 27th of February for which the pursuers claim a whole day's demurrage. Assuming their calculation to be correct, the lay-days expired on Thursday, 21st February, at 6 P.M., but the 'Dalmally' was not completely unloaded before 7.30 on the 27th. I should have been very glad if I could have given effect to the defenders' contention on this head, but I consider myself foreclosed by the decision in Hough v. Athya, 6 R. 961, by the First Division approving of the decision of the English Courts in Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton, L. R., 10 Q. B. 346, where it was held that in the case of demurrage a fraction of a day counts as a day. I do not think that the reasons assigned by the learned Judges for the rule which they laid down at all accord with the more modern practice under which demurrage in the case of large steamers is generally reckoned by the hour. On the other hand parties who still contract on the footing that the only unit which they provide for calculating demurrage is a day cannot able, because in them no definite time was fixed at which discharge was to begin. (3) The running of the lay-days was not suspended while the vessel lay stern on to the quay, the fact that she was not unloaded being due not to a strike, which admittedly would have fallen under the clause of exceptions, but to a custom of the port which ought to have been within the cognisance of parties when they made their contract.³ (4) Lastly, the ship having been on demurrage for six days and a fraction of a day, they were entitled to payment for seven days, the rule in calculating demurrage being the reverse of that applicable to lay-days, a fraction of a day counting as a whole day.⁴ The reason for the difference was due to the fact that the payment of demurrage was a penalty, and calculated accordingly in the way most unfavourable to the delinquent party.

At advising on 29th May 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case are most simple. They are stated very clearly in an opinion prepared by Lord Low, which I have had an opportunity of perusing, and in which I concur. The principal point in the contract between the parties is whether the days of discharge of the ship at Savona are to count from the time when the ship was reported at the custom-house after reaching the outer harbour, or whether they are to count from the time at which she reached a berth for discharge. In my opinion the view the Lord Ordinary has taken is right. The words of the charter-party are distinct and unambiguous, fixing the time as being the time of the vessel being reported at the custom-house. Presumably those who signed the contract intended what it expresses. To say that the time is to commence to run from some other occurrence seems to me to be nothing short of saying that the words of the contract are either not to be held to mean what they say, but something different, or are to be ignored altogether in respect of some custom or practice inconsistent with it. I cannot assent complain if they be held to have so contracted in view of the rule laid down more than thirty years ago. In the case of the Brackelow s.s. Company, 1897, 1 Q. B. 570, Lord Russell of Killowen introduced a kind of rough and ready method for calculating weather working days when there had been an interruption from bad weather, and held that where substantial work was done, though not amounting to half a day, the charterers were to be charged with half a day; and where substantially a full day's work—though not amounting to twelve hours—was done, the charterers were to be charged a full day. I confess I see no merit in this except the simplicity of the arithmetic, and it has this disadvantage that the charterer is in both cases overcharged. It would seem much simpler, as well as more equitable, to take the actual hours during which discharging was stopped by bad weather. But for the purposes of the present question Lord Russell's decision is also an authority for the proposition that after the loading-days are exhausted every part of a day counts as a whole day's demurrage.

"As already indicated, parties on more than one point are at serious variance as to the facts; and all therefore that I can do at present is to repel the defenders' first and sixth pleas in law and allow parties a proof of their averments."

I think the words must be taken according to their plain meaning, it being right to presume that the charterers knew what they were doing when they accepted the terms contained in the document. All arguments about it being unfair and unreasonable to make the days run from arrival at the harbour, and not from arrival at a berth, are futile. The answer is plain, that the time must count according as it is fixed by the agreement between the parties, and that time is the time of the reporting at the custom-house. If the charterer made a bad bargain for himself, sibi imputet.

Horsley Line,

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

The second question is whether a fraction of a day necessary to complete the discharge is to be reckoned as a whole day for demurrage. The Lord Ordinary holds himself bound by two cases to which he refers. If I thought that the terms of the contract in these cases were of similar import to those in the present case, I should, though with reluctance, come to the same conclusion. In one case the words were "thirteen running days to be allowed for loading and unloading and ten days on demurrage at £40 per day." In the other case the words were, "a minimum of seven days to be allowed the merchants and ten days' demurrage over and above the said lying-days at £35 per day." In this case the terms are somewhat different. The cargo is to be received "at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day." Thus the delivery is to be at a rate per day, and that would in my view be fulfilled although the end of the discharge took place not at the exact close of any particular working day but at any hour. If for a broken day running beyond the discharging time payment was made for the broken time at the rate specified, the contract would in my opinion be fulfilled, the demurrage being at a rate, as the discharge was to be at a certain rate. I therefore cannot agree with the contention that the defenders are liable for a whole day in respect of a fraction of a day, namely, one hour and a half—See the case of Yeoman.¹

As regards the question of strikes, the Lord Ordinary's view seems to me to be entirely sound, and I do not find it necessary to add anything to what he has said.

I would fain hope that if your Lordships concur, as I understand you do, in the views I have expressed, that it may not be found necessary to send the case back for proof, and incur further expense.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—I also have had an opportunity of reading and considering the opinion of my brother Lord Low in this case, and I entirely concur in it. The only legal point in which we differ from the Lord Ordinary is one at which he arrives unwillingly, for he says he would have been very glad if he could have given effect to the defenders' contention, but he considers himself foreclosed by the decision of the First Division in *Hough v. Athya & Son*² in 1879, approving and following the judgment of the Queen's Bench in 1875 in Boulton's case.³ Now I do not suppose for a moment that any of us desire to impugn the soundness of either of these judgments with reference to the charter-parties affecting the cases then under consideration. But in neither of these charter-parties was there any reference to a unit of time other than a day. That, I apprehend, was the real ground of the decision in the English case which was followed by the First May 29, 1908. Division of this Court. "There is no ground for saying" (so said Mr Justice Lush) "that in the case of demurrage there can be any division of a day without express stipulation to that effect." Mr Justice Quain was equally distinct to the same effect,—“It was contended for the defendants that they are only liable for one day or only for a portion of the second; but it was not suggested how the proportion was to be calculated, and it is clear that, in the case of demurrage like this, we cannot go into the calculation of part of a day.” So it was a difficulty of calculation according to the terms of the particular charter-party that led to the judgment, and nothing else. The framers of modern charter-parties have, as the Lord Ordinary indicates, got over this difficulty by naming as a unit hours instead of days; and Lord Low suggests other words in this charter-party which sufficiently distinguish its language from those of *Hough's case*¹ and Boulton's case.² I therefore think that the present case is not ruled by *Hough*¹ and Boulton,² and that there is no legal necessity for holding that the defenders are liable to pay as demurrage more than a proportionate part of the £25 applicable to the time actually occupied in discharging the cargo. And I agree that *Yeoman's case*³ affords strong confirmation of that view.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

With respect to the parts of the Lord Ordinary's judgment in which we agree with him—which are chiefly the question at which point of time the “Dalmally” became an “arrived” ship, and the question whether the “strike” clause in the charter-party affected her or not—I do not desire to add anything to what the Lord Ordinary and Lord Low have said, and I agree with the latter that the question whether the proof allowed by the Lord Ordinary shall go on or not must depend on the real attitude of the defenders towards their own averments.

LORD LOW.—The first question in this case is, When did the lay-days commence to run?

The clauses in the charter-party in regard to loading and unloading are to the following effect:—“The cargo to be supplied at the port of loading as fast as the steamer can stow same, and received at the port of discharge at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day . . . The reckoning for loading to commence when the steamer is berthed at the respective wharves, and notice given that she is ready to receive cargo; time for discharging to commence on being reported at the custom-house.”

The port of discharge in the charter-party was Savona or Genoa, and it was to the former that the “Dalmally” was sent. It is admitted that she anchored in the roads at Savona at 8.40 A.M. on Tuesday the 12th February 1907, and that she was reported to the custom-house at 3 P.M. on the same day; that the roads at Savona are outside of the geographical limits of the port of Savona, and of what is known, commercially speaking, as such port; and that the roads where the “Dalmally” was anchored is an ordinary place of anchorage for vessels which cannot get into harbour (where alone cargo can be discharged) on account of its being full. It is

That averment is denied by the defenders, but upon a question of relevancy it must be assumed to be true.

Lord Low.

In these circumstances, it seems to me that the provision in the charter-party in regard to the time when the lay-days shall commence is quite distinct—they are to commence when in ordinary course the arrival of the vessel is reported at the custom-house. The defenders argued that such a construction of the charter-party was inconsistent with the leading provision that the vessel should "proceed to Savona," and "there deliver" the cargo, because until she got within the limits of the port she was not an "arrived" vessel, and was not in a position to deliver the cargo. Assuming that the averment of the pursuers which I have quoted is correct, I am of opinion that that argument cannot be sustained. The pursuers' averment amounts to this, that the custom of Savona is that when the harbour is full, an arriving vessel anchors in the roads and reports her arrival to the custom-house, and that that report regulates the order in which she gets a berth in the harbour. If that be so, then the report to the custom-house which the "Dalmally" made when she had anchored in the roads is the report referred to in the charter-party, and accordingly she must then be regarded as having been an "arrived" ship within the meaning and for the purposes of the charter-party. I am therefore of opinion that upon this branch of the case the Lord Ordinary is right.

The result is that the lay-days commenced to run at 3 P.M. on the 12th February 1907, and if so it was not seriously disputed that they must be reckoned as periods of twenty-four hours. So calculating the lay-days, they expired at 6 P.M. on the 21st February, and the discharge was completed at 7.30 P.M. on the 27th February. The vessel was therefore on demurrage for a period of six days (reckoning a day as a period of twenty-four hours) and a fraction (one hour and a half) of a seventh day, and the question is whether that fraction of a day is, for the purpose of calculating the amount of demurrage due, to be regarded as a whole day?

The clause in the charter-party fixing the rate of demurrage is as follows: "Demurrage at the rate of £25 per running day to be paid by the freighters or consignees for any detention in loading or delivery as above."

The Lord Ordinary has held that the fraction of a day must count as a day. He has arrived at that conclusion unwillingly, and only because he regards the question as settled by the decision in *Hough v. Athya & Son*¹ and Commercial Steamship Company v. Boulton.² It was no doubt laid down in these cases, in somewhat absolute terms, that in the case of demurrage a fraction of a day is counted as a day. In both cases, however, the terms of the charter-parties differed very materially from those of the charter-party now under construction. In Hough v. Athya & Son,¹ the provision in the charter-party in regard to loading and unloading was "thirteen running days to be allowed for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage at £40 per day"; and in the Commercial Steamship

Lord Low.

Now, it is to be observed that in these cases there is nothing to suggest that any period of time is to be considered except the day, that is, the ordinary working day. So many lay-days are allowed, and so many days on demurrage, and the amount of demurrage is fixed at a given sum "per day." Compare these terms with the charter-party in this case. The consignees are bound to receive the cargo "at the rate of 400 tons per weather working day." If in discharging the cargo at that rate the unloading is completed in so many days and a fraction of another day, the obligation of the consignees is fulfilled, and I have difficulty in understanding why they should nevertheless be dealt with as if the completion of the discharge had occupied a whole day instead of a fraction of a day. Then demurrage is fixed "at the rate of £25 per running day." I regard the words "at the rate of" as important, because they seem to me to be consistent with the view that only a portion of the £25 is to be payable in respect of a day a part only of which is occupied in discharging. As the discharge is to be at the rate of 400 tons per day, so demurrage is to be at the rate of £25 per day. That seems to me to distinguish the present case entirely from those of *Hough*² and the Commercial Steamship Company,¹ and I am of opinion that upon a sound construction of the charter-party the defenders are not liable to pay as demurrage for the hour and a half of the seventh day which was occupied in completing the discharging of the cargo more than a proportionate part of £25. In that view I am confirmed by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in England in Yeoman v. The King,³ where the terms of the charter-party closely resembled those with which we are dealing.

I should explain that I have dealt only with the time during which the vessel was on demurrage, because the pursuers' claim is for demurrage. I may say, however, that, in my opinion, precisely the same considerations which have led me to the conclusion that in a question of demurrage a portion of a day does not count as a whole day apply to lay-days. I know of no reason why a different principle should apply in the two cases, and I observe that in Hough v. Athya & Son,³ Lord President Inglis said: "I do not see any distinction between lay-days and days of demurrage in the matter of counting."

The only other question which was argued relates to the construction of the clause in the charter-party which refers to strikes, and in regard to that matter I need only say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary.

I am not sure whether the defenders seriously deny the pursuers' averment in cond. 4, which I have quoted in regard to the custom of the port. If they do not do so, the case might be disposed of without further procedure, because, if the views which I have expressed be sound, all that would require to be done would be to adjust the amount. If, however, the Brothers.

LORD ARDWALL.—On the question, when did the lay-days commence, I entirely agree with the views expressed by the Lord Ordinary and the reasoning by which he supports them. The case of the "Machrahanish"¹ as read to us by counsel from the Shipping Gazette appeared to be an authority in favour of the proposition, which indeed seems self-evident, viz., that although when there is no express stipulation on the subject in the contract, lay-days will not be held to commence to run till the ship becomes what has been called "an arrived ship," yet the parties may contract otherwise, and, as in this case and the "Machrahanish," fix the date of arrival in the Harbour Roads as the commencement of the lay-days, thus throwing on the charterers the risk of the vessel failing to get a harbour berth for some time after arrival in the roadstead off the port. I accordingly agree with the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships that the lay-days commenced to run at 3 P.M. on the 12th February.

(2) The next question is, how many lay-days were the charterers entitled to under the charter-party? They maintain that they were entitled to eight "weather working days" for unloading, because, as they argue, there is no specified number of lay-days in the charter-party, and the obligation on them, the defenders, is to take delivery at the rate of 400 tons per day. Now, the cargo consisted of 2850 tons, and the defenders claim that they were entitled to eight weather working days for unloading it, as it exceeded by 50 tons what they were bound to take out in seven days, and they claim this on the principle that, in questions under charter-parties regarding demurrage and the like, days must mean whole days, and that if a part of a day is occupied they are entitled to the whole day. The Lord Ordinary has decided this matter against the defenders and in favour of the pursuers' contention, principally, apparently, upon the case of Yeoman,² and in this I think he has done rightly. According to this calculation the lay-days amounted to seven days three hours, and they accordingly expired on Thursday 21st February at 6 P.M.

(3) It will be convenient now to advert to what the Lord Ordinary treats as the fourth question. Keeping in view that the lay-days expired on Thursday 21st February at 6 P.M., the "Dalmally" was not completely unloaded until 7.30 on the 27th, being six days of twenty-four hours and one hour and a half in addition. The pursuers claim that they are entitled to seven days' demurrage in respect that the unloading ran into a seventh day to the extent of one hour and a half. The Lord Ordinary has unwillingly given effect to this contention, but I agree with my brother Lord Low, and upon the grounds set forth by him, that in this particular case the proper computation is not limited to a computation by days, but should also deal with fractions of days where the facts render that course equitable. The Lord Ordinary has applied this principle to the question of lay-days, and I am of opinion that by parity of reasoning it ought to be applied to questions of demurrage arising under the same contract of charter-party. I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary and May 29, 1908.

your Lordships upon the question turning upon the construction of the strike clause.

The defenders having intimated that they did not intend to dispute the accuracy of the averment made by the pursuers in cond. 4 regarding the custom of the port of Savona, the Court, on 12th June, pronounced an interlocutor refusing the reclaiming note, adhering to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and granting decree against the defenders for the sum of £151, 11s. 3d. with interest at 5 per cent from the date of citation.

Expenses—Agent-disburser—Compensation.—In an action for payment of a sum claimed as due under a contract the defenders pleaded no title to sue, and also that the matters in dispute fell to be determined by arbitration.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary repelled the plea of no title to sue, found the pursuers entitled to expenses, and remitted the account to the Auditor.

Thereafter the Lord Ordinary sustained the plea that the matters in dispute fell to be determined by arbitration, and sisted the process, reserving the question of expenses.

The pursuers thereafter moved for approval of the Auditor's report on their account of expenses, and for decree in name of the agents-disbursers.

The defenders maintained that to grant decree as craved would prevent them setting off a claim for expenses if they should be found entitled to expenses when the merits of the action were decided.

The Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) superseded consideration of the pursuers' motion, and granted leave to reclaim.

The pursuers having reclaimed, the Court granted decree in name of the agents-disbursers.

Opinions that the course taken by the Lord Ordinary was competent.
Oliver v. Wilkie, 1901, 4 F. 362, distinguished.

HUGH NELSON & COMPANY, builders, Glasgow, in June 1907 brought an action against the Corporation of the City of Glasgow, in which they concluded for payment of the sum of £750. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

The pursuers averred that in the year 1902 the defenders contracted with them, inter alia, for the execution of the excavator and mason work of two tenements and saloons in High Street and Duke Street, Glasgow, that the pursuers duly executed the work for the defenders except a small portion which had been executed by other contractors, and that the sum due to the pursuers under the contract was £750.

The defenders averred that "by contract, dated 8th and 20th November 1902, the now dissolved firm of Hugh Nelson & Company undertook to execute for the defenders the excavator and mason work for, inter alia, two tenements and saloons in High Street and Duke Street, Glasgow." In a statement of facts the defenders further averred:—(Stat. 2) "The said dissolved firm of Hugh Nelson & Company commenced work under said contract as afore-mentioned in August 1902 and carried it on until 4th March 1903 when, by decree of the Sheriff of Lanark-

May 30, 1908. shire, their estates were sequestrated. Thereafter a trustee for their creditors was elected and his election confirmed, and the said trustee continues to act as such on said sequestrated estates. The defenders have never had any contract with pursuers, who are unknown to them."

Hugh Nelson
& Co. v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

The pursuers averred in answer:—(Ans. 2) "Denied. Explained that on 22d February 1907 the creditors on the sequestrated estates of Mr Hugh Nelson, who was and is sole partner of said firm of Hugh Nelson & Co., resolved not to proceed with any action against the defenders in respect of said claim, 'but had no objections to Mr Nelson moving in the matter on his own responsibility.' . . . The said claim was thereby abandoned by said creditors, and the pursuers have thus a good title to sue the present action. The pursuers have received their discharge."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (5) Alternatively, the action ought to be sisted until the matters in dispute have been determined by arbitration in terms of the contract.

On 5th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) allowed a proof on the question of title to sue, which was led accordingly.

Thereafter, on 8th January 1908, the Lord Ordinary repelled the first plea in law for the defenders, and found the pursuers entitled to expenses since 5th December 1907, and remitted the account to the Auditor.

On 10th January 1908 the Lord Ordinary, after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, sustained the fifth plea in law for the defenders, and sisted the process to allow the matters in dispute to be determined by arbitration, reserving the question of expenses.

On 18th February 1908 the pursuers moved for approval of the Auditor's report on their account of expenses, and for decree in name of the agents-disbursers. The Lord Ordinary superseded consideration of this motion, and granted leave to reclaim.

The pursuers reclaimed. The case was heard before the Second Division on 30th May 1908.

Argued for the pursuers and reclaimers;—A law-agent was entitled to a preference on the expenses recovered from his client's opponent,¹ because these expenses formed a fund which had been brought into existence by the exertions of the agent. Decree in name of an agent-disburser was withheld only in cases where the effect of granting it would be to deprive the opponent of a right to set off a decree for taxed expenses against the expenses for which he had been found liable.² The principle was compensation, and compensation could operate only as between two liquid claims. In the present case the defenders' claim was not liquid, it had not even come into existence. Accordingly decree should be granted in name of the agents-disbursers.

Argued for the defenders and respondents;—Decree in name of an agent-disburser would be withheld in cases where the effect of granting it would be to deprive the opposing party of a right to set off a claim for expenses against the expenses for which he had been found liable. It was not necessary that the opponent's claim should be liquid.¹ Here the merits of the case had not been disposed of. If May 30, 1908. the defenders were successful on the merits, and were found entitled to expenses, they would have a claim which they would be entitled to set off against the expenses for which decree was now sought. The Lord Ordinary's judgment, therefore, was right. Hugh Nelson & Co., v. Glasgow Corporation.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If the question before us were whether the course taken by the Lord Ordinary was competent, I should hold that it was quite competent. I can easily see that there might be circumstances in a particular case in which the Lord Ordinary might be justified in doing what he has done here. But I must say, that taking the facts of this case as they are presented to us, I think that decree should be granted in name of the agents-disbursers. The history of the case is very simple. The pursuers brought this action against the defenders to obtain payment of the sum of £750. The first plea with which they were met was the plea of no title to sue. That led to a proof which must have cost a considerable sum of money, with the result that the plea was held to be a bad plea and was repelled, the pursuers being found entitled to expenses. When the pursuers moved for approval of the Auditor's report and for decree in name of the agents-disbursers, the Lord Ordinary took the course of superseding consideration of that motion, in respect that the merits of the case have still to be disposed of, and that the pursuers may fail and be found liable in expenses to the defenders. I know of no case in which such a course has ever been followed. The pursuers have been successful after incurring considerable expense, a great part of which must have been borne by the agents. To say that the agents are not to get decree for expenses already incurred, because the pursuers may ultimately be found liable to the defenders in expenses on the completion of the litigation, does not seem to me to be reasonable. I think that this is a case where we ought to carry out what the Lord Ordinary has done in finding the pursuers entitled to expenses, by granting decree in name of the agents-disbursers.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This is a matter of procedure, and I quite recognise that in such cases it is undesirable to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary. But here it is evident that the Lord Ordinary must have thought the expenses of the proof a separable matter, because he found the pursuers entitled to these expenses. Then the Lord Ordinary was moved by the defenders to supersede consideration of the pursuers' motion for decree in name of the agents-disbursers, and he superseded consideration. That was a matter of discretion, no doubt. But it was impossible for us to deal with the reclaiming note without hearing what the defenders' counsel had to say in explanation of the request which they made to supersede consideration of the pursuers' motion. The only explanation that was given was that as against the pursuers' liquid claim there might arise in an arbitration a counter claim for expenses in favour of the defenders. I never heard of a counter claim which might arise being dealt with as if it had already arisen. I think that the course which the Lord Ordinary has taken sins against the rule that compensation can only operate when you have two liquid claims.

May 30, 1908. I think, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and decree granted in name of the agents-disbursers.

Hugh Nelson
& Co., v.
Glasgow
Corporation.

LORD LOW.—I think it was clearly recognised in the case of *Oliver*¹ that extract of a decree for expenses may be superseded if another litigation is going on between the same parties in which a cross award of expenses may be made. If that be so when different actions are going on, I think it must also be so when an incidental award of expenses is made during the course of an action. What the Lord Ordinary has done is practically to supersede extract on the ground that a counter claim for expenses may arise. I have no doubt that that was a competent course to follow, and, as incidental expenses in the Outer-House are very much in the discretion of the Lord Ordinary, I confess I should always be slow to interfere with what the Lord Ordinary has done. But the Lord Ordinary evidently recognised that this was a matter on which the parties were entitled to take the judgment of the Inner-House, because he granted leave to reclaim, which he was not bound to do. That leaves us free to consider the case on its merits, and so considering it, I think it is one in which there should be decree in name of the agents-disbursers.

LORD ARDWALL.—The only cases cited to us in which a motion for decree in the name of the agent-disbursers for expenses which have been found due has been refused have been those in which there was a then existing right of set-off for expenses already found due to the other party, and the ground for refusing the motion was that that existing right would be injured if the motion were granted. But no case has been cited to us in which a motion for decree in the name of the agents-disbursers has been refused merely because there might possibly arise, either in the same or in another action, a claim for expenses on the other side. In the case of Oliver v. Wilkie,¹ where two actions were in dependence between the same parties, the facts were that an interlocutor in each of the separate actions was pronounced on the same day. And in one of the actions the Court found that the pursuer's expenses were of a certain amount, but found that she was not entitled to obtain decree therefor in her agent's name in respect that the defender was entitled to set off the expenses due to him in the other action. The whole question there dealt with, therefore, was as to two sets of expenses both presently due, and the observations in certain of the Judges' opinions as to supersession of extract were not strictly necessary for the decision of the case. What was said in these opinions was that if two actions were running side by side, extract of the principal decree in the one action might be superseded until decree should be pronounced in the other action. That, certainly, is a competent course for the Court to take. But it is only if it is clearly shewn that one of the parties will be unjustly prejudiced that that course will be adopted, because when once a party has been found entitled to expenses he has a right to obtain extract of the decree, and it is only for very strong reasons that he will be deprived of that right. No such reasons have been shewn in the present case, and, accordingly, I think the pursuers' motion should be granted.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Recall the May 30, 1903. said interlocutor, and remit the cause to the said Lord Ordinary to approve of the Auditor's report on the pursuers' account of expenses, No. 68 of process, to decern for the taxed amount thereof in name of the agents-disbursers, and to proceed therein: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses since 18th February 1908," &c.

Succession—Trust—Directions to purchase annuities—Right of beneficiary to payment of the capital—Government Annuities.—A testator directed his executor or his trustees to invest certain sums in the purchase of annuities in the name and for the benefit of certain persons. He further provided: "And I declare that all annuities . . . shall be purchased by him or them from the British Government or from the Scottish Widows' Insurance Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, in Scotland, and any other first-class company or annuity office as my said executor or . . . trustees shall in this behalf think fit." There was no declaration that the annuities were to be alimentary, but Government annuities, purchased under the Government Annuities Act, 1853, are not assignable except on the insolvency or bankruptcy of the annuitant.

The beneficiaries having called on the trustees to pay over the principal sums instead of investing them in the purchase of annuities, held that the beneficiaries were entitled to payment of the principal sums.

ROBERT BLACKBURN TURNER, a domiciled Scotsman, of Goosery, 1st Division, Bengal, India, died in India on 17th March 1906. He left a will whereby he appointed the Administrator-General of Bengal for the time being to be his sole executor, and also appointed the Rev. Hugh Mair, the Rev. Gilbert Lawrie, and James B. Goold, all of whom were resident in Scotland, to be his trustees for certain purposes therein mentioned. He directed his executor, inter alia, to "pay to my Scotch trustees hereinafter named the sum of Rs.10,000, to be invested by them in the purchase of an annuity or annuities in the name and for the benefit of Margaret Fernie, at present residing at Glasgow, in Scotland, for her life." He further directed his executor to pay to his Scotch trustees "a sum sufficient for the purposes next mentioned, to be held by them on and for the trusts hereinafter declared." These trust purposes were declared to be, inter alia:—" (1) To set apart three several sums of Rs.15,000 each, and to invest each of the said three sums of Rs.15,000 in the purchase of three several annuities, that is Rs.15,000 to be expended in the purchase of each such annuity, one in the name and for the benefit of my sister Jane Wilson, the wife of William Wilson, residing at Possil Park, in Glasgow aforesaid, another for the benefit and in the name of my sister Jane Fleming, the widow of Joseph Fleming, of Glasgow aforesaid, and the third for the benefit and in the name of my sister Martha Morgan, the wife of James Morgan, at present residing in Slottville, in the State of New York, in the United States of America."

May 30, 1908.

Turner's
Trustees v.
Ferne.

The will also contained this provision:—"And I declare that all annuities which by this my will I direct to be purchased by my executor or my Scotch trustees shall be purchased by him or them from the British Government or from the Scottish Widows' Insurance Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, in Scotland, and any other first-class company or annuity office, as my said executor or Scotch trustees shall in this behalf think fit, and that such annuities shall be made payable to the persons in whose names and for whose benefit they have respectively been purchased, in equal half-yearly or quarterly portions, and shall be enjoyed by them respectively as their respective separate property, free from the control of any husband to whom any of them respectively may be married." The will contained no provision that the annuities should be alimentary or non-assignable.

The Scotch trustees duly accepted office, and received payment from the executor of the sums necessary for the purchase of the fore-said annuities; but before any of the annuities had been purchased the annuitants called upon the trustees to pay over to them the respective capital sums instead of investing them in annuities.

The trustees being in doubt as to whether they were bound or entitled to make such payment, a special case was, on 12th December 1907, presented for the opinion of the Court. To the special case the Scotch trustees were the first parties, and the four annuitants were the second parties.

Besides a narrative of the facts above set forth, the special case contained the following statements:—"6. The purchase of Government annuities is mainly regulated by the Acts 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 45, and 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 51, section 2. Section 25 of the former Act provides that 'the right, title, interest and benefit in and to any annuity . . . purchased under the provisions of this Act shall not be assignable by the original proprietor thereof so as to enable the assignee to receive the same during the lifetime of the said proprietor, except in case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of an individual proprietor, when the same shall become the property of his or her assignee or assignees for the benefit of his or her creditors.' The section further provides that in case of any such bankruptcy or insolvency, the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt shall repurchase and cancel the annuity, the receipt of the assignee or assignees to the Commissioners being constituted a sufficient discharge thereof.

"7. The first parties have ascertained that, according to the practice of the department with regard to annuities issued by it, while the right to an annuity itself cannot, apart from insolvency or bankruptcy, be assigned, the half-yearly payments are made either to annuitants themselves or parties holding powers of attorney granted by annuitants; and further, that under their regulations the department cannot, or at any rate will not, grant a bond of annuity containing a clause that the annuity shall be strictly alimentary and shall exclude a trustee in bankruptcy."

The contentions of the parties were stated to be:—"In these circumstances the first parties maintain that they are not bound to pay over said sums to the second parties, and that they are bound to purchase the annuities on behalf of the second parties, or otherwise, that they are entitled in their discretion to purchase annuities for the second parties, or such of them as they may consider proper. The second parties respectively maintain that having intimated a demand for payment of the said capital sums, viz., Rs.10,000 to the said ^{May 30, 1908.} Margaret Fernie, and Rs.15,000 to each of the said Mrs Jane Wilson, Mrs Janet Fleming, and Mrs Martha Morgan, the first parties, ^{Turner's} as Trustees v. ^{Fernie.} trustees foresaid, are bound to make payment of said sums to them, after deduction of the legacy-duty payable to the Government and the interest thereon and the expenses of this case, and that in lieu and place of the annuities directed to be purchased for them under the will of the said Robert Blackburn Turner."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—“(1) Are the first parties bound to purchase annuities for behoof of the second parties as directed by the will? (2) Are the first parties entitled in their discretion to purchase annuities for behoof of the second parties or such of them as they shall consider proper? (3) Are the first parties bound to make payment to the second parties respectively of the capital sums directed to be invested in the purchase of annuities on their behalf?”

The case was heard on 30th May 1908.

Argued for the first parties;—The trustees did not feel in safety to pay over the principal sums in view of the decision in Hutchinson's Trustees v. Young.¹ There was a special direction to the trustees here, in their discretion, to purchase Government annuities, and these annuities were in certain circumstances non-assignable. The testator, therefore, must be held to have contemplated and provided for the protection of the beneficiaries' provisions, and that brought the case within the application of the principle of the decision in Hutchinson's Trustees.¹ In *Tod v. Tod's Trustees*² and *Murray v. Macfarlane's Trustees*³ the restrictions were only in general terms, and there was no provision for the purchase of non-assignable annuities, and therefore these cases were distinguishable. In any event, *Hutchinson's Trustees*¹ was the more recent decision, and must rule. As to a beneficiary's freedom to deal with a restricted annuity, the case of *Cosens v. Stevenson*⁴ was referred to.

Counsel for the second parties were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late Mr Blackburn Turner left a will, the material provisions of which, so far as the questions before your Lordships are concerned, are these,—he directed his executors to pay to certain Scotch trustees Rs.10,000 to be invested by them in the purchase of an annuity or annuities in the name and for the benefit of Miss Margaret Fernie. He further directed his executors to pay to these trustees a sum sufficient to enable them to set apart three sums of Rs.15,000 each, to be invested in the purchase of annuities in the name and for the benefit of three other ladies, whom he there named. Then, near the end of the will, he made this declaration,—“that all annuities which by this my will I direct to be purchased by my executor or my Scotch trustees shall be purchased by him or them from the British Government or from the Scottish Widows' Insurance Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, in Scotland, and any other first-class company or annuity office, as my said executor or Scotch trustees shall in this behalf think fit.”

These ladies now come forward, and they ask the trustees to pay over to

May 30, 1908. them the capital sums mentioned in the will, because they say that they do not desire to receive them in the form of annuities, as provided for in the will, it being their intention, should they receive them in that form, to realise the annuities and possess themselves of the capital sums. In fact, Turner's Trustees v. Fernie. the situation here is exactly like the situation that existed in the case of Tod's Trustees.¹ The trustees, however, have felt bound to resist that proposal, professedly on the authority of the decision in the recent case of Hutchinson's Trustees.²

I confess if the matter had to be considered in the light of these two decisions I would have found a difficulty in reconciling the case of *Hutchinson*² with the case of Tod,¹ and if the matter were to come up in a form requiring it, I think it would be necessary that these decisions should be reconsidered. But here I think no such necessity arises, for the present case is easily distinguishable from that of Hutchinson.² I think the decision in the case of *Hutchinson*² went on the ground that the Judges found there an expressed anxiety on the part of the testator to protect the legacies she was giving, i.e., not to give the legacies in the form of a capital sum to the beneficiaries. There that anxiety was extracted from two provisions in the will. First, no option was given to the trustees—they were to purchase Government or Savings Bank annuities only. Secondly, the annuities were declared to be strictly alimentary. Here neither of these provisions is present. The direction in the will to purchase Government annuities is not specific as it was in Hutchinson; ² it is merely mentioned as one of several investments that the trustees may in their discretion make. In other words, the mention of Government annuities can in no way be attributed to a desire for cutting down the rights of the annuitants; it is obviously introduced for the sole purpose of ensuring the safety of the provision. And there is no declaration that the annuities are to be alimentary only. That seems to take the present case out of the circumstances that had to be considered in the case of Hutchinson,² and to bring it into line with *Tod*¹ and many other cases in which a similar decision has been arrived at. That leads me to the conclusion that the beneficiaries here are entitled to what they ask.

I reserve my opinion as to the difficulty of reconciling the case of *Hutchinson*² with that of Tod.¹ But if this matter should come up again in a form requiring the reconsideration of the more recent decision, I think that greater attention should be given to the differences between the various classes of Government annuities than seems to have been done in the case of Hutchinson.²

LORD M'LAREN.—If the testator had shewn by the use of the word "alimentary" that it was his desire to give some protection to the objects of his gift, and had limited the trustees to such Government annuities as were non-assignable, I should have thought there was some substance in the argument—that is to say, that the trustees were bound to carry out the testator's direction to buy non-assignable annuities, and so to give the annuitants such protection as that class of annuities would afford. I wish to reserve my opinion on such a case as I have indicated, as also in regard May 30, 1908. to the case where a testator has conferred on his trustees a discretion to make the annuity alimentary.

I see no evidence, however, that this testator in directing his trustees to buy annuities intended anything more than to bestow these annuities as a convenient form of investment. There is no indication that he thought these ladies were likely to run into debt or to require protection by way of restriction, and that, I think, is why the annuities he selected were such as might be realised by the annuitants.

In these circumstances the principle of *Tod v. Tod's Trustees*¹ and other cases, such as White's Trustees v. Whyte,² is, I think, clearly applicable, because the Court ought not to compel a beneficiary to accept a gift in a disadvantageous form when it is in his power, by calling it up, to obtain possession of the principal sum.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. This testator has left sums of money to certain ladies, and he has given them the sole and exclusive right therein, so that no one else has any interest whatever in the sum so bequeathed, and there is no restriction or limitation whatever on the absolute right given to the legatees. I think it clear we cannot infer a direction to trustees to restrict the rights of an annuitant from the duty to select a good investment, even although among the investments favoured by the testator there may be one which would make it more difficult for the annuitants to sell or assign their annuities. If a testator wishes to impose on trustees a duty to restrict the rights of a beneficiary, he must do so in plain terms. There are many cases in which a discretion of this kind has been given to trustees for the protection of beneficiaries; but to infer such a discretion solely from the existence of a power to select one of several investments is, I think, out of the question.

As to the power to select investments, it was given, I think, for the ordinary and material purpose of securing safety; and accordingly the trustees are directed to purchase from the Government or from a first-class company or annuity office. The beneficiaries demand payment of the money which it is proposed to sink on the purchase of annuities; and since there is nothing in the will to prevent their turning the annuities into money if they please, it is for them to determine whether it is more for their advantage to take these legacies in the one form or in the other. I think the case of Tod v. Tod's Trustees,¹ which follows a long series of decisions, is sufficient authority for declaring that the beneficiaries are entitled to what they demand.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT answered the third question in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the other questions.

Company—Members and their Liability—Agreement to take Shares—Illegal issue of Shares—Condition of setting off calls against fees to be earned—Ultra vires—Contract.—A applied for shares in a company, and paid the amount due on application, on the express condition that the firm of which he was a member should be appointed to a certain office, and that he should be at liberty to pay up the balance due upon his shares by fees to be earned by the firm. Before the balance had been paid the company went into liquidation. The company and its liquidator sued A for the amount unpaid upon his shares.

Held that it was ultra vires of the directors to agree to the stipulation as to payment for the shares, and therefore that the defender was not a shareholder and was entitled to absolvitor.

Pellatt's case, 1867, L. R., 2 Ch. Ap. 527, followed.

Company—Members and their Liability—Agreement to take Shares—Conditional Application—Contract—Condition—Precedent or Subsequent—Appointment to office.—A applied for shares in a company, his letter of application containing the following condition:—"This application is made on the distinct understanding . . . that my firm is appointed surveyors to this company over an average radius of thirty miles from Edinburgh . . . and that my firm is also appointed advisory surveyors to the Advisory Board for Scotland at fees to be adjusted." He paid the amount due on application. His firm obtained the appointment as surveyors for the Edinburgh district, but were never made advisory surveyors to the Board for Scotland, the company having gone into liquidation before that Board was constituted.

Opinions that the application was one for an immediate allotment of shares provided the company agreed to the conditions specified, and that the condition as to the advisory surveyorship was not a condition precedent but subsequent and collateral to the contract, and meant that A's firm should obtain the appointment when the Board was constituted.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Guthrie.

THE NATIONAL HOUSE PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1906 inclusive, and having its registered office at Bristol, and James Mills Franklin, the liquidator of the Company, brought an action against John Watson, architect, 24 Castle Street, Edinburgh, in which they concluded for payment of the sum of £87, 10s. as the amount of the call due by him as at 28th June 1906 on 50 preference shares of £1 each and 50 ordinary shares of £1 each, which they averred he held in the Company.

The National House Property Investment Company, Limited, was incorporated on 29th December 1902. In February 1903, following upon negotiations between Mr Brooks, the managing director of the National House Property Investment Company, Limited, and the defender, the defender applied for 50 preference and 50 ordinary shares in the Company, paying at the same time the sum of £12, 10s., the amount due on application. His letter of application bore this endorsement:—"This application is made on the distinct understanding, as arranged with Mr Brooks, that my firm (M'Arthy & Watson) is appointed surveyors to this Company over an average radius of thirty miles from Edinburgh, the fees to be not less than those adopted by the English surveyors for the Company, and that my firm is also appointed advisory surveyors to the Advisory Board for Scotland at fees to be adjusted; also that I am to be at liberty, if June 5, 1908. I so desire it, to pay up the balance of my shares by allowing the fees to be earned by my firm to accumulate for this purpose."

The shares thus applied for by the defender were allotted to him. In February 1903 the defender received from Mr Brooks a letter, dated 18th February 1903, which contained the following paragraph:—"I have pleasure in sending herewith copy of resolution passed at the board meeting to-day. 'It was proposed by Mr E. J. White and seconded by Mr N. A. Jones that Messrs M'Arthy & Watson be appointed valuers for this Company in the Edinburgh district, and that their application for shares be accepted upon the terms contained on the back of said application.'"

v. Watson.

In reply to a request made in April 1903 for payment of the amount due on allotment of the shares applied for by him, the defender replied that in accordance with the conditions in his application he elected that any balance payable on the shares should be paid out of fees; and, the request having subsequently been repeated, he wrote a letter to the Company's secretary, dated 15th July, in the following terms:—"We would point out that we decided to apply for shares in your Company after certain representations made to us by Mr Brooks, and on specific conditions as stated in our application. As you are now unable to comply with these conditions, we shall feel obliged by your returning our applications, along with your cheque for the amount of our deposits plus the interest for the time you have had the money. In the event of your forming a Scottish Board later on, we are quite prepared to again consider the matter."

The directors of the Company never formed an Advisory Board for Scotland, and never appointed the defender's firm as advisory surveyors. Between July 1903 and November 1905 the defender on several occasions wrote to the Company demanding the return of his deposit on the ground that the Company had failed to comply with the conditions contained in his letter of application.

In April 1906 the Company went into voluntary liquidation, and James Mills Franklin was appointed liquidator.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The sum sued for being due and resting owing, the pursuers are entitled to decree, with interest and expenses as craved. (2) No relevant defence.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender never became a member of the pursuers' Company, and is not liable to pay calls in respect . . . (b) that his application for shares was subject to conditions precedent which have never been purified; and (3) that the alleged agreement to take shares was ultra vires of the Company, and is not binding on the defender.

On 26th August 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie), after hearing counsel in the Procedure-roll, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assolzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns."*

* "OPINION.—The pursuing Company and its liquidator seek to have the defender made liable as a member of the Company now in liquidation.

"The defender denies the alleged membership on two grounds. He says, first, that in gremio of his application for shares was a condition precedent which has not been fulfilled, and second, that the alleged contract between him and the Company contained a condition which was ultra vires of the Company, and therefore that the contract was not enforceable by them.

"The pursuers reply to the first line of defence that the condition in

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The condition as to the appointment to the advisory surveyorship was not a condition precedent and suspensive, but subsequent and collateral. Its non-fulfilment could, at most, form the ground of an action of damages. This was clearly the defender's view prior to the present action, for when he applied for his shares he paid the amount due on application, and, when subsequently asked for a further payment, he did not state that he was not a shareholder, but merely intimated that he would pay in fees to be earned in the future. The criterion applicable in this class of cases was given by Lord Cairns in Elkington's case,¹ viz., was there a de presenti intention to become a shareholder with a collateral agreement as to the effect of so becoming, or was there only an intention to become a shareholder if and when a preliminary condition should be performed? The former was clearly the case here. The cases² relied on by the defender were all distinguished from the question was collateral or subsequent, not precedent, and to the second line of defence that none of the conditions were ultra vires. I think that the defence is well founded on both points.

"(1) Was there a condition precedent in the contract to take shares which was not fulfilled?

"It is admitted (1) that the conditions printed in statement 2 of the defender's statement of facts, whether precedent or not, were duly made part of the contract; (2) that the first of these conditions, providing for the appointment of the defender's firm of M'Arthy & Watson as Edinburgh and district surveyors or valuers was duly fulfilled; and (3) that the third condition as to the method of paying up the balance of the shares was not a condition precedent.

"The question then of condition precedent arises only in regard to the second condition, which runs as follows:—'That my firm is also appointed advisory surveyors to the Advisory Board for Scotland, at fees to be adjusted.' Was that a condition precedent or a condition subsequent? The nature of this question is precisely defined by Lord Cairns in Elkington's case, L. R., 2 Ch. 511, 522 (1867)—'The real point for determination in this case might be said to be this,—Did Messrs Elkington intend and agree to become members and shareholders in presenti with a collateral agreement as to what should be the effect of their so becoming shareholders? or, on the other hand, did Messrs Elkington agree, that if and when a certain preliminary condition should be performed; and not otherwise, they would become members and shareholders?' There are no Scotch cases directly applicable; summing up the English cases, the question may be expressed thus, does the second of the above conditions fall under the rule of condition precedent given effect to in Wood's case, 3 De Gex & Jones, 85 (1858); Pellatt's case, L. R., 2 Ch. 527 (1867); Simpson's case, L. R., 4 Ch. 184 (1869); and Rogers' case, L. R., 3 Ch. 633 (1868), or under the rule of condition subsequent or collateral, that is an agreement apart from and collateral to a concluded agreement to become a member, given effect to in Elkington's case, L. R., 2 Ch. 511 (1867); Bridger's case (1870), L. R., 5 Ch. 305; Wheatcroft's case (1873), 29 Law Times, 324; and Fisher's case (1885), L. R., 31 Ch. Div. 120?

"On this question I cannot distinguish between conditions one and two. It seems clear that the intention of parties was that there was to be no con-present by the fact that in them in some way or other it was otherwise apparent (apart from the question of the effect of the particular condition in each) that there had been no consensus in idem between the parties, e.g., no proper allotment, and no proper acceptance. Here there was only a collateral agreement, of which there had been no breach, since the advisory board had never been constituted, but even if there had been a breach a claim for damages could not be set off against the liquidator's calls.¹ There was nothing ultra vires on the part of the directors in the agreement that fees might be set off against calls. Some such agreement was to be found in most of the cases cited. It was said that it was an agreement to issue shares for a consideration other than cash, but that was no longer illegal, section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867,² having been superseded by section 7 of the Companies Act, 1900.³ The dicta in *Pellatt's case*⁴ as to ultra vires were obiter.

Argued for the defender and respondent;—The Lord Ordinary was right upon both points. Properly construed, the agreement was one to take shares if and when the firm received the appointment. The appointment never having been made the defender had never become a shareholder.⁵ The cases where it had been held that persons were shareholders were either cases in which the conditions were such ex sua natura as could only be fulfilled after they had become shareholders,⁶ or cases in which conditions, which were tract unless the defender's firm received the local appointment. Shares were applied for not for the ordinary purposes of investment or speculation but in connection with and for the promotion of the business of the defender's firm. But this consideration applies equally to the advisory surveyorship to the Advisory Board for Scotland. It may be that, if the defender's firm had accepted the local appointment, without insisting on the obligation as to the advisory surveyorship being first fulfilled, the defender would be held to have waived his right to treat the latter as a condition precedent. Equally, if the defender, as in Elkington's case, L. R., 2 Ch. 511 (1867), had accepted allotment and paid the money due on allotment, he could not thereafter have founded on the conditions being precedent. But he refused to pay the allotment money, and he insisted that both conditions must be treated as conditions precedent. I think he was right in this. The Company called itself by the ambiguous title 'National,' but its registered office was in England, and all the subscribers to the memorandum and all the original directors were resident in England. It was only if such a Company established a regular Scottish business that the defender's firm of architects would have any reasonable interest to take shares.

"There was therefore, in my opinion, no such agreement to become a member as is necessary under the 23d section of the 1862 Act.

"(2) Was the condition ultra vires?

"I see no answer to this objection. It seems to me that all the considerations stated by Lord Cairns in Pellatt's case, L. R., 2 Ch. 527 (1867), apply in this case, with the result that the conditions, being ultra vires, vitiated the contract."

originally precedent were treated by the parties as subsequent and collateral.¹ At anyrate, the condition setting off calls against fees was ultra vires of the directors.² There was no difference in principle between setting off calls against goods to be supplied² and setting them off against fees to be earned. *Pellatt's case*² came under the notice of the Court in Black's case,³ and was regarded as authoritative upon the point by Buckley.⁴

LORD LOW.—I confess that I have difficulty in adopting the view of the Lord Ordinary that the second condition upon which the defender applied for shares in the pursuers' company (namely, that his firm should be appointed advisory surveyors to the Advisory Board for Scotland) was a condition precedent.

The first condition—that the defender's firm should be appointed surveyors to the pursuers in the Edinburgh district—was one which could be fulfilled at once, but the constitution of an Advisory Board for Scotland was a matter which necessarily required time, and there was nothing to be gained by appointing an advisory surveyor to the Advisory Board until that Board came into existence. That was the view which was taken by the pursuers, because by the resolution which the directors passed the defender's firm was then appointed valuers for the Company in the Edinburgh district, and the other conditions for which he had stipulated were simply accepted. That obviously meant that the directors agreed to appoint the defender's firm advisory surveyors to the Scotch Advisory Board when that body was formed. I think that that was all that the defender could ask, because I cannot read his application as meaning that the allotment of shares to him should be postponed for an indefinite time until an Advisory Board should actually be formed. In the first place, the application itself was for an immediate allotment of shares, and the amount due on application, and requisite to entitle the applicant to an immediate allotment, was paid. Further, it is to be remembered that apparently there was nothing to prevent the pursuers doing business in the Edinburgh district, if occasion offered, even before an Advisory Board was constituted; and by applying for an immediate allotment of shares, and obtaining an immediate appointment as local surveyor, the defender was in a position to obtain the benefit of any business which might be done. Accordingly, I read the application as being an application for an immediate allotment of shares if the pursuers agreed to the conditions annexed.

For the reasons which I have given I think the pursuers did agree to these conditions. They certainly intended to do so; and (what is more important) it is evident that the defender was satisfied with the resolution passed by the directors as being an acceptance of the conditions. I say so because in answering a letter from the pursuers' secretary asking for payment of the amount due on allotment, the defender did not suggest that the conditions upon which he had agreed to become a shareholder had not yet

condition, which was that he should be entitled to pay off the balance due upon his shares by allowing fees to be earned by his firm to be accumulated.

If, therefore, the only defence to the action had been that the formation of an Advisory Board for Scotland and the appointment of the defender's firm as surveyors to that Board was a preliminary condition which must be performed before the defender would become a shareholder in the Company, I should have thought that the defence had not been established. I think, however, that a complete defence is furnished by the third condition to which I have referred. It is expressed in these terms: "I am to be at liberty, if I so desire it, to pay up the balance of my shares by allowing the fees to be earned by my firm to accumulate for this purpose."

The defender paid to the pursuers the sum of £12, 10s., being the amount of 2s. 6d. per share due on application for an allotment of shares, but when he was asked to pay the additional sum of 2s. 6d. per share upon the shares allotted to him, he intimated that he elected to "allow our fees to accumulate to meet the balance payable on our shares."

The pursuers argued that the condition in regard to fees amounted to no more than this—that if the defender's firm should be employed and should actually earn fees, the defender should be entitled, instead of demanding payment of the fees, to allow the pursuers to retain them, and to attribute them to account of, or, so far as necessary, in payment of, calls. If that was all that was meant I hardly think that any special agreement was necessary, because if at the time when a call was made the pursuers were due to the defender in fees a sum equal to the amount of the call, I think that he would be entitled, without any special agreement, to set the amount due by the pursuers to him against the amount due by him to them, unless, it may be, the Company was in liquidation. It is to be remembered that when the application for shares was made the pursuers had never done any business in Scotland, and, notwithstanding their utmost endeavours, might not be able to establish a business there. In these circumstances the object of the conditions with which the defender qualified his application for shares was, on the one hand, to secure employment for his firm in the event of the pursuers doing business in Scotland, and, on the other hand, to protect himself against loss in the event of business not being done; and he attained the latter object (as I read the conditions) by stipulating that he should not be bound to pay calls in cash, but that the pursuers should be entitled to retain and accumulate any fees which might become due to him until the calls were in that way extinguished.

If that be a sound view, then the pursuers would not be entitled to decree for immediate payment of the sums sued for, even although the defender had become a shareholder, but would only be entitled to accumulate any fees which might be earned by the defender's firm to meet his liability upon the shares. I think, however, that the defender is entitled to absolver, because, in my opinion, the agreement in regard to fees was ultra vires of the directors. I think that the present case is, in principle, indistinguishable from *Pellatt's case*¹ (In re Richmond Hill Hotel Company). In that case, Pellatt, who was a glass and china merchant, agreed to take fifty shares in the hotel company, paying 70s. on application and 30s. on allotment, while the hotel company agreed to purchase the glass and china goods required by them from Pellatt, and that all calls on the shares after allotment should be placed to his credit to account of goods to be supplied by him. Pellatt refused to carry out the agreement, and the company having gone into liquidation, the question arose whether he was liable to be placed on the list of contributories. It was held that he was not, because it was ultra vires of the directors to agree that calls should be set off against goods to be supplied.

In giving judgment Lord Cairns said,—“Without laying down any general rule, but looking only to the particular circumstances of this case, I entertain a strong opinion that the contract was ultra vires. The intention of the Act is, that shares shall be held as shares wholly or in part paid up, or not paid up at all, and that so far as they are not paid up the ordinary liability to pay up the remainder in cash, when required, should attach on the holder of them; and it is required to be entered in the register how much is paid up on them. If some consideration is given it may be quite right for the directors to state on the register that they are to be treated as part paid up, though no money has passed; but I do not think it within their power to contract that the calls in respect of what remains to be paid up shall be set off against goods to be supplied by the shareholder, and shall not be paid in money. The inconvenience arising from such a contract might be almost incalculable. Goods might not be supplied at all, or they might be supplied of such a quality that they ought to be rejected, and the remedies against the shareholder might be unavailable while the other shareholders had all along been paying in cash.”

I think that these considerations are directly applicable here. I see no difference in principle between setting off calls against goods to be supplied, and setting them off against fees for services to be rendered, and accordingly I am of opinion that it was ultra vires of the directors to agree to the stipulation in question. But if that be so, then the whole contract is vitiated, and cannot be enforced either by or against the Company.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right in assoilzieing the defender.

Process—Interlocutor—Alteration of interlocutor—Timeous Application.—Observed (per the Lord President),—"When an interlocutor is signed and given out to the parties it must be noted by the profession that if anything is to be said about altering the form of it, it must be said at once."

DAVID M'ALLISTER KENNEDY and John Kennedy, 36 Oswald ^{1st} Division. Street, Glasgow, the registered owners of the steamship "Welshman," presented a petition to the Court under secs. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894,* for limitation of their liability for loss and damage arising out of a collision between the "Welshman" and the "Portland"; and the Court appointed consignation of £2596, 16s., with interest, being the whole sum for which, on the tonnage of the ship, the petitioners were liable.

Claims on this fund were lodged for the owners, officers, and crew of the "Portland," and for various cargo owners who had shipped goods in the "Portland." As their claims amounted in cumulo to a sum exceeding the consigned fund, the Court remitted to Mr Richard Clancey, average adjuster, to adjust and settle the claims, and to report.

Mr Clancey having reported, and certain objections to his report on the part of some of the claimants having been disposed of, the Court, on 18th March 1908, pronounced an interlocutor granting warrant to the bank with which the money was consigned to pay to the claimants the sums to which they had been found entitled, and containing this finding as to expenses:—"Find the petitioners liable in expenses to the respective claimants, including the expense of the remit to Mr Clancey and the procedure thereunder, and the objections to his report, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report."

The Auditor having taxed the accounts and lodged his reports, the petitioners presented a note of objections to a number of items allowed by the Auditor, on the ground that only one set of cargo owners should get their full expenses; and argued (on 2d June 1908) that the petitioners should not have to pay the expenses of the competition between the claimants, in which they had no interest; that although the Court had absolute discretion under sec. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act as to awarding costs, yet the rule laid down in *Burrell v. Simpson & Co.*¹ was the just rule, and should be followed here, and therefore only one set of cargo owners should get full expenses, while the others should only get the expenses of preparing and lodging their claims and of one appearance to take decree.

At advising on 5th June 1908,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have looked into the case of Burrell v. Simpson,¹ and I draw attention to the fact that, while the form of interlocutor here is “Find the petitioners liable in expenses to the respective claimants, including the expenses of the remit to Mr Clancey and the procedure thereunder, and the objections to his report,” the interlocutor in *Burrell*¹ was “Find the petitioner liable to the claimants in the expenses of this process, except such expenses, if any, as have been solely occasioned by the discussion between the claimants.” I do not lay stress on the fact that the word “respective” does not occur in the interlocutor in Burrell,¹ while it does in this, but the true difference lies in the express inclusion of the expenses of the remit and procedure thereunder.

If this matter had been raised when the decree was given I do not think that the interlocutor would have been pronounced in its present form. Where no question is raised as to the right of petitioners to have their liability limited, and where the ship, as it were, tables its stake, then such expenses as are given against the petitioners over and above the limited fund must be restricted to the expenses of lodging the claims and taking decree, and not extended to any expenses incurred in the competition between the claimants. Here the various accounts were given in, and I find from an examination of them that the way they were treated was this: Most of them were passed, but some of them were docked, and one I notice was increased. Now, that seems to me to be clearly competition.

But I want to say this, and I hope it will be noted and remembered by the profession, that where a discussion has taken place and the Court pronounces an interlocutor following on the discussion, the Court is responsible for that interlocutor. But where there has been no discussion, although the Court is of course technically responsible for the interlocutor, in practice it signs whatever interlocutor is handed up to it. Now, of course, the time is long passed when insuperable difficulties would be raised to the alteration of an interlocutor that had once been signed. But when an interlocutor is signed and given out to the parties it must be noted by the profession that if anything is to be said about altering the form of it, it must be said at once. If this question as to the liability for expenses had been brought up at once I do not think the Court would have allowed this interlocutor to remain in its present form. But it is far too late to raise the question now June 5, 1908. when the interlocutor has been allowed to stand, and the whole matter has been before the Auditor. I am afraid, therefore, we can do nothing to give the petitioners the relief they ask for.

Hemming v.
Galbraith.

Bankruptcy—Termination of Bankruptcy—Payment of Composition—Discharge of Trustee—Action of accounting at instance of bankrupt against discharged trustee—Competency—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 141 and 142.—A bankruptcy had been terminated on payment of a composition, and the trustee, after the statutory audit of his accounts by the Commissioners, had been discharged. Thereafter the bankrupt brought an action of accounting under sec. 142 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, against the trustee, calling on him to account for his whole intrusions with the estate.

Held that it was not competent to call on the trustee to account twice over for the same intrusions; and as there were no averments that the intrusions called in question had not already been adjudicated on by the Commissioners, action dismissed as irrelevant.

Opinion (per Lord Kinnear) that if a bankrupt desires to call on the trustee for an accounting under sec. 142 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, he must do so before the trustee has been discharged.

THE estates of Fred Oliver Hemming, hardware merchant, Leith, were sequestered on 18th January 1907, and William Brodie Galbraith, C.A., Glasgow, was elected trustee in the sequestration. On 15th March 1907 the bankrupt submitted to a meeting of his creditors an offer of a composition of 6s. per £1, and at a subsequent meeting that offer was accepted. The Court thereafter approved of the offer, and the bankrupt was subsequently discharged and re-invested in his estates. The trustee's accounts having been duly audited by the Commissioners, the trustee was also discharged, and his bond of caution delivered up.

Thereafter, on 2d April 1908, Hemming presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians at Edinburgh against Galbraith, his former trustee, in which he prayed the Court "to ordain the defender to produce a full account of his intrusions as trustee on the sequestered estates of the pursuer, and to pay the pursuer the sum of £100 sterling, or such other sum as may appear to be the true balance due by him . . ."

The pursuer averred (Cond. 3) that in the negotiations between himself and the defender with regard to the offer of the composition, he was assured by the defender that the expenses would not exceed £350. That "the defender's fee was fixed by the pursuer at 250 guineas, and this arrangement was confirmed by pursuer's law-agent by letter of 14th March 1907, copy of which is produced. Said fee was to cover all defender's charges, except those of his valuator, which were fixed at £1, 11s. 6d. per day. In particular, the foresaid large fee was to cover all charges for copyings by and expenses of defender's clerks." (Cond. 4) "The defender, as trustee foresaid, received and has in his hands the sum of £100 and upwards of funds which belonged to the said sequestrated estate, and which now belong to the pursuer, and for which the defender refuses to account. The pursuer desires that the defender's account of intromissions should be remitted to the Accountant of Court for audit, and that the law-agent's account appearing therein should be taxed by the Auditor of Court. The pursuer objects to the defender's accounts in the following respects:—(1) Because the defender has, in breach of the foresaid arrangement as to remuneration, charged large sums for clerks' copyings and expenses; (2) the account of his present law-agent charged therein, amounting to £42, 11s. 5d., is grossly overcharged, and falls to be taxed. . . . (3) the valuator's expenses and fees charged in said account are overstated; (4) the excessive charge for postages, viz., £29, 7s. 4d.; (5) sundry other charges which are not authorised or are overcharged. With reference to the audit by the Commissioners referred to in answer, the pursuer had no notice of it, and is not bound by it. The said Commissioners had no interest to make a proper audit, and, in point of fact, did not do so. . . . When defender applied for his discharge the pursuer lodged answers, and moved that the defender's account should be audited, but the Sheriff-substitute held he had no power to do so in a petition for the trustee's discharge. . . . The defender's account of expenses, instead of being £350, amounts to over £500."

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defender, as trustee foresaid, having in his hands funds belonging to the pursuer, is bound in virtue of sections 86 and 142 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,* to hold count and reckoning for his intromissions and management with the pursuer as craved.

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), enacts:—

Sec. 86. "The judicial factor, the trustee, and commissioners shall be amenable to the Lord Ordinary and to the Sheriff . . . at the instance of any party interested, to account for their intromissions and management, by petition served on them . . ."

Sec. 141. "Before the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall pronounce the deliverance approving of the composition, the commissioners shall audit the accounts of the trustee, and ascertain the balance due to or by him, and fix the remuneration for his trouble, subject to the review of the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, if complained of by the trustee, the bankrupt, or any of the creditors; and the expense attending the sequestration and such remuneration shall be paid or provided for to the satisfaction of the trustee and commissioners before such deliverance is pronounced."

Sec. 142. "Notwithstanding such offer of composition and proceeding consequent thereon, the sequestration shall continue, and the trustee shall proceed in the execution of his duty as if no such offer had been made, until the deliverance by the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff be pronounced, when the sequestration shall cease and be at an end, and the trustee be exonerated and discharged: Provided, nevertheless, that the trustee and his cautioner shall be liable, on petition to the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff by the bankrupt or his cautioner for the composition, to account for his intromissions and other acts as trustee."

* "NOTE.—The plea of no jurisdiction was not maintained before me, and it therefore falls to be repelled. I am afraid, however, that I cannot agree with the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, under which he remitted the cause to probation. The facts are that, after all the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, had been duly carried out—an offer of composition accepted, the trustee's accounts audited by the Commissioners, and the law-agent's account taxed—the trustee was exonerated and discharged, the bankrupt discharged and re-invested in his estates, and the sequestration came to an end, in terms of section 142 of the Act. Against all or any of these proceedings the bankrupt might have appealed under section 141, but no appeal was taken. In these circumstances, the pursuer, who was the bankrupt, presents this petition, calling on the trustee 'to account for his intromissions as trustee,' and in condescendence 4 states that 'he desires that the defender's account of intromissions should be audited by the Accountant of Court, and that the law-agent's account appearing therein should be taxed by the Auditor of Court.' The first of these accounts has, as I have said, been audited by the statutory auditors, and the second has already been audited by the Auditor of the Court of Session. He states in the same condescendence five objections which he takes to the defender's accounts, but at the hearing before me his counsel gave up objections 3, 4, and 5. The first objection is that the trustee, in breach of agreement, 'charged large sums for clerks' copyings and expenses.' That averment, in the first place, seems to me to be irrelevant on the ground of want of specification. The trustee was entitled to make some charges for such expenses, and this does not say what charges are objected to. But, in the second place, it seems to me that it is for the very purpose of having any such question raised and decided, that the appeal under section 141 is given, and, at the hearing, the pursuer's counsel had to admit that the question might have been brought up by such an appeal, and to argue that in all sequestrations the bankrupt might choose whether he would appeal under section 141, or allow the sequestration to come to an end, and then proceed by petition under section 142 to bring up any question he chooses. That virtually renders the right of appeal under section 141 needless. In my opinion, it is incompetent to bring under section 142 a general action for accounting relating to matters which have been already adjudicated on by the Commissioners, and that the provisions of the last clause of that section are limited to an accounting on the ground of malversation or mismanagement in office. It would lead to endless litigation were persons in the position of this pursuer to be allowed, by bringing such a petition as this, to obtain review of the whole proceedings in the sequestration. This view is, I think, borne out by the dicta of the Judges of the Court of Session in the cases of Henderson v. Henderson's Trustee, 10 R. 188, and Duke v. More, 6 F. 190.

"The second objection relates to the law-agent's account. The account

Hemming v.
Galbraith.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and the case was heard on 27th May 1908.

Argued for the pursuer and appellant;—(1) Competency.—It was perfectly competent for the bankrupt, under sec. 142, to call on the trustee to account, even though the trustee had been discharged;¹ that, indeed, was the meaning, and the only possible meaning, of the word “nevertheless” in that section. The provisions of the statute with respect to the proceedings following on a composition, and those on payment of a dividend, were distinct.² The object of sections 141 and 142 was quite clear, and it was that when a composition was offered and accepted it should be carried through as soon as possible, and not delayed by all the appeals competent to the bankrupt against the trustee’s administration. But by section 142 it was provided that the bankrupt should not be prejudiced thereby, and therefore his right of challenge of the trustee’s administration was preserved. That right was not affected by the audit by the Commissioners under section 141, as was clear from the fact that the bankrupt was not entitled to any intimation of that audit; and, indeed, the Commissioners had not necessarily any interest in the grounds of challenge founded on here, which had not, or might not have, emerged at the time of their audit. (2) Relevancy.—The averments were sufficiently relevant, for they inferred illegal charges on the part of the trustee. The trustee here was paid by a commission, and therefore he had no right to charge for copyings or for a law-agent’s expenses.³

Argued for the respondent;—It was incompetent to call on the trustee to account for intromissions that had already been audited. He could not be called on to account twice over for the same items. The bankrupt had his remedy here of appealing either to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff against the Commissioners’ audit under section 141, but had failed to avail himself of it; and he could not now re-open the whole question, after the previous audit had been allowed to stand and the trustee had been discharged. To hold otherwise would be to render section 141 nugatory. The word “nevertheless” has already been taxed by the Auditor of the Court of Session, and the pursuer was made aware of that fact. He might have appealed the Auditor’s decisions, but did not, and I certainly see nothing in the averment to lead me to hold that at this stage the Auditor should be instructed to tax the account a second time. What I have said on objection (1) as regards the scope of section 142 applies with equal force to this objection.

“I only wish to add that, at the beginning of condescendence 4, the pursuer avers that the trustee received and has in his hands the sum of £100 of funds belonging to the estate. Had it been stated that the sum was in the defender’s hands when his accounts were audited, and was not entered in them, or that he had somehow got hold of it since that date, I might very probably have held that that was a matter which could properly be raised under this petition, but there is no such averment, and the question is not raised in the detailed objections set forth in the latter part of the condescendence.

in section 142 referred to the continuing of the sequestration, not to the trustee's discharge, and was intended to cover intromissions by the trustee subsequent to the audit by the Commissioners. (2) Relevancy. ^{Hemming v. Galbraith.} June 6, 1908. —The trustee was willing to account for any intromissions subsequent to the Commissioners' audit, but all the matters called in question here were covered by that audit, and there were no averments to the contrary. Section 86 had been construed in *Duke v. More*¹ and in Henderson v. Henderson's Trustee,² and the requisites for a relevant case for inquiry, as indicated in these decisions, were not present in the pursuer's averments here. The same requisites were necessary to make a relevant case for an accounting under section 142 as were necessary under section 86.

At advising on 6th June 1908,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is a petition to the Sheriff Court of the Lothians at the instance of a bankrupt calling on his trustee to produce a full account of his intromissions as trustee and to pay certain sums. It is therefore a petition that the trustee shall account for his whole intromissions during the sequestration. The Sheriff-substitute has sustained the petition and ordered a general accounting. On appeal the Sheriff-depute took a different view, and has sustained the two pleas of incompetency and irrelevancy stated by the defender, and dismissed the action, and the question is which of these views is right. I think that taken by the learned Sheriff-depute is correct, and that we should affirm his judgment.

The question arises on the construction of section 142 of the Bankruptcy Act, but the material facts to be kept in view in considering the application of that section to the present circumstances are that this is a case of the discharge of a bankrupt on payment of composition, that the sequestration is at an end, and that the trustee has been exonerated and discharged from his liabilities as trustee.

Before the trustee could obtain his discharge it was necessary under the preceding sections that a large amount of procedure—what the Lord President in a former case described as a well-considered and well-digested scheme—should be followed in order to safeguard the interests of creditors, and all others concerned. Section 142 is one of a series of sections which provide for the discharge of a bankrupt on composition. The scheme is that the bankrupt may offer a composition, that the offer may be entertained by the creditors, that if it is accepted the bankrupt shall find caution for the amount, and that ultimately the Sheriff, before giving effect to the agreement, shall hear objecting creditors, consider the effect of their opposition, and sustain or reject their votes, according to the provisions of the statute. It is only after all that has been done, and the Sheriff has pronounced a deliverance approving of the composition, that the bankrupt is allowed to get his discharge on making a declaration that a full and fair disclosure has been made and the other conditions satisfied.

Section 141 enacts :—[His Lordship quoted the section.] And therefore before the composition is approved of at all, the question of the accuracy and sufficiency of the trustee's accounts, and the balance due to or by him, as well as the question of his remuneration in conducting the sequestration, are to June 6, 1908. be made matters of adjudication by the Commissioners in the first instance, and, if any of the creditors are not satisfied, by the Sheriff or Lord Ordinary on appeal, and ultimately—under the general appeal clause—by this Court if the parties are not satisfied. It is only after all that has been done that the statute goes on to say that “the sequestration shall cease and be at an end, and the trustee be exonerated and discharged.”

Hemming v.
Galbraith.

Lord Kinnear.

Now, in the present case all that has been done, except that no objection has been taken to the Commissioners' decision, and consequently there has been no appeal under section 141, and it is only now, after all the statutory procedure has been followed, that it is maintained by the bankrupt that the trustee is still liable to a general accounting at his instance. It is argued that if sections 141 and 142 are taken together they confer on the bankrupt an option either to appeal in the way prescribed in section 141, or to allow the trustee to obtain his discharge, and then to appeal under section 142. I can see some difficulty in construing section 142, but I think it cannot be construed so as to give the bankrupt any such option. The clause does not in terms provide for any appeal whatever. The two supposed appeals between which he is to elect are not commensurate, nor are they given to the same persons. Section 141 says the appeal may be at the instance of the trustee, the bankrupt, or any of the creditors, whereas the remedy given by section 142 is given to the bankrupt alone. The words of the section are:—[His Lordship quoted the section.] Now, according to the appellant's contention the creditors may take an appeal under section 141 in which a decision may be given against them, and then the bankrupt may come forward under section 142 and say he is not satisfied, and go back to the same Judge and argue before him the same question that was argued already under the previous section. I do not think that such a construction of the statute is admissible. According to the appellant's argument this right of appeal may be exercised by the bankrupt without limit of time, so that there would be no final discharge short of the negative prescription, and an action might be brought years after the proceedings were at an end for an account of the whole intromissions of the trustee, notwithstanding that he had given a full account at the time prescribed by the statute, and had thereupon been judicially discharged. I observed that the argument for the appellant seemed to imply that the bankrupt had this special remedy even although the creditors had challenged the trustee's accounts on the very same grounds, and their challenge had failed before all the Courts. I think that necessarily follows from his argument on the word “nevertheless,” viz., that it relates to the whole provisions of section 141. I cannot see any reasonable reading of the statute which would support that contention. I agree that the clause in question is difficult of construction, and I am not at all sure that the view I take of it is the view that has been previously taken in this Court. There is no decision on the point, but there is a case in which Lord President Inglis, speaking of the proviso in section 142, referred to it “as a remarkable remedy given to the bankrupt,”¹ and seems to have assumed that it might be available against a trustee who had been discharged.

I am, however, rather disposed to think that this remedy is enforceable June 6, 1908. before and not after the discharge of the trustee. An enactment that a trustee shall be exonerated and discharged, and thereafter shall be liable to ^{Hemming v.} account for his intromissions, is a contradiction in terms; and I am not ^{Galbraith.} prepared to put any such meaning, if it be called a meaning, on an Act of ^{Lord Kinnear.} Parliament if the language will reasonably bear another. The proviso must, I think, be read with reference to the whole scheme, and the important thing to observe is that the preceding sections relate to the discharge of a bankrupt on composition, which may be obtained though the whole estate has not been realised and handed over to the creditors, for the creditors by accepting the composition may forego their claims to the remainder. Now, that being the purpose of the series of clauses, the procedure adopted is one for the settlement of matters between the bankrupt and his trustee on the one side, and the creditors on the other, and questions between the bankrupt and the trustee on the sequestrated estate may remain to be disposed of after questions between the bankrupt and the creditors have been settled. I think the natural meaning of the series of sections is that the trustee is not to be exonerated and discharged without giving the bankrupt an opportunity for investigating his administration and calling him to account, and that the true meaning of the proviso in section 142 is not that the trustee is to be first discharged and afterwards called upon to account, but that notwithstanding the provision that when the sequestration shall cease the trustee is to be discharged, the bankrupt may still call him to account for his intromissions, although all questions between him and the creditors are determined. But that implies that he is to account before he obtains a discharge, and not that he is to be discharged first and to account afterwards. Were it otherwise the discharge and exoneration to which the trustee is clearly entitled would be perfectly useless. There can be no judicial discharge and exoneration until the trustee has done everything he was bound to do in the exercise of his office, and paid over any balance which may be in his hands, and if a discharge which has followed on that complete accounting is to afford no answer to a new action of accounting it goes for nothing. I cannot accept a reading which would reduce a judicial discharge prescribed by statute to a mere futility.

While that is my own view I do not wish to decide more than is necessary for the disposal of this case, more especially as the view I have stated is not the view taken by the Sheriff, or that argued by counsel at the Bar. But assuming against my own impression that the trustee is still liable to account after he has been judicially discharged, I agree with the Sheriff in thinking that it is incompetent to bring under section 142 a general accounting as to matters which have been already adjudicated on, and that if there is still a liability to account it must be with reference to matters which have not been settled in the course of the prior proceedings. The Sheriff goes on to examine the pursuer's averments, and gives his reasons for holding that these are irrelevant. Without examining them in detail, I may say that I agree with the learned Sheriff's judgment with reference to all the objections taken by the pursuer. I think the Sheriff's judgment is right, and that it should be affirmed.

June 6, 1908.

Hemming v.
Galbraith.

LORD M'LAREN.—To a right understanding of sections 141 and 142 of the Bankruptcy Act two things have to be kept in mind, first, that the trustee's discharge is really a double discharge, for he is entitled to be discharged in a question with the creditors and also in a question with the bankrupt. Secondly, that in the case of a discharge not following on a composition the interests of the creditors and the bankrupt are practically identical. On looking at section 152 it will be found that very careful provision is made for the satisfaction of the creditors before the discharge can be obtained, for there it is provided that a meeting of creditors shall be held at which the trustee shall produce his books and accounts, and the Sheriff shall hear the creditors thereon before granting the discharge. Now in that matter there is a practical identity of interest between the creditors and the bankrupt. Of course if only a dividend can be paid out of the estate the bankrupt has no real interest, but if the creditors are to be paid in full then he clearly has an interest.

But in the case of the termination of the bankruptcy by payment of a composition the question of the trustee's discharge is quite different. For the interests of the creditors and the bankrupt are then not the same. The interest of the creditors is only to be secured in the payment of the composition; they have bargained to accept so much, and security has been given that they will receive it. So in that case it is unnecessary to delay the proceedings for approval of the composition until all the trustee's accounts have been investigated. And indeed it would hardly be practicable to do so, for the first thing the trustee does is to write to all the debtors of the bankrupt to make payment of their accounts, and that is a process which takes time, while the bankrupt may be in a position to offer security for a composition long before that process has been carried out.

Now under section 141 certain preliminary proceedings are provided for. The Commissioners have to audit the trustee's accounts in so far as complete at that date, ascertain the balance due by him, and fix his remuneration, which has to be provided by the bankrupt, and this is subject to review if complained of by the trustee, the bankrupt, or any of the creditors. But it is obvious that questions of accounting may still remain between the bankrupt and the trustee, even though the composition has been approved of. And therefore I think that the procedure for approval of the composition does not give the bankrupt all the accounting to which he is entitled, viz., an accounting for the period of the trustee's administration subsequent to the approval of the composition. I note that by the provision in section 142 the trustee is not to be called on to account for everything—the expenses, for instance, have been already provided for in the previous section. What he is to account for is his "intrusions," and it is clear that although a composition has been agreed to, that does not affect his intrusions with the estate. And so I think that section 142 is a very necessary section, for it has this object, that it makes it necessary for the trustee to account to the bankrupt for all the money that he has ingathered for his estate. In short, section 142 provides for his discharge quoad the bankrupt, his discharge quoad the creditors having been provided for in the preceding section.

That was substantially the argument of Mr Blackburn, and I agree with all that Lord Kinnear has said with regard to the audit by the Commissioners and the impossibility of reading the statute as meaning that the trustee is June 6, 1908. to be called on to account a second time for the figures in his accounts that have been already investigated. There is no suggestion here that the trustee Hemming v. Galbraith. has failed to account for his intromissions. The only questions that are raised are as to postages, copying expenses, and fees to the valuator and law-agent. All these matters have already been the subject of investigation. I therefore agree that no relevant case has been stated for the appellant. Lord M'Laren.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to state a relevant case. I do not think that the effect of the 142d section of the Bankruptcy Act is to allow the bankrupt to ask for an accounting from the trustee in regard to matters that have already been adjudicated upon under section 141. To make a relevant case it would be necessary for the pursuer to aver that there were items which had not been dealt with under section 141, and I am unable to find such averments here. Therefore I think the opinion of the Sheriff is right.

The LORD PRESIDENT, who was absent at the hearing, delivered no opinion.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), First Schedule (1) (b)—Incapacity resulting from injury—Injured workman suffering from disease—Incapacity contributed to by disease.—A miner, whose right eye was sound, but whose left eye was affected by disease, was able to work under ground. In the course of his employment he met with an accident to his sound eye which so injured it as to render it of little use. Owing to the condition of the diseased eye he was thereafter unable to resume his work under ground. It was proved that the condition of the diseased eye was neither caused nor aggravated by the accident. Lee v. William Baird & Co., Limited.

Held that the workman was suffering from incapacity resulting from the accident.

GEORGE LEE, miner, Blantyre, having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, from his employers, William Baird & Company, Limited, coalmasters, Blantyre, the matter was referred to the arbitration of the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire at Hamilton (Thomson), who dismissed the application, and at the request of the applicant stated a case for appeal. 1st DIVISION. The case set forth :—"The following facts were admitted or proved—(1) The appellant on 10th April 1907, in the course of his employment as a miner in the Priory Pit No. 4, Blantyre, belonging to the respondents, received an injury to his right eye, which injury (at least until an operation is performed) renders that eye of little use; (2) that the left eye was not affected by the accident, and is (save for nystagmus) quite healthy and in such a condition as would permit of appellant working as before the accident; (3) that there is now, however, a degree of nystagmus which prevents him resuming his former work under ground, although it need not prevent his working above ground; (4) that no question was raised on record that the appellant at the time of the accident was suffering from nystagmus in the left eye, and that during the proof and in the course of the hearing on evidence no point was made that at the time of the accident the left eye was so affected by nystagmus as to impair its usefulness for his work, the sole question raised and debated being whether the nystagmus as at present existing was due to or was aggravated by the accident; (5) that it is proved that at the time of the accident nystagmus to a slight extent was present in the left eye; (6) that there is no proof that it then existed to such an extent as to prevent or even impede the appellant in his work as a miner; (7) that it is proved that the nystagmus was neither caused nor even aggravated by the accident; (8) that it is not proved whether nystagmus when it once exists has (like, e.g., cataract) a tendency to increase, or whether (like, e.g., inflammation) it may disappear and rise again independently; (9) that the appellant was paid compensation at the rate of 11s. 6d. per week from a fortnight after the date of the accident till and including 25th November 1907, when the respondents stopped payment; (10) that by that date he had recovered from the immediate effects of the accident to his right eye, in so far as recovery (without an operation) is possible, and that if his left eye had not been affected by nystagmus to the extent to which it then was he might have resumed his former occupation; (11) that notwithstanding the present condition of his eyesight he is fit for work as a miner above ground but not under ground.

"Upon a consideration of the proof I found that the appellant had recovered as far as he ever would (without an operation) from the effects of the accident by 25th November 1907, and that after said date he was not, and that he is not now, prevented by or through the accident from resuming his former employment, and I dismissed the petition."

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was,—“Whether upon the facts as proved the appellant is entitled to have his compensation in respect of said accident under the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1897, continued?”

The case was heard on 27th May 1908.

Argued for the appellant;—The workman had formerly a good eye and a bad eye. He had now lost the sight of the good eye, and found that he was incapable, with the bad eye only, of doing the work he formerly could do when he had both eyes. These facts were sufficient to entitle him to compensation.* The arbitrator was wrong in seeking to put on the workman the onus of proving that, at the time of the accident, the diseased eye was in such a state that he could not then have worked under ground without the assistance of the good eye.

Argued for the respondents;—This case must be taken on the

* The Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict. cap. 37), provides for payment of compensation to an injured workman, First Schedule, sec. (1), subsec. (6),—“Where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury . . .”

facts found proved by the arbitrator. All that the arbitrator had found was that the workman was prevented from pursuing his former occupation owing to the diseased state of his left eye, and that that state was not caused or aggravated by the accident. The respondents, therefore, not being responsible for the diseased state of that eye, were not liable in compensation. If the arbitrator had found that, at the time of the accident, the workman had been dependent on his right eye for earning his wages, the case might have been different, but there was no such finding. On such facts there was sufficient evidence to justify the arbitrator in arriving at the conclusion at which he had arrived, and that being so, his decision should not be interfered with.¹

June 6, 1908.
 Lee v.
 William Baird
 & Co.,
 Limited.

At advising, on 6th June 1908,—

LORD MACKENZIE.—This is an appeal in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, in which the appellant asked that the respondents should be found liable to pay to him weekly compensation. The accident happened on 10th April 1907, and the appellant was paid compensation at the rate of 11s. 6d. per week from a fortnight after the date of the accident till and including 25th November 1907. The finding of the Sheriff-substitute is to the effect that by the 25th November the appellant was not, and was not at the date when the case was before him, prevented by or through the accident from resuming his former employment. The question is whether that finding is correct or not.

Now, the first matter that strikes one in examining the grounds upon which that conclusion is reached is the finding of the Sheriff-substitute under the 11th head, that the appellant is no longer fit for work under ground. It appears from a previous finding that before the accident he was fit for work under ground. Thus there is that difference in his capacity at the present time as compared with his capacity at the date of the accident. There is no doubt that partial incapacity does exist, and the question is whether, to use the words of the first schedule of the Act, that results from the injury that he sustained in consequence of the accident. The nature of the injury which he sustained was an injury to the right eye. This is the case of a man who at the time of the accident had one sound eye, and one eye which was affected by an infirmity—nystagmus. He was, therefore, when the accident happened to him incapacitated to the extent of having one eye that was not sound. In his fifth and sixth findings, the Sheriff-substitute holds it proved that at the time of the accident nystagmus to a slight extent was present in the left eye, but that there is no proof that it then existed to such an extent as to prevent or even impede the appellant in his work as a miner. So that the existing infirmity at the time of the accident did not incapacitate the man, as at that date he was fit to work below as well as above ground. Now, he is not able to work under ground. The finding which is important is the finding under head 1, because the Sheriff-substitute finds that the injury to the right eye renders that eye of little use. That is the result of the accident. He then goes on to say in his second and third findings that the left eye was not affected by the accident, and is (save for nystagmus) quite healthy, and in such a condition as

June 6, 1908. would permit of the appellant working as before the accident, and that there is now, however, a degree of nystagmus which prevents him resuming his former work under ground, although it need not prevent his working above ground. If it had been the case that the right eye had recovered so as to be as good as it was before the accident, I think there would have been ground for drawing the inference that, if the appellant is now suffering from incapacity, the incapacity must be traceable to the infirmity in the left eye. But there is no finding by the Sheriff-substitute that the infirmity in the left eye would have prevented the appellant from working below ground if the right eye had been sound. It is not, in my opinion, quite clear from the statement of the case whether the nystagmus in the left eye is to be regarded as having progressed, as having become distinctly worse, since the date of the accident, but in the view I take I do not think that is material. Whether the nystagmus was progressive or not, as I read the finding of the Sheriff-substitute, there was and is an injury to the right eye which renders that eye of little use, and that, coupled with the infirmity in the left eye, results in incapacity which unfits the appellant from working under ground.

Lord Mac-
kenzie.

It is the law that if a man who is already afflicted with an infirmity is injured by an accident and thereby incapacitated from carrying on the work which he was previously fit to do, then that is an injury which results from the accident, even though the accident would not have incapacitated him, had he been otherwise sound. The case may be figured of an injury to a man who to begin with has only one eye. That renders him more liable to be disabled, but if an accident happens, and if there is injury to the sound eye, those responsible for the accident will be liable for the consequences, although, if he had the other eye the result would not have been the same. In the same way it is obvious that if a man with a lame leg receives an injury to the other leg the injury would have very much more serious consequences. Accordingly I am unable to agree with the view of the learned Sheriff-substitute upon the facts as stated in the case. It appears to me that this is the case of a man whose right eye has been rendered of little use in consequence of the accident, and that the result of that, coupled with his previous infirmity, is to render him partially incapacitated for work; and accordingly he is still in a state of partial incapacity in the sense of the statute, and that partial incapacity renders the employers liable to make compensation.

As regards the question of law put to us I would suggest that in the circumstances of the case a direct answer should not be returned to it. The question put is:—"Whether upon the facts as proved the appellant is entitled to have his compensation in respect of said accident under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, continued?" If a direct affirmative were returned to that question, it might to a certain extent tie the hands of parties if they went back to the Sheriff-substitute and desired a review of the amount. It appears to me that we should find that the appellant is still suffering from partial incapacity for work, which is the result of the injury caused him by the accident.

LORD M'LAREN.—Long experience in judicial work makes one very tolerant of differences of opinion, and therefore I approach this case in the belief that things which appear clear and important to me must have seemed otherwise to the learned Sheriff-substitute, although it is difficult to see how, upon the facts as he has found them, he arrived at the conclusion to which he has come.

Lee v.
William Baird
& Co.,

The case stated shortly comes to this: That before the accident this miner had two serviceable eyes. One of them was slightly defective because he had begun to have a disease known as nystagmus. That, as explained to us, is a trembling of the eyeball which interferes with distinct vision. The other eye was perfectly sound. The condition of the man now is that neither of his eyes is serviceable. The one that was formerly slightly affected by nystagmus is now so much affected by it that the man is unable to make any use of the eye at all. His other eye has also become unserviceable in consequence of the accident which happened to him in the pursuit of his employment. Natural causes connected with the nature of the work in which a miner is engaged may account for the disabled state of the left eye; but I see nothing in the facts to account for the disabled condition of the right eye except the accident. It is plainly found that the eye was injured by the accident, and that he is only so far recovered, and is unable to work under ground.

Lord M'Laren.

In these circumstances it seems to me quite clear that one of the results of the accident is that the man is no longer able to follow his pursuit as a miner. It is not proved that if he had been fortunate enough to escape the accident, he would have been disabled from working under ground. He would have had one eye in perfect order, and, although the other one has through lapse of time become more and more affected with nystagmus, we do not know that, barring the accident, he would not have been able to get on quite well with a sound right eye. I think, therefore, that this is a case for compensation, but as it is found that the workman is able for lighter and perhaps less highly paid work above ground, the Sheriff-substitute will take this into account in fixing the amount of compensation payable. I therefore agree with Lord Mackenzie that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff.

LORD KINNAR.—I agree. We must take the Sheriff-substitute's findings in fact as he gives them. We cannot review his determination upon the facts at all. But taking these specific facts as he finds them, we have to consider whether he is justified in saying that they support the inference that this man's incapacity resulting from the accident has ceased, and that he is now capable of earning his former wages. I think it is quite clear upon the Sheriff's own statement that that is a finding that cannot be supported. The Sheriff begins by finding as matter of fact that the appellant "received an injury to his right eye, which injury (at least until an operation is performed) renders that eye of little use." Therefore he starts by saying that the man who had a good eye before his injury has now an eye so affected that it is of little use. That is a finding in the present tense. Then he goes on to say that the accident did not affect the left eye, which, however, had previously been affected by the disease called nystagmus, and that before the accident the man was able to work as a miner under ground.

June 6, 1908. If he had gone on to find that the right eye was now perfectly restored, and that the left eye had on the contrary become so far deteriorated in consequence of some other cause than the accident that he could no longer work under ground in consequence not of the condition of his right eye, but of the condition of the left eye alone, that might have raised the question, which the Sheriff seems to have considered and decided, as to whether the present incapacity of the man was really owing to the accident or was owing to the disease which had no connection with the accident. But then he finds nothing of that kind.

Lee v.
William Baird
& Co.,

Lord Kinnear.

He finds that the left eye is quite healthy, and is in such a condition as would permit of the appellant working as before the accident, except for the nystagmus. He does not distinctly state whether the nystagmus is now so much worse that the man could not have worked as before, even if the right eye had not been injured; but he finds it proved that the nystagmus was not caused nor even aggravated by the accident. Then he gives the present position, repeats the finding with which he started, and says that by the 25th of November 1907, when the respondents stopped his allowance, he had recovered from the immediate effects of the accident to his right eye, so far as recovery (without an operation) is possible, and that then he might have resumed his former occupation if his left eye had not been affected by nystagmus to the extent to which it then was. That is a finding that the man has not completely recovered. He has recovered only in so far as it is possible to recover without an operation. We are not told whether it is probable that the operation would result in his complete recovery, or whether it is wise to submit to an operation. All that we know is that the man has not yet completely recovered, and that according to the Sheriff-substitute there may be a possibility that he would recover more completely as the result of an operation which has not been performed. That seems to me a finding in fact that the man's eye has been injured by an accident, and that it has not yet recovered. I cannot reconcile that with a finding that the man has been restored to the same condition, with the same power of work, as before the accident. On the Sheriff's statement therefore I am of opinion with your Lordships that it is impossible to accept a general finding that the man is now in such a condition that we can say he is not prevented by or through the accident from resuming his former employment, which the Sheriff says he is now unfit for.

With reference to the form of the answer, I agree with Lord Mackenzie that we ought to make no finding which should preclude the Sheriff from entertaining and disposing of the question of the exact amount of compensation which in the present circumstances should be allowed to the man. That must be left to him.

The LORD PRESIDENT having been absent at the hearing delivered no opinion.

LORD PEARSON was absent

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the appellant is still prevented by the results of the injuries caused by the accident mentioned in the case from resuming his former employment: Recall the determination of the Sheriff-substitute as arbitrator appealed against, and remit the cause to him to proceed as accords."

Discharge—Confusio—Heritable Bond—Bond over Entailed Lands—Defective Entail—Acquisition of Bond by Heir of Entail in Possession.—The heir in possession of certain lands under a deed of entail, which was defective in the irritant clauses, died in ignorance of this fact and without evacuating the destination. While in possession of the lands he acquired right to a bond over the lands by succession ab intestato to the creditor in the bond.

Held that the bond was not extinguished confusione in the person of the heir, in respect that he possessed the lands and the bond under different destinations, and that this was not affected by the invalidity of the entail, as the tailzied destination had not been evacuated by him.

Succession—Destination—Liferent and Fee—Fiduciary Fee.—The creditor in a heritable bond bequeathed it by direct disposition to certain persons in liferent, and in fee to the heir of entail who might be in possession of certain lands at the expiry of the liferents.

Opinion (per Lord President) that there was no effectual destination of the fee, and that the purpose of the testator could only have been achieved by the interposition of a trust.

Per Lord President,—"I have never yet heard—and I do not think we ought to extend the doctrine—of the doctrine of a fiduciary fee for somebody who is neither a child nor an heir in any sense of the person in whom the fiduciary fee is created."

A. D. M. BLACK, W.S., Edinburgh, and others, trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of Eden Colville, of Craigflower, Fife, raised this action of multiplepounding to determine the rights of parties in a sum of £4500 contained in a bond and disposition in security, dated 17th May 1830, over the lands of Muirside, of which, at his death, Eden Colville was the heritable proprietor.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

The fund in medio was the said bond and disposition in security.

The following narrative of the facts which gave rise to the action is taken from the opinion of the Lord President:—

"In 1830 John Blackburn, of Killearn, lent a sum of £4500 to Andrew Colville, of Ochiltree, who in security of that sum conveyed to John Blackburn certain lands called Muirside. Subsequently John Blackburn assigned that bond and disposition in security to Miss Margaret Blackburn.

side on the same series of heirs as those called in the destination of certain other lands of Crombie and Craigflower, which had already been entailed.

"In 1841 Miss Margaret Blackburn, by disposition, assignation, and settlement disposed the said bond and disposition in security in favour of her grandnieces, nine in number, all being daughters of Andrew Colville, in liferent equally among them, and to the survivors of them in liferent during all the days of their lifetime and remaining unmarried, for their liferent use, and after the marriage or death of all of them, then to and in favour of the heir of entail who might be in possession of the estate of Crombie and Craigflower in fee.

"These nine ladies lived for a considerable time, and the last of them died unmarried in 1905, and thereby for the first time the fee of the bond opened for behoof of whomever it might concern. Miss Margaret Blackburn herself had died in 1842, and Andrew Colville, who executed the entail of the lands of Muirside, died in 1856. He was succeeded in the entailed lands by Sir James Colville, who died in 1880. Sir James Colville was succeeded by his brother Eden Colville, and in 1881 Eden Colville disentailed these lands, having discovered that there was no proper irritant clause.¹ Having done so he evacuated the destination of the entailed lands by means of a settlement, and, he himself dying in 1893, his trustees took up the lands under the disposition contained in his settlement. By his settlement Miss Kathleen Marindin is entitled to the whole produce of the lands."

Claims were lodged for (1) Captain Arthur Marindin, who would have been heir of entail in possession of the lands of Crombie and Craigflower had the entail not been broken; (2) the trustees acting under the trust-disposition and settlement of Sir James Colville; and (3) Miss Edith Marindin and others, the heirs in mobilibus of Miss Blackburn.

The claimant Captain Marindin stated that though the result of supervening legislation and of the proceedings taken by Eden Colville had been to deprive him of his right to the lands of Crombie and Craigflower, it had in no way rendered unintelligible the words employed by the testatrix to designate him as the person in whom she intended the fee of the bond to vest on the expiry of the liferents.

He claimed the whole fund in medio.

He pleaded;—(2) This claimant being the person truly designated by the testatrix as entitled to the fee of the said bond, ought to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

The claimants Sir James Colville's trustees stated that in the circumstances which had arisen there was now no person in existence answering to the description of heir of entail in possession of the estates of Crombie and Craigflower; that the destination had accordingly failed, and that the bond had become intestate heritable succession of Miss Blackburn. They further maintained that Miss Blackburn's heir-at-law at her death was Andrew Colville, who had made up no title to the bond; that Andrew Colville was survived by his eldest son Sir James Colville, who then became Miss Blackburn's heir-at-law, and that in virtue of section 9 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, a personal right in the bond had vested in Sir James Colville, and had passed to them under and in terms of his trust-disposition June 6, 1908. and settlement.

They claimed the whole fund in medio.

They pleaded;—(1) In the circumstances that have arisen the destination of the said bond for £4500 contained in the disposition and assignation and settlement of Miss Margaret Blackburn has failed, and the bond falls to be dealt with as intestate succession. (2) The said bond was heritable as regards succession at the date of the death of the said Miss Blackburn, and the right thereto eventually vested in the said Sir James William Colville, and was carried by his trust-disposition and settlement.

Colville's
Trustees v.
Marindin.

The claimants Miss Edith Marindin and others concurred with the preceding claimants that the bond fell to be dealt with as intestate succession of Miss Blackburn. But they maintained that, under section 117 of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, it was moveable and not heritable quoad her succession, and accordingly belonged to the claimants as the next of kin and representatives in mobilibus of the testatrix.

They claimed the whole fund in medio.

They pleaded;—(1) The testator having postponed vesting of the fee of the fund in medio until the termination of the liferent, and the destination having then failed, the claimants, as her next of kin and representatives in mobilibus, are entitled to be ranked and preferred to said fund in terms of their claim. (2) In the circumstances condescended on the succession to the said bond and disposition in security being intestate and moveable, the claimants are entitled to the fund in medio.

Objections to the fund in medio were lodged by Miss Kathleen Marindin, who was the person entitled to the whole free income of Eden Colville's estate, including the lands of Muirside.

The objector stated :—(Cond. 3) "The right to the fee of the said principal sum of £4500 being undisposed of, vested as at Miss Blackburn's death in 1842 in Andrew Wedderburn Colville, her heir-at-law; but as he died in 1856 without making up a title thereto, the right to the said fee then vested in Sir James William Colville, her next heir-at-law. Sir James William Colville being alive at the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, a personal right to the said fee vested in him at that date in virtue of the provisions of that statute, and in particular of section 9 thereof." (Cond. 4) "In 1874 Sir James William Colville was in possession of the lands of Muirside, over which the said bond was secured, his right thereto being ex facie as heir of entail in possession. Owing to the defects in the deed of entail of the said lands, all the prohibitions contained in the said deed of entail were invalid as from and after the date of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36, and were not binding on the said Sir James William Colville. Sir James William Colville was, therefore, from the date of his succession to the said lands in 1856 until his death de facto proprietor in fee-simple of the said lands." (Cond. 5) "Sir James William Colville being in 1874 proprietor in fee-simple of the lands of Muirside, and being at the same time vested in the fee of the heritable debt for £4500 affecting the said lands, the said debt, quoad the fee thereof, was extinguished confusione in his person. On the death of the last holder of a liferent interest in the said debt on 2d August 1905 the said heritable debt was extinguished quoad the liferent also. This defender therefore objects to the condescendence of the fund in medio in respect that it sets forth that the right to the fee of the principal sum of £4500 has emerged by the death of the last survivor of the liferenters interested therein. No such right to the fee has emerged, the said heritable debt having been totally extinguished."

The objector pleaded;—(1) The action is incompetent. (2) There being no double distress, the action should be dismissed. (3) The liferent interest in the bond for £4500 condescended on having been extinguished by the death of the last liferenter, and the fee thereof having been extinguished confusione in the person of the late Sir William Colville, there is no fund in the hands of the pursuers and real raisers with regard to which any questions have arisen as to the person or persons entitled thereto. (4) There being no fund in the hand of the real raisers as to which competition has arisen, the claims lodged or to be lodged by parties claiming right thereto should be repelled.

On 25th May 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having considered the cause, ranks and prefers the claimants Dame Frances Elinor Colville and others, as trustees for the deceased Sir James William Colville, to the whole fund in medio, in terms of their claim, No. 17 of process, and ordains them to make up and complete, habili modo, a title to, and thereafter execute and deliver to the pursuers a valid and proper discharge of, the bond and disposition in security libelled, as concluded for in the summons, and decerns: Repels the claims of the whole other competing claimants, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the facts)—It will be convenient to consider first the claim No. 15 of process, for Captain Arthur Henry Marindin, the person who, but for the disentail of the estates of Crombie and Craighflower, and the subsequent evacuation of the tailzied destination, would have been the heir of entail in possession at the date of the death of the last liferentrix. I am of opinion that this claim is ill founded, and must be repelled. It seems to me impossible, as matter of construction, to hold that Captain Marindin was or is, 'after the marriage or death of all of them' (i.e., the liferentrices) ' . . . the heir of entail . . . in possession of the estate of Crombie and Craighflower . . . I think that possession of the entailed estate was a condition of the succession. I should have reached this conclusion apart from authority, but such aid as may be derived from reported cases seems to me to strengthen the view which I take. Thus in Inglis v. Gillanders (1894, 22 R. 266, aff. 1895, ibid. (H. L.) 51), the portion of the destination specially considered was 'to the heir in possession of Highfield under the entail thereof for the time, and' (i.e., whom failing) 'to the other heirs-substitute in said entail in the order set down in said entail successively.' Highfield had been disentailed, and the tailzied destination evacuated. It was held, in regard to the 'first branch' above quoted, that (in the words of Lord Watson, 22 R. (H. L.), at p. 55), 'it is obvious that, since the disentail of Highfield, the substitution has become void, because there can be no heir answering the description.' The 'second branch,' however, was held to import no condition of possession; all that was requisite being the character of an heir-substitute designated in the deed of entail. The first branch of the destination in that case appears to me to bear a very strong resemblance to that now under consideration. In the immediately succeeding case of Schank (1895, 22 R. 845), the words were 'the heirs of entail who may in succession and for the time be in possession, or have right to be in possession, of the entailed estate of X under and in virtue of the deed of entail.' The ground of judgment was thus summarised by Lord Trayner,—'It is the essential quality of the Miss Kathleen Marindin reclaimed.

Colville's
Trustees v.
Marindin.

The case was argued before the First Division on 5th and 6th February 1908.

Argued for the reclaimer;—(1) Miss Blackburn never disposed of the fee of the bond. Her attempt to do so by giving it to the heir of entail in possession of the lands of Crombie at the death of the last liferentrix effected nothing, for it left the fee in pendente from the date of her death until the date when the succession opened. The idea of a fiduciary fee in the liferentrices for behoof of the person ultimately found entitled to the bond was inadmissible, because that person stood in no fiduciary relationship to the liferentrices, and the doctrine of a fiduciary fee had never been extended beyond the case where the ultimate fiar was a child, or at least an heir, of the fiduciary fiar.

person claiming the liferent that he shall be in possession or be entitled to the possession of the entailed lands. The defender does not, and no other person now can, possess that quality, for the entail is no longer in existence.' The recent decision in Mackenzie's Trustees (1907, S. C. 139), a complicated case, involving scrutiny of a variety of documents, seems to have turned ultimately upon a differentiation of the phrase, 'the heir entitled to succeed under the said deed of entail'—occurring in a codicil—from the language of the testator's principal deed, which was 'the heir succeeding to said estates under the said deed of entail.' I was also referred to, but need not comment upon, the cases of Fenton Livingstone (1899, 1 F. 831) and Davidson (1906, 14 S. L. T. 337). For the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion that the claim for Captain Marindin must be repelled. At the date of the death of the last surviving liferentrix, neither he nor anyone else could fulfil the condition—upon which, in my judgment, the right of succession depended—of being heir of entail in possession of Crombie and Craighflower.

"If this view is correct, it seems to follow that intestacy resulted. But a controversy is raised between the parties who claim to represent, on the one hand, Miss Blackburn's heir-at-law, and on the other hand, her heirs in mobilibus. The first of these claims is made by the trustees of Sir James William Colville. They state that Miss Blackburn's heir in heritage at her decease was her nephew Andrew Wedderburn Colville, who died in 1856, without having made up a title to the bond. On his death the right to make up title thereto passed to his son, Sir James William Colville, who survived until 1880. His trustees maintain that, in virtue of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), section 9, a personal right to the bond vested in Sir James, and passes upon his death to them, under and in terms of his trust-disposition and settlement. On the other hand, the fund in medio is claimed by the next of kin and representatives in mobilibus of Miss Blackburn. Their plea in law is that 'the testatrix having postponed vesting of the fund in medio until the termination of the liferent, and the destination having then failed, the claimants, as her next of kin and heirs in mobilibus, are entitled to be ranked and preferred to said fund in terms of their claim.' Of the opposing contentions thus raised, I prefer the former. It is, I apprehend, settled law—at all events since the decision in Lord v. Colvin (1865, 3 Macph. 1083)—that in a case, as this is, of resulting intestacy, the heir must be looked for as at the time of the testator's death, and not as at the date when it became certain that none of the contingencies could happen by the occurrence of which intestacy would have been prevented. Nor do I see any reason to doubt that the quality and character of the succession must be ascertained as at the date of the death of the testatrix. This view appears to me to be in accordance with

June 6, 1908.

Colville's
Trustees v.
Marindin.

Such a destination of the fee could only have been effectually created by means of a trust, and Miss Blackburn had failed by attempting to create it by means of a direct disposition. In any event, as now appeared, there had been no effectual destination of the fee, as there was no person answering the description of "heir of entail" when the succession opened. Accordingly, at Miss Blackburn's death, the fee of the bond passed to her heir-at-law, Andrew Colville, and after him to Sir James Colville, in whom a personal right vested by the operation of section 9 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874.¹ Sir James Colville thus became pleno jure creditor in the fee of the bond, and it was immaterial that he was ignorant of his rights. He could have discharged the bond—at least so far as his interest, i.e., the fee, was concerned. He could have assigned it—and indeed it was the basis of the respondents' claim that by his will he did assign it to them. (2) Sir James Colville, as proprietor of the lands of Muirside, was also the language of section 117 of the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 101), and the cases of Brown (1870, 8 Macph. 439), and Cunningham (1889, 17 R. 218). If that is so, I take it that the right to make up title to the bond, which was heritable at Miss Blackburn's death, passed to her heir-at-law; and that—unless the argument for Miss Kathleen Marindin, which I must presently notice, is well founded—the fee of the money is now vested in Sir James Colville's trustees. Counsel for the next of kin referred me to a great number of authorities, amongst the best known of which are Ferguson (1875, 2 R. 627), Maule (1876, 3 R. 831), Cumstie (1876, 3 R. 921), and Tristram (1894, 22 R. 121). It is perhaps sufficient to say that none of these cases, nor the doctrine of fiduciary fee with which they are mainly concerned, appears to me to have any application to the present case; and that, even upon a contrary assumption, I do not understand how these claimants could take benefit from the application of the doctrine referred to. Subject, therefore, to the argument next to be considered, Sir James Colville's trustees are, in my opinion, entitled to prevail in the competition.

"I must now deal with the views submitted on behalf of Miss Kathleen Marindin. These are, as I shall afterwards point out, introduced into the case in a very singular manner; but they were made the subject of an able and earnest debate, which deserves attention, and is not unattended with difficulty. Miss Marindin is the person presently entitled to the free annual income of the estate of the late Eden Colville held by his trustees, the pursuers and real raisers, which includes the lands of Muirside. She has therefore an interest to maintain, as she does, that the bond in question has been extinguished confusione. The theory of her contention is that, on the death of the last liferentrix, and the failure of a fiar, the bequest fell into intestacy of Miss Blackburn; that in 1874, when the Conveyancing Act, above referred to, became law, the rights of debtor and creditor respectively in the said bond concurred in the person of Sir James Colville; and that confusion accordingly operated, at all events so as to extinguish the fee of the £4500 debt. As regards the 'debtor' side of the matter, it is pointed out (I think fairly enough) that, although in 1874 the entail of Muirside subsisted, and was not known to be invalid, it was truly so from the passing, and under the operation, of the Rutherfurd Act, particularly section 43 thereof, and that Sir James was, therefore, from his succession in 1856 onwards de facto proprietor in fee-simple of the lands. When, however, one comes to consider Sir James Colville's position as creditor in the bond, the matter becomes more difficult. It is not easy to affirm that he was in the full right of credit, looking to the active subsistence of the liferents,

debtor in the bond. Although nominally possessing these lands as heir of entail in possession, he was in reality proprietor in fee-simple. The entail being ineffective,¹ the estate was, from the date of the Rutherfurd Act in 1848, an estate in fee-simple in the person of the heir of entail in possession,² who could have alienated the estate or evacuated the tailzied destination without challenge. (3) The same person having thus become both creditor and debtor, the bond was extinguished confusione,³ at least quoad the fee thereof.⁴

Argued for the respondents (Sir James Colville's trustees);—In order that the reclamer should succeed it was necessary for her to shew that every right and obligation under the bond, both of creditor and debtor, was united in the person of Sir James Colville during his lifetime. (1) This was obviously not true with respect to the annual produce of the sum due under the bond. That belonged to the liferentrics, and to that extent they, and not Sir James Colville, were and to the fact that, at their termination, there might have been an heir of entail in possession of Crombie and Craigflower, other than Sir James himself. I know of no authority which governs this rather perplexing state of matters. It seems to me to be by no means clear that a right of credit of so contingent a kind is sufficient to invest its temporary holder with the character of creditor in a question of confusion. But however that may be, I do not think, regarding the matter upon principle, that it would be possible to hold that the fee of this debt could be extinguished confusione in 1874 consistently with the right of the liferentrics to draw interest upon it, as they in fact did, for thirty years thereafter. It was maintained that Miss Blackburn could not legally or effectually make her bequest in the way she did; and that the liferentrics, in spite of their infestments, had really no right to the interest of the money, at all events after 1874, when the fee was, according to the argument, extinguished by confusion. But these views, which were not supported by reference to authority, appear to me to be unsound. Miss Blackburn's mode of destination was unusual and inconvenient; but I do not think that it was illegal or ineffectual. I was referred to the case of Love (1863, 2 Macph. 22), and especially to certain dicta therein. Lord Neaves said (p. 31),—'When any one is pleno jure the ultimate debtor and creditor in the same debt without relief, that situation in general amounts to confusion, and extinguishes the debt. It may be that other parties are interested in the debt, as when an heirportioner, being the joint creditor in an heritable debt, succeeds as heir to the debtor, or vice versa. The result in that case is that the right is pro rata extinguished. It is difficult to see why a similar rule should not apply to a case of liferent and fee.' The Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) at p. 32 added, —'I participate strongly in the doubts suggested by Lord Neaves whether the right to this third' (of the bond) 'was not extinguished confusione.' I fully acknowledge the great weight which must attach to any words which fell from these eminent Judges. The dicta, however, were purely obiter, and were doubted by Lords Cowan and Benholme (p. 30). Further, it is permissible to observe that the illustration of joint interest suggested by the true creditors. He could not have given a full discharge of the bond, or could only have done so after setting aside a sum to satisfy the liferent interests. (2) Even with respect to the capital, there was a contingent interest during Sir James Colville's lifetime which prevented the fee from vesting in him wholly, namely, the interest of the person who might be heir of entail in possession when the liferent interests came to an end.¹ For at that date the entail had not been broken, and if it had never been broken, and if on the death of the last liferentrix the heir then in possession had come forward, there could have been no answer to his claim on the bond. He would have been entitled to it as the person indicated under the destination in Miss Blackburn's settlement, a fiduciary fee for his behoof having vested in the liferentices at her death. This was admittedly an extension of the doctrine of fiduciary fee, but there was no reason why the doctrine should be confined to cases where the fiduciary fiar stood in loco parentis to the ultimate fiar.² This fiduciary fee continued to exist at least down to the date at which it became apparent that the destination would be inoperative, namely, the date when the entail was broken, a year after Sir James Colville died. During his lifetime accordingly Sir James Colville had at most a contingent right of fee in the bond.

At advising on 6th June 1908,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After the narrative of the facts, quoted supra)—The competition that has arisen is as to who is in right of the fee of this bond which was set free by the death of the liferentrix in 1905. Up to that time, of course, interest on the bond had been duly paid by the proprietor of the lands for the time being to the various liferentices in succession. One claimant in the multiplepounding originally was the person alleging himself to be the person to whom the fee was primarily destined—namely, the heir of entail who might be in possession of the estate of Crombie and Craigflower at the expiry of the liferent. The Lord Ordinary has found that there was in truth no such person, and that part of his judgment has not been reclaimed against.

Lord Neaves appears to be very different in its nature from that of liferent and fee, and that his Lordship does not explain the effect of the application of the doctrine of confusio to the right of the liferenter. If the obligation for the payment of the principal has been finally extinguished, it is hard to see how the right of the liferenter, duly infest, could possibly continue to subsist. It may also be noted that though the facts in Love v. Storie are not very clear from the report, there was in that case an existing fiar, definitely named, which so far distinguishes it from the present case. Upon the best consideration which I am able to give to the argument for Miss Marindin, I am of opinion that it fails, because it appears to me that her counsel cannot successfully maintain that Sir James Colville was, in Lord Neaves' words, 'pleno jure, the ultimate debtor and creditor' in the debt in question. In my judgment, therefore, the claim of Sir James Colville's trustees must be sustained, subject, of course, to their granting a valid discharge in favour of the real raisers. . . ."

But the competition before us is between the trustees of Sir James Col- June 6, 1908.
vile and Miss Marindin, who does not directly compete for the bond, ^{Colville's} because she does not say it belongs to her, but, I think logically enough, ^{Trustees v.}
objects to the condescendence of the fund in medio, because she says that ^{Marindin.} the bond is not an existing burden upon the estates. Of course, it is her ^{Ld. President.}
interest to say so, because as she has the whole produce of the estates under the trust-disposition and settlement of Eden Colville, she would in that case get the whole produce unburdened by an existing bond.

In order to solve this matter it is necessary now to consider exactly what happened when Miss Margaret Blackburn made this settlement of the bond.
I am bound to say that I think Miss Margaret Blackburn attempted an impossibility in conveyancing. She, being in right of the bond and disposition in security, disposed that bond and disposition in security in favour of a certain number of unmarried liferentrics who were alive. That, of course, was quite good. But then she proceeded to dispose of the fee to a person unknown, who might or might not be in existence—namely, the person who at the expiry of these liferents would possess the character of heir of entail under a certain entail—and she did that by means of a direct conveyance without the interposition of a trust. As I say, I think that is a conveyancing impossibility. We are all familiar with the case of Frog's Creditors,¹ and it has again and again been said that the principle of Frog's
*Creditors*¹ would not be extended. *Frog's Creditors*¹ decided that a disposition to a parent in liferent and children in fee will be construed as a fee in the parent, and in the subsequent case of *Newlands*² there is introduced a fiduciary fee in the parent where the liferent is a liferent alienary.
There was a difference of judicial opinion, with very high authorities on both sides, in Cumstie's Trustees,³ but I will be content to take the result of what was arrived at in Cumstie's Trustees,³ namely, that you could have a fiduciary fee for heirs whomsoever; but I have never yet heard—and I do not think we ought to extend the doctrine—of the doctrine of a fiduciary fee for somebody who is neither a child nor an heir in any sense of the person in whom the fiduciary fee is created. Accordingly, I think that what Miss Blackburn wanted to do, if it could be done effectually, could only have been done by the interposition of a trust.

But, although I have thought it necessary to say so, it really does not matter whether this view is correct or not, because the same practical result is reached in another way—and is indeed a direct corollary of the finding of the Lord Ordinary that the destination to the heir who shall be in possession of the estate of Crombie and Craigflower, taking effect as it does when there is no longer an entailed estate of Crombie and Craigflower, is equivalent to no destination—the result, namely, that the fee of this bond was not effectually given to anybody, and accordingly it remained in the hereditas jacens of, or with the heirs of, Miss Blackburn. Who were the heirs of Miss Blackburn in 1842? Her heir at that time was Andrew Colville. Andrew Colville as a matter of fact never made up a title to this bond, and accordingly, as the law then stood, no right ever vested in him, because he did not connect himself by service. He was suc-

June 6, 1908. Colville's Trustees v. Marindin. succeeded by Sir James Colville, who in the same way would have had right to make up a title to the bond. But the same effect in law as had happened with Andrew Colville did not exactly happen with Sir James Colville, because Sir James Colville survived the Conveyancing Act of 1874. As
 Ld. President. your Lordships very well know, the Conveyancing Act of 1874 altered the old law in this particular, and gave persons in the position of Sir James a good personal right without service. Accordingly, by the fact that he had the character of heir to Miss Blackburn and the operation of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, Sir James had a good personal right to the bond for the £4500.

That personal right, if it continued to exist, was necessarily transferred by his trust-disposition and settlement to his trustees. But then Miss Marindin makes this answer. She says:—"Yes, it would have been transferred, but in the meantime as you, Sir James, were heir of entail in possession under a bad entail, and as such were debtor in the bond because you possessed the lands of Muirside, confusion took place, and the fee of the bond was once and for all wiped out." I do not think that that took place, and I think the matter is quite clearly explained by Mr Erskine, and really settled by a couple of authorities. Mr Erskine treating of confusion in section 27, Book 3, Title 4, says:—"Confusio hath not always the effect of a total and perpetual extinction of a debt or right. Sometimes it produces only a temporary suspension of it, while the debtor and creditor continue one and the same person, or while the same person is entitled to the succession of the two several rights, from the different destination of which the confusio flows. But when the succession of these rights happens again to divide in two the obligation or right which lay for a while sunk or dormant confusione revives and recovers its first force." In support of these propositions he quotes two cases, both of which seem to me satisfactorily to determine this matter. The first is the case of *Gordon*¹ in Morison, 11,164. The rubric of that case is:—"A creditor in debts affecting an entailed estate succeeding as heir of entail in that estate the debts are not extinguished confusione." The circumstances of that case are rather involved, and I do not take up your Lordship's time by going through them, because I can do so more clearly in the other case which he quotes. The case is that of *Irvine*² in Morison, 3042:—"In the year 1683 Alexander Irvine of Drum made a tailzie of his estate in favour of himself and the heirs-male of his body, which failing, to certain other heirs-male named. In the year 1687 the said Alexander Irvine executed a bond of provision for the sum of £80,000 Scots to his second son Charles, and the heirs-male of his body, which failing, to the other heirs-male of the persons nominated and designed by him to succeed in his lands and heritages. The heirs-male of the entailer's body having failed, the succession, both of the entailed estate and of the bond, devolved upon Alexander Irvine, of Murthill, who was accordingly served heir of tailzie to the said estate, but did not expedite any service to the said bond of provision. After his decease his son and apparent heir granted a bond for £10,000 sterling to a trustee, who thereupon charged him to enter heir of provision to Charles, in order to make up a title by adjudication to the £80,000 bond; and having thus established the bond in his person he again charged the apparent heir of tailzie in the estate of Drum, and obtained an adjudication against the estate for the said debt of £80,000. In a process at the trustee's instance against the heirs of entail concluding that the bond of £80,000 Scots was a subsisting debt and did effectually burden the entailed estate of Drum, the Lords found that the heir-male of Murthill being served heir to the estate of Drum, his service did not state him in the right to the £80,000 bond so as to operate a confusion in his person; and that this Drum being charged to enter heir in special to Charles and adjudication having thereon followed, did not operate a confusion of debtor and creditor in Drum's person; and therefore found that the said bond of provision is not extinguished, but is still a subsisting debt upon the estate of Drum."

Colville's
Trustees v.
Marindin.
Ld. President.

That, I think, brings out perfectly clearly that Mr Erskine's doctrine is quite right; whether confusion will take place or not depends upon the identity of the destination. For if confusio took place automatically the moment that there was a concursum debtor and creditor in the same person then there must have been confusio the moment that the heir of entail entered as heir of provision to the £80,000 bond. Here obviously, there was no identity of destination, because on the creditor's side of the bond the destination was to a series of heirs of Miss Margaret Blackburn, while on the debtor's side of the bond the destination was to a series of heirs of tailzie in a certain estate of land. Although it is quite true, as we now know, that these lands, being held under a bad entail, were held in fee-simple, yet it is trite law that until the destination is evacuated the destination goes on. It seems to me, therefore, there never was ipso jure confusion, which alone would be useful for Miss Marindin's argument, because there is the necessary splitting again by the operation of Sir James's disposition and settlement. Although on a somewhat different line of reasoning, I have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is quite right, and ought to be affirmed.

Without special instructions from the principals, and without their knowledge, he employed a firm of law-agents to prepare a certain deed, and informed them that it was on his principals' behalf. On his failing to pay the law-agents' account, they brought an action against the principals for the amount of that account. The defenders denied having employed the pursuers.

Held that the agent had no authority from the defenders to employ the pursuers, and defenders assolized.

1st DIVISION. ON 29th January 1907 Messrs J. M. & J. H. Robertson, writers, Glasgow, and the individual partners thereof, brought an action against Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, Limited, wine merchants, Kirkcaldy, concluding for payment of (first) the sum of £19, 12s. 2d., and (second) the sum of £11, 1s. 1d., being the amount of their business account for work done in connection with the amalgamation of the defenders' firm with the firm of John Taylor & Company, Limited, wine merchants, Glasgow.

The pursuers averred:—"In or prior to the month of July 1902 the defenders agreed to acquire the business of John Taylor & Company, Glasgow, Limited. The negotiations were conducted by J. Moore Fulton, C.A., Glasgow, and through him the pursuers were employed to prepare the necessary agreement on behalf of both parties. Said agreement was in the knowledge of the defenders duly prepared by the pursuers, and was executed on 22d and 23d July 1902. A copy of the said agreement is produced. It provides that the whole expenses in connection with the preparation and implementation of the agreement should be borne by the defenders, and under it Mr Fulton was appointed liquidator for the winding-up of the said John Taylor & Company, Glasgow, Limited. The pursuers' business account in connection with the matter amounted to £30, 13s. 3d., of which £19, 12s. 2d. were their fees, being the sum first sued for, and £11, 1s. 1d. were outlays, being the sum second concluded for."

In answer the defenders averred:—"In June or July 1902 a proposal was made to the defenders by Mr J. Moore Fulton, C.A., Glasgow, to ascertain if the defenders' company would take over the business of John Taylor & Company, Glasgow, Limited. The defenders agreed to the proposals which were made, and Mr Fulton carried through the amalgamation. To remunerate Mr Fulton for his trouble in carrying out the said amalgamation the defenders agreed to pay him a fee of £200 to cover all charges, expenses, and outlays against them in connection with the said amalgamation. The defenders never employed the pursuers to do any legal work in connection with the said amalgamation or on their behalf, and the whole of the legal work charged for in said business account was performed by the pursuers without any instructions from the defenders. It was only on 25th April 1905 that the defenders learnt for the first time that the foresaid agreement had been prepared by the pursuers."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The defenders having employed the pursuers to do the work and make the outlays charged for, decree should be granted in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The defenders never having employed pursuers to do the work or make the disbursements charged for, et separatim, the pursuers having no jus quæsitum in respect of said agreement to make defenders liable for said sums, decree of absolvitor June 6, 1908. should be pronounced.

A proof was allowed and led. The import of the evidence, so far as bearing on the decision, will be found set forth in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Lord President.

On 6th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) pronounced an interlocutor decerning against the defenders for the amounts sued for.*

J. M. & J. H.
Robertson v.
Beatson,
M'Laren, &
Co., Limited.

* "OPINION.—I do not think it necessary that I should take time to consider this case, because it appears to me to be a fairly simple one. I agree with counsel on both sides in regretting the necessity that has caused it, because it is clear that one or other of the parties to it must suffer for what I cannot characterise as other than the fraud of the agent who came between them. Mr Fulton's position it is hardly possible to understand. But that he has defrauded one or both of the parties is perfectly clear. That leaves it, therefore, necessary to determine the legal rights of the parties irrespective of any question of hardship, because hardship must fall on one or other of them.

"The circumstances out of which the case arose are these: Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, of Kirkcaldy, are wine merchants, carrying on a limited liability business in Kirkcaldy. Mr Fulton was their auditor. Messrs John Taylor & Company, also a limited company, and carrying on a business something of the same character in Glasgow, were, apparently, not very prosperous; and, inasmuch as Mr Fulton was also their auditor, and, therefore, knew the circumstances of both businesses, he, very likely in concert with the managing director of Taylor & Company, brought before Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, a proposal that they should acquire the business of Taylor & Company. That resulted in certain negotiations, the details of which are not very clearly proved or necessary to be proved, but they ended in heads of an agreement being adjusted, which are No. 16 of process. These are not dated, but we are told that they were prepared by Mr Fulton, in conjunction with the managing director of Taylor & Company, and that they embody the heads on which the managing parties in both these Companies were prepared to entertain the suggested acquisition, which resulted, in course, in the amalgamation of the two Companies. These two Companies were both private limited Companies, and I think it is pretty clearly to be inferred that the real interest in them was in the managing officials. Matters having got this length, it is admitted by Mr Beatson that this is what ensued: Mr Fulton as, whatever you like to call him, general agent, or middleman, or broker, who brought the parties together, who had been a party to the adjusting of the above-mentioned heads of agreement, was told to carry through the amalgamation, and he did so. He became, as it seems to me, the general agent of both these limited Companies, and he occupied what I may call, to borrow a phrase from conveyancing, the position of a general special agent. He had a special mandate to carry through this particular piece of business, which was the amalgamation of these two small private limited Companies, but he had a general mandate to do what was necessary for the purpose.

"Now, if it had not been for a term in the agreement, I think that Messrs Robertson, who did some work under Mr Fulton's employment, would have had to sue both parties to the amalgamation. But I think I have already said that the Court never favours circuitry in litigation, and that inasmuch as Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company have, by a term of the agreement, undertaken to pay the whole expenses of the amalgamation, it is quite proper to allow the action to proceed against Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company alone, without calling Messrs Taylor & Company, to whom they are liable in relief.

"Now, the position of an agent who is appointed for a special purpose,

Robertson v.

M'Leod, &
Co., Limited.

The defenders reclaimed, and the case was heard on 19th February 1908.

Argued for the defenders and reclaimers;—Fulton had not transacted here as the agent of the defenders. He had been employed to do certain work himself, and his contract with the defenders was one of "hire," not of "mandate." There was no proof that he had received any special authority to employ a law-agent, nor could such authority be implied from his relationship with the defenders. Even if he were in any sense an agent he was certainly not a general agent.¹ Even a general agent had no implied authority to pledge his principal's credit to a law-agent. If he were a special agent it was for company promotion only, and that did not cover an implied authority to employ law-agents at his principal's expense.

Argued for pursuers and respondents;—(1) The nature of Fulton's employment was such as to imply authority to bind his principals without terms or conditions qualifying the appointment, appears to me to be perfectly soundly stated in 'Evans on Principal and Agent,' in the passage which was referred to. I think, unless there is any special restriction in his appointment, that he has the powers necessarily incident to proper performance of the business that is confided to him, and, as Mr Evans says, 'Amongst such powers are those which enable the agent to employ all the necessary and usual means of executing the principal authority with effect.' Now, I ask first, what was the thing he was set to do? To carry out the amalgamation of the two Companies. That is not just such a simple thing as Mr Beatson, the managing director of one of these Companies, seems to have thought. First of all, in ordinary practice, and, I think, necessary practice, when you are dealing with companies, one of which is to be wound up and the other has to issue shares in payment to the first and so on, a formal written agreement is required. I do not see how the transaction can be carried out otherwise. Inter alia, I do not see how the proper stamp-duty can be adjusted. And, moreover, it involves the keeping the two Companies straight in matters of company law in carrying out the details of such a transaction. I do not think there can be a better example of the necessity than the way in which the managers of Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, have carried through this matter, so far as they acted by themselves and without taking proper advice. The resolutions which they proposed to their shareholders are totally inconsistent with the situation which they were attempting to create, and shew that they were ignorant of the methods of company amalgamation, and lead to the conclusion that they would have done well to have put themselves more instead of less under legal guidance.

"Mr Beatson's position as secretary would warrant one to suppose that he was sufficiently familiar with company law to enable him to carry through such a matter. But it is quite evident that, in a small company such as this, the secretary and managing director may be a practical man, carrying on the business efficiently, and yet knowing little or nothing about company law. Accordingly, there is a discrepancy between the draft heads of agreement, No. 16 of process, the final agreement of which No. 6 is a copy, and the resolutions of the Company, which ought to have been resolutions approving of a provisional agreement, but which, instead of that, are resolutions offering the terms contained in an agreement which the directors had already signed on the same day as a final agreement.

"Well, now, if it was natural and proper that a written agreement should be entered into, and that what had to be done in fulfilment of that agreement should be carried out in proper formal order, is it the business of the defenders had adopted the employment of the pursuers by making use of the agreement prepared by them and bearing their name. By adoption any deficiency in the original authority of the agent was made good.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action by a firm of Glasgow solicitors against company promoter—if you choose to call him so—to carry it through at his own hand, without any legal advice? I think it is not. I think that what was committed to him in the carrying out of this amalgamation justified and necessitated that, at the proper point, he should take the proper assistance.

I think that in applying to Messrs Robertson's firm he did nothing it was outwith his duty to do, and that if, in carrying out the amalgamation he had—either in the agreement or in the necessary subsequent steps—made mistakes, he would have been responsible for not having got the proper advice. Messrs Robertson's position is perfectly above board in this matter.
Mr Fulton applied to them, first of all, to put the heads of agreement into a draft agreement; and, further, to put the adjusted draft into an extended agreement, which they did; and, moreover, to attend to the matter of the stamp-duty. I do not think that a company promoter would be justified in adjusting the stamp-duty on the transfer of its business by one company to another without legal advice. That is perhaps the most important matter that Mr G. W. T. Robertson, of the firm of Messrs J. M. & J. H. Robertson, had to do. But I should gather that he had further to give Mr Fulton, if I may judge of his capacity from his appearance in the box—a good deal of further assistance.

“Now, Mr Fulton undoubtedly employed him. Mr Fulton's shifty conduct afterwards may lead to surmising as to what was in Mr Fulton's mind when he did so. But if the mandate to employ was given him, the shifty nature of Mr Fulton's mind can in no way affect the rights of the person employed. The person employed did the work, and the work done was brought under the notice of Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, because it is impossible for Mr Beatson to say that the agreement—of which a copy is No. 6 of process—bearing Messrs Robertson's name, and accompanied by the usual schedule for execution, was so like the draft heads of agreement that he could suppose that the one was just a transcript of the other. There are changes; and, although it was not a difficult deed to draw, it is a deed which is put into legal form, and there is a considerable difference between it and the draft heads. The deed is signed, and the deed is acted upon, and it has been so adopted that, at the present moment, it must be taken to be a binding agreement between the two companies.

“If that is the case, then let us look at Mr Fulton's conduct subsequently.
After a bit, he gets £200 to cover his charges, expenses, and outlays. That £200 unquestionably covered Messrs Robertson's account. But, then, that is behind the back of Messrs Robertson, and the fact that Mr Fulton has

The truth of the matter is that the person who is really due this £33 is not the defender, while on the other hand, the pursuers are entitled to their money. The real debtor, who is a certain gentleman whom we have not before us, has long ago been paid the money which ought to have been paid over by him to the pursuers. Therefore, it being one of these unfortunate cases where a loss has got to be put upon innocent persons, one cannot help regretting that it did not occur to some one that the apportionment of £16, 10s. to each of the parties would have saved a great deal of money in the long run. But thus is the law enriched, and the reporters are saved from idleness.

J. M. & J. H.
Robertson v.
Beatson,
M'Leod &
Co., Limited.
Ld. President.

The decision of the case will depend upon whether there was or was not employment. It had its origin in the fact that Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, Limited, wished to effect an amalgamation with a firm called Taylor & Company, and in order to bring about this amalgamation they employed a person of the name of Fulton, who professed himself skilled in those things. The amalgamation was brought about, and in the course of dealing with it Fulton, who did not think himself equal to drawing one of the deeds which was necessary, went to the present pursuers, Messrs Robertson, writers, Glasgow, and there is no question that Messrs Robertson executed the work in perfect good faith, and with perfect ability and skill; the question is on whose credit did they do it? There is not practically himself been paid, and has to a certain extent misapplied the payment to him in respect that he has not used it to pay charges in connection with this amalgamation, does not in any way preclude Messrs Robertson from going direct to the disclosed principal with their accounts. It appears to me Mr Fulton began by deceiving Messrs Robertson by leading them to assume that the amalgamation was hanging fire, and that the agreement, although signed, was not being carried through; and then, taking advantage of this deception to lead them to offer to take their mere outlays; and then when they had done so, he went to Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company and got from them a cheque to pay Messrs Robertson's outlays, which cheque he never transmitted to Messrs Robertson, but appropriated to his own use. Messrs Robertson have stood for four or five years without obtaining any remuneration for their services, and it seems to me that, in such circumstances, they are entitled to go for payment of their accounts direct against Mr Fulton's principals.

"It is to be regretted that Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company should be called upon to pay, if I may say so, three times over. They have already paid £200, which ought to have covered this claim; they have paid the ten guineas which was remitted by them for the purpose of paying Messrs Robertson's outlays, and they have now to pay again their whole account. But, I am afraid, the results of Mr Fulton's fraud must fall somewhere, and, in my opinion, the law requires that they should fall upon Messrs Beatson, M'Leod, & Company.

"In the matter of expenses, of course, Messrs Robertson must have their expenses. I admit they were quite entitled to come here for judgment; but I think that the case was one which might have properly been disposed of otherwise, and when I see the account of their expenses as taxed, I may consider it proper to make some modification. I shall find them entitled to expenses as taxed, reserving the question of modification."

any doubt about this. One might take it either from the testimony of the June 8, 1908. one side or the other. So far as the pursuers are concerned, Mr Robertson, J. M. & J. H. the pursuer himself, says,—“I never heard of Beatson, M'Leod, & Com- Robertson v. pany, Limited, or Taylor & Company, before the date Fulton came and told Beatson, me to do the work. I have never met any of the directors of Beatson, M'Leod, & Co., Limited. M'Leod, & Company, Limited.” Of course I entirely believe Mr Robertson Ld. President. that Fulton told him that he was to do the work for Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, Limited; but then, of course, that does not prove authority. In the same way, if you take the testimony of Mr Beatson, the defender, he says Mr Fulton never told him that he was going to employ a firm of lawyers in Glasgow. “I never heard that a firm of lawyers had been instructed till some years afterwards, and I never knew there was such a firm.”

The Lord Ordinary has found the defenders liable although he agrees that Fulton had long ago been paid, because he considered that he had the power to do such things as were necessary for his agency. As regards that general proposition there is no doubt; but I do not think that the business of arranging an amalgamation of companies or company promoting is so well defined that it necessarily carries with it a right to involve the principal's credit with a law-agent. I think that such a business must be on very much more regularly known lines to admit of any such general proposition. The sort of class of case where right to employ a law-agent would be necessarily understood is well illustrated by one of those cases which is in the books, where it was held that a person who told an Edinburgh agent to prosecute an appeal before the House of Lords must be presumed to know that the Edinburgh agent could only do it by employing a Parliamentary solicitor; and even although the client had never any direct relations with the Parliamentary solicitor he must pay the Parliamentary solicitor's bill. That I quite understand, because there is only one way of doing that; but when you come to arrange about amalgamations of companies, there are many firms of accountants who do such work who would carry through the whole transaction themselves. There are many persons—I am not going to mention names—who have been before your Lordships in Court who are capable of conducting large amalgamations, and who would never think of employing a law-agent. To say that the defenders were to take the measure of Mr Fulton and to see—as his Lordship said he could see—that that gentleman was not very clever—and that they must necessarily have said to themselves, “we are giving him authority to pledge our credit with any law-agent to whom he chooses to go,” is a proposition which I cannot bring myself to face.

The only other point is that there is written on the back of the deed, in the ordinary way, the name of a solicitor, and that is the solicitor who was employed. That is rather a slender ground for liability. It is rather difficult to be quite certain even that Beatson, M'Leod, & Company, Limited, ever read the name of the solicitor on the back of the deed. Even supposing they did, that did not necessarily shew that they had pledged their credit. According to their idea Fulton was taking a slump payment to see them through, and all I think the name on the back necessarily brought to their minds was that Fulton, for his own purposes, had gone to June 6, 1908. a law-agent and employed him. That does not seem to put the matter any further. I have come to the conclusion that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I think that the pursuers—there is no question that they did the work—ought to have sued the man who directly employed them, and not the present defenders, who never employed them at all.

J. M. & J. H.
Robertson v.
Beatson,
M'Leod, &
Co., Limited.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this had been the ordinary case of the promotion of a company, the law is perfectly well settled. Wherever, in order to establish a new commercial undertaking, it is necessary that law-agents, engineers, or other experts, should be employed by the promoters, these persons have a claim against the promoters who are liable to them, and against no other person unless that person can be shewn to have taken over the obligation. It is not unusual in such cases that the company undertakes to relieve the promoters of their obligation, and to pay the preliminary expenses. I suppose there are few companies that do not give some undertaking of the kind; but supposing that they do not choose to do it, the experts employed by the promoters have no claim except against the person who employed them. I do not think the principle is varied by the fact that in this case the object proposed was an amalgamation of two existing companies in order to form a third; because the question still remains, who employed this law-agent? I cannot see that he has any claim against either of the companies unless they knew of his employment and sanctioned it, or agreed that the company was to be responsible for his fees. Without entering into the question of whether money was given to Fulton to provide for the payment, it is enough for the decision of this case that no direct employment of the pursuers by either of the companies is made out, and therefore no action can lie against either at the instance of the pursuers.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with your Lordships that Mr Fulton had no authority from the defenders to employ the pursuers' firm, and it follows that the pursuers have no action against the defenders.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and assoilzied the defenders.

Citizens Life Assurance Co. v. Brown, L. R., [1904] A. C., 423, followed.

Reparation—Slander—Privilege—Malice—Issue.—In an action of damages for slander brought by a married woman against a limited liability company as the owners of a theatre, the pursuer averred that while she was witnessing a performance in the defenders' theatre the defenders' servants falsely stated within the hearing of her husband and others that she was a notorious prostitute who had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks previously for being drunk and disorderly, and that she must leave the theatre; and that the statements complained of were made by the defenders' servants in the course of their service and for the defenders' benefit. The pursuer referred for its terms to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, founded on by the defenders which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre.

Held (1) (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that the pursuer's averments were relevant, and (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that the occasion was privileged and that malice must be inserted in the issue.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Master and Servant—Liability of master for slander uttered by servant.—In an action of damages for slander brought by a married man against a limited liability company, as the owners of a theatre, the pursuer averred that while he and his wife were witnessing a performance in the defenders' theatre the under-manager falsely stated that the pursuer's wife was a bad character and must leave the theatre, that on the pursuer explaining that the lady was his wife, the under-manager replied that "he had heard that story before," and that the under-manager subsequently falsely stated to the manager of the theatre that the pursuer's wife was a notorious prostitute who had two weeks previously been thrown out of the theatre for being drunk and disorderly. The pursuer further averred that the statements complained of were made of and concerning him, and represented that he was a person of loose and immoral habits and character, that he was associating with a notorious prostitute of drunken and disorderly habits, and was attempting by deliberate falsehood to pass her off as his wife; that the management and conduct of the theatre were left in the hands of the manager and under-manager, and that the statements complained of were made by the under-manager in the course of his employment and for the benefit of the defenders. The pursuer referred to a bye-law, made under statutory authority, which was applicable to the theatre, and which provided that the licensed manager should not permit men or women of bad fame to enter the theatre.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant—per Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Low, on the ground that it was not relevantly averred that the statements complained of, so far as relating to the husband and not merely to the wife, were uttered by the defenders' servant in the course of his employment; and per Lord Ardwall, on the ground that the statements complained of did not constitute a slander on the pursuer.

MRS DORA ALEXANDER OR FINBURGH, wife of and residing with David Finburgh, Maplewell House, New Walk, Leicester, brought an action of damages for slander against Moss' Empires, Limited, owners and managers of the Empire Theatre of Varieties, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow.

David Finburgh also brought an action of damages for slander against Moss' Empires, Limited.

Mrs Finburgh averred that in November 1907 she was on a visit to Glasgow with her husband, that on 13th November 1907 she and her husband and a party of friends arranged to proceed to the defenders' Empire Theatre, and that in addition to the pursuer and her husband the party consisted of Joseph Lipscher, Paris, and John Franklin, Liverpool.

Mrs Finburgh further averred :—(Cond. 3) " While the party were seated in their box, and shortly after the performance commenced, . . . one of the defenders' attendants in uniform entered the box, scrutinised the occupants, and then left. A few minutes after the defenders' under-manager entered the box accompanied by said attendant. The said under-manager then said, pointing at and referring to the pursuer, ' That woman is a bad character, and must leave this theatre.' The pursuer's husband explained that the pursuer was his wife. The under-manager replied that ' he had heard that story before,' and that the pursuer must leave at once. Said statements were all made in the presence and hearing of the pursuer, her husband, his friends, and the theatre attendants. The pursuer was very much shocked at the charge made against her, and her husband went out of the box and insisted on the defenders' manager being summoned.

. . . The manager questioned the under-manager and the attendant on the subject, and they both stated that the pursuer was a notorious prostitute, and had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks before for being drunk and disorderly. These statements were made in the presence and hearing of the pursuer's husband, the said Joseph Lipscher, and the theatre manager and attendants. On hearing this said statement the manager said to the pursuer's husband, ' That is quite enough, the woman must leave at once,' meaning thereby that the pursuer was a notorious prostitute, and had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks before for being drunk and disorderly, that she was a bad character, and unfit to be allowed to remain in a respectable theatre. The pursuer and her husband and friends thereupon left the theatre. With reference to the explanations in answer it is admitted that the defenders' manager subsequently explained that a mistake had been made, and tendered an apology. Quoad ultra the explanations in answer are denied, in so far as not coinciding herewith, under reference to the bye-laws * mentioned for their terms."

(Cond. 4) " The statements above condescended on were made of and concerning the pursuer, and are false and calumnious. . . " (Cond. 5)

" The defenders are a limited company, and the whole management and conduct of the said theatre is entirely left to the said manager, under-manager, and attendants, who are charged by the defenders with the whole conduct of the business. The said false and calumnious statements were of and concerning the pursuer, and were made by the defenders' said manager, under-manager, and attendant in the course of their service with the defenders and for the defenders' benefit, and were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously."

The defenders referred to the Glasgow Bye-law, No. 25, quoted infra, and averred :—(Ans. 3) " . . . The defenders' servants

* By No. 25 of the bye-laws and regulations made by the Magistrates of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow in pursuance of the powers conferred upon them by the Glasgow Police (Further Powers) Act, 1892, and duly confirmed by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, for the maintenance of order in the theatres in the said city and royal burgh, it is provided, inter alia, that the licensed manager shall not, by himself or his servants, knowingly permit or suffer men or women of bad fame, or dissolute boys or girls, to enter any theatre as spectators or in any other capacity.

acted throughout in the bona fide exercise of their duty under the said bye-law and with the utmost discretion; and no member of the public present in the theatre was in any way aware of the incident.”

Mr Finburgh in the action at his instance, after setting forth what occurred as averred in the action at the instance of his wife, averred:— (Cond. 4) “The statements above condescended on were false and defamatory of the pursuer as well as of his wife, and falsely and calumniously represented, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer was a person of loose and immoral habits and character, that he was associating with a notorious prostitute of drunken and disorderly habits, and that he was attempting by deliberate falsehood to pass her off as his wife.” He also made averments in similar terms to those contained in article 5 of the condescendence in the action at the instance of his wife.

Finburgh v.
Moss’ Empires,
Limited.

The defenders pleaded in both actions;—(1) The pursuer’s averments being irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusion of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (2) The defenders not having slandered the pursuer, they should be assoilzied. (4) Esto that the servants of the defenders used slanderous expressions towards the pursuer, they acted, in so doing, outwith the scope of their employment as servants of the defenders; and the latter are not responsible therefor. (5) The defenders’ servants having acted in bona fide and with probable cause in the discharge of their duty under the bye-laws libelled, and having been privileged in so doing, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 27th February 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) approved of the following issues:—

In Mrs Finburgh’s action.—“(1) Whether, on or about 13th November 1907, in the Empire Theatre of Varieties, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, owned and managed by the defenders, the defenders, by their under-manager, in the presence and hearing of pursuer’s husband, David Finburgh, residing at Maplewell House, New Walk, Leicester, Joseph Lipscher, . . . Paris, and John Franklin, . . . Liverpool, or one or more of them, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that she was a bad character and must leave the theatre, or used words of like import and effect, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? (2) Whether, on or about 13th November 1907, in the Empire Theatre of Varieties, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, owned and managed by the defenders, the defenders, by their under-manager, and one of their attendants at said theatre, or one or other of them, in the presence and hearing of David Finburgh, residing at Maplewell House, New Walk, Leicester, Joseph Lipscher . . . Paris, or one or other of them, falsely and calumniously stated of and concerning the pursuer that she was a prostitute and had been put out of the theatre shortly before for being drunk and disorderly; whether on hearing said statement the defenders’ manager said ‘That is quite enough, the woman must leave at once,’ or words of like import and effect, and whether the defenders, by their said manager, thereby falsely and calumniously represented, or intended to represent, that the pursuer was a prostitute and unfit to be allowed to remain in a respectable theatre, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?” *

Finburgh v.
Moss'
Empires,
Limited.

In Mr Finburgh's action.—"Whether on or about 13th November 1907, in the Empire Theatre of Varieties, Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, owned and managed by the defenders, the defenders, by their under-manager, and one of their attendants at said theatre, or one or other of them, falsely and calumniously, in the presence and hearing of the pursuer, his wife, Mrs Dora Alexander or Finburgh, residing at Maplewell House, New Walk, Leicester, Joseph Lipscher . . . Paris, and John Franklin . . . Liverpool, or one or other of them, the course of their service and for the defenders' benefit. The case therefore raises the point recently discussed in Nicklas v. The New Popular Café Company, Limited, 1908, 15 S. L. T. 735. An issue was there refused, because I was of opinion that it could not be said upon the averments that the defenders' servant was acting within the scope of her authority in using the language complained of. In Eprile v. Caledonian Railway Company, 6 S. L. T. 65, an issue was refused in similar circumstances by Lord Kincairney.

"I am, however, of opinion that if on record a pursuer sets forth that verbal slander was uttered by the servant of a company in such circumstances as to indicate that prima facie the uttering of the slander was an act of the company, he is then entitled to an issue in the form proposed in the present case, viz., whether the defenders by their servant uttered the slander complained of. It will then be for the jury to say whether the act complained of fell within the scope of the servant's employment, or whether it was one for which the defenders are not responsible.

"This conclusion seems to me to follow from what has been decided in Scotland as regards written slander. It has been held in Ellis v. National Free Labour Association, 7 F. 629, that the principle laid down by the Privy Council in Citizens Life Assurance Company v. Brown, 1904, A. C., 423, applies in Scotland. According to that a servant may write a slander involving liability on his master, just as he may commit any other act on which an action for reparation against his master can be founded. The question in such a case, as is pointed out by the Lord President, is just whether the servant in doing what is complained of was acting within the scope of his employment or not. If this be the question, then I am unable to see, in point of principle, why, if the servant is acting within the scope of his employment, the master should not be equally liable whether the slander be spoken or written. It is true that up to the present no case has occurred in which an issue has been granted in such circumstances. In Nicklas I stated I would be slow to grant one, having fully in view what was said in Agnew v. British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited, 8 F. 422, that to open the door to liability for any slanderous language rashly used by anyone in the employment of another, or of a corporation, would be to open the door very wide indeed.

"The safeguard against this, in my opinion, is to make it incumbent upon the pursuer to set forth on record facts from which prima facie it may be inferred that the verbal slander complained of is a company act. The question accordingly in the present case is whether this has been done. It is to be observed that the employer who is sought to be made liable is a company, and not an individual. A company can only act and speak through its servants.

"I think the pursuer makes a strong case on her averments, which are these:—She is a married woman, who went with her husband and two friends to the defenders' theatre in Glasgow. A box was paid for and the party had taken their seats, when first a page-boy, and then one of the defenders' attendants in uniform, came and scrutinised them. Shortly afterwards the under-manager, accompanied by the same attendant, entered the box, and said, 'That woman is a bad character, and must leave the theatre.' The pursuer's husband explained that she was his wife, when the under-manager replied that 'he had heard that story before,' and that the pursuer must leave at once. Her husband then went out of the box, and insisted on the defenders' manager being summoned. When he came he questioned the under-manager and the attendant. They both stated that the pursuer was a notorious prostitute, and had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks before for being drunk and disorderly. On hearing this statement the manager said to the pursuer's husband, 'That is quite enough; the woman must leave at once.' The pursuer and her husband thereupon left the theatre. These are the pursuer's averments.

"The pursuer then avers in cond. 5 that the defenders are a limited company, and that the whole management and conduct of the theatre is entirely left to the manager, under-manager, and attendants, who are charged by the defenders with the whole conduct of the business; that the statements complained of were made by the defenders' manager, under-manager, and attendant, in the course of their service with the defenders and for the defenders' benefit, and were made and persisted in most recklessly, pertinaciously, and maliciously. I agree with the defenders' counsel that the averments in cond. 5 are not sufficient by themselves to entitle the pursuer to an issue. On a question of relevancy, however, it is permissible to look at the defenders' answer. In ans. 3 they explain that by the bye-laws made by the Magistrates of Glasgow for the maintenance of order in theatres in the city, which apply to the defenders' theatre, it is provided, inter alia, 'that the licensed manager shall not, by himself or by his servants, knowingly permit or suffer men or women of bad fame, or dissolute boys or girls, to enter any theatre as spectators or in any other capacity.' Then follows the defenders' explanation of what they say actually occurred, and they aver that 'the defenders' servants acted throughout in the bona fide exercise of their duty under the said bye-law, and with the utmost discretion; and no member of the public present in the theatre was in any way aware of the incident.' They no doubt deny that any slander was uttered, and say that if their servants did slander the pursuer, in doing so they acted outwith the scope of their employment.

"In my opinion the record discloses a prima facie case that it was the defenders who, by their servants, slandered the pursuer, and that the issues should be allowed in the terms proposed.

"At the discussion of the issues a motion was made by the pursuers' counsel that the case should be tried by a jury upon the record without issues, as though two issues are required there is only one wrong complained of. I think it better that the jury should have the issues. The defenders' counsel contended that if there was to be inquiry it should be by way of proof. The case, however, seems to be one for a jury.

"It was further maintained that the record shewed the case was one of privilege, and that therefore malice should be inserted in the issue. The case of Buchanan v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 7 F. 1001, was founded on. That, however, was a different case from the present. I do not consider a case of privilege is disclosed on the record, and am therefore of opinion that malice should not go into the issue.

"I shall accordingly approve of the issues proposed."

woman must leave at once,' or words of the like import and effect; whether said statements falsely and calumniously represented, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer was associating with a prostitute, and that he was attempting by deliberate falsehood to pass her off as his wife, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"*

The defenders reclaimed. The case was argued before the Second Division on 26th and 30th May and 2d June 1908.

Argued for the defenders and reclaimers;—(Wife's Action).—While an employer was liable for a libel written by a servant who was acting within the scope of his employment,¹ he was not liable for his servant's verbal slander. The Lord Ordinary seemed to have taken the view that the employer would be liable if special circumstances were averred shewing that the verbal slander was the act of the employer. That view was unworkable. The Court had always refused to allow an issue in actions founded on verbal slander by a servant,² even where the circumstances were such that an issue must have been allowed if the case had been one of libel.³ This distinction between libel and verbal slander was founded on expediency. It was reasonable that an employer should be responsible for a libel written by his servant, because a libel was a deliberate act of which a record remained. It was not reasonable that the employer should be responsible for words rashly uttered by a servant. The doctrine of *Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank*⁴ was applicable to the case of libel, but it could not be applied to the case of verbal slander. (2) In any view, the occasion was privileged. The defenders owed a duty to the public at common law, and under the Glasgow bye-laws, to keep the theatre clear of undesirable characters. It was in the course of performing that duty that the defenders' employees uttered the words complained of. The case was one of bona fide error in the execution of a duty. Accordingly, if an issue were to be allowed at all malice must be inserted.⁵ (Husband's Action).—The action at the instance

* "OPINION.—In this case the general question as to the defenders' liability for verbal slander alleged to have been uttered by their servants is the same as that raised in the action at Mrs Finburgh's instance, and the averments are substantially the same. I therefore beg respectfully to refer to my opinion in that case.

"The issue proposed in this case is whether the statements made by the under-manager and attendant (which are set out in the issue) falsely and calumniously represented, and were intended to represent, that the pursuer was associating with a prostitute, and that he was attempting by deliberate falsehood to pass her off as his wife. This appears to me to raise a question of direct not indirect slander. The husband is not seeking damages because of the slander on his wife, but on account of the imputation on his own character.

"This, I think, entitles him to maintain an action, and, for the reasons given in the opinion referred to, I am of opinion he is entitled to sue the defenders.

"I shall accordingly approve of the issue proposed."

of the husband was irrelevant. The words complained of were uttered of and concerning the wife, and therefore could not be a slander on the husband. If the wife had been accompanied by a large party of friends, each of them would have been in the same position as the husband, and would have been equally entitled to bring an action against the defenders. Further, if there was a slander, it was not uttered in the course of the employment. The duty of the defenders' servants was to exclude undesirable characters. It was no part of their duty to turn out and slander the friends of undesirable characters.

Argued for the pursuers and respondents ;—(Wife's Action).—The maxim qui facit per alium facit per se applied to delicts as well as to contracts. An employer was liable for a wrong done by his servant provided the wrong was done in the course of the employment and for the benefit of the employer.¹ It could not be disputed that that principle applied to the case of libel by a servant.² There was no sound reason in principle, and there was no authority, for drawing a distinction between the case of libel and the case of verbal slander. In the cases cited by the defenders³ issues had been refused because the Court held that the slander averred was not uttered by the servant in the course of his employment. These cases were indirect authorities in favour of the pursuer, because, if an employer were not liable for his servant's verbal slander, that would have been a very simple ground of judgment. The Court had refused to adopt that ground of judgment, and the true inference was that it was not well founded in law. While, therefore, there was no case in which an issue had been allowed in respect of verbal slander by a servant, it appeared from the authorities that an action would lie provided it was well averred that in uttering the slander the servant was acting within the scope of his employment. There could be no doubt on that point in the present case. The fact that the defenders were a limited company was immaterial. The theory that a corporation could not be guilty of malice had been exploded.⁴ A company could sue⁴ and be sued⁵ in respect of slander. (2) The occasion was not privileged. While a statement made in the course of executing a duty was privileged, the duty must be a duty owed by the person making the statement to the person to whom the statement was made.⁶ Here the defenders' servants owed a duty to the defenders, but owed no duty to the pursuer. Further, the defenders' case of privilege was founded solely on the Glasgow bye-laws. These bye-laws were averred not by the pursuer but by the defenders. The pursuer's record did not disclose a case of privilege. Accordingly malice ought not to go into the issue. The question should be left to be dealt with by the Judge at the trial.¹ Husband's Action.—The husband's action was relevant. A company was entitled to sue in respect of slander on its directors.² A fortiori a husband was entitled to sue in respect of a slander on his wife—the relation of husband and wife being the most intimate partnership known to the law. But the case did not rest solely on what was said of the wife. On the pursuer explaining that the lady was his wife, the defenders' manager refused to accept that explanation. Taken along with what had previously passed, that was tantamount to accusing the pursuer of having knowingly brought a notorious prostitute into the theatre, and of attempting to prevent her from being turned out by falsely asserting that she was his wife. That was plainly a slander.³ But it was not necessary for the pursuer at the present stage to shew that the words were actually used in that sense. The pursuer was entitled to an issue if the words used were capable of bearing that innuendo.⁴ The question whether the words were actually used in that sense was for the jury. The pursuer's argument did not involve the consequence that a third party in the company of the pursuer and his wife would have been entitled to sue the defenders. Such a third party would not have been in the position of being accused of having attempted to pass a notorious prostitute off as his wife. The essential element in the slander would thus have been wanting. It was clear that the slander was uttered in the course of the employment. In this matter the husband's action was in the same position as the wife's.

Wife's Action.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—This case raises in a pure form the general question whether a corporation can ever be liable for oral slander alleged to have been uttered by one of their servants in the course of his service and for their benefit. The novelty of the question consists in this, that so far as can be discovered, no concrete instance of such an action has ever been known either in England or Scotland. While this is so, it is quite settled by the Privy Council case of *Citizens Life Assurance Company, Limited, v. Brown*⁶ that the old legal theory that a corporation as such was incapable of malice is now exploded; and malice, as has been repeatedly laid down both here and in England, is of the essence of slander, whether the occasion be privileged or not. The only difference which the existence of privilege can make is that, if the occasion be not privileged, the law presumes malice from the defamatory character of the statement made; and, if it is privileged, the presumption of malice is displaced. It is further settled by the Privy Council case that, in questions where the master is sought to be made liable for written defamation by the servant, the question will depend on June 9, 1908. whether the servant was at the time of the defamation acting in the course of an employment which was authorised, and that even though the servant had no actual authority for the particular act complained of. For the Privy Council expressly approved and adopted (at p. 428) the words of Mr Justice Willes in the well-known case of Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank.¹

Finburgh v. Moss' Empires, Limited.
LdStormonth-Darling.

Now, this is the case of a very gross slander—nothing less than the charge, made in the presence of witnesses, against a young married woman of being a prostitute, and that the lady must leave the theatre at once. The pursuer says that this statement, uttered originally by the defenders' under-manager, being protested against by the lady's husband and insisted in by the under-manager, was confirmed in effect by the manager, who said,—“That is quite enough; the woman must leave at once.” It is true that within a short time the slanders were withdrawn and apologised for by the manager, but by that time the slanders had been uttered and repeated. Now, why should there be any difference in law, as respects liability of a master, between words spoken and words written by a servant? I acknowledge that the written words imply more deliberation, and inasmuch as littera scripta manet, are capable of more certainty. But that is only a question of evidence. I do not see why, as regards the question as to the servant being within the sphere of his employment, there should be any difference in principle between words spoken and words written, so long as the words proved to have been spoken are clearly slanderous in their nature. I take that to have been implied in the judgment of the Court in Agnew's case.² I admit that the Court must be satisfied that the spoken words were really slanderous, and that it may be more difficult, or even impossible, to hold that where the words were casual words, or words used rashly, or in rixa. Accordingly it must always require great caution to be exercised before an issue is allowed against an employer for words spoken by an employee. But here it is admitted by the defenders that it was the duty of their servant to exclude what is called “undesirable persons” from the theatre in the discharge of their functions both under the regulations made by the Magistrates of the city of Glasgow, and also (I should think) their duty at common law, for the maintenance of order. The pursuers undertake the onus of proving that such was their duty, and the Lord Ordinary by the issue which he has approved has allowed them an opportunity of doing so. I think his Lordship is right.

He is further of opinion that the record does not disclose a case of privilege, and therefore that malice should not be inserted in the issue. I agree that as a matter of ordinary practice malice will be inserted in the issue only where the pursuer's record discloses a case of privilege. But I am of opinion that, fairly read, the pursuer's record does disclose a case of privilege, for she refers for their terms to the bye-laws made by the Magistrates and confirmed by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire; and it is obvious that the whole case will turn on whether the admitted mistake of the theatre servants shewed such recklessness and disregard of consequences as to amount in law to malice. I accordingly think that we should vary the issue allowed by the June 9, 1908. Lord Ordinary by inserting the words "and maliciously" after the word "calumniously" in each of the issues. There is no case, as there was in Buchanan v. Magistrates of Glasgow,¹ for requiring a special averment of facts and circumstances inferring malice apart from the circumstances in which the words were used.

LORD ARDWALL.—The defenders maintain that this action should be dismissed as irrelevant in respect that the slander averred was a verbal slander, and that employers are not liable for verbal slanders uttered by those in their employment. In support of this it was pointed out that in no reported case had a master or principal been held liable in damages in respect of the verbal slander of his servant or agent, and that to hold this action relevant would be extending the law of liability for slander to an undesirable and even dangerous extent. The question is accordingly one of general importance.

In the case of the Citizens Life Assurance Company, Limited, v. Brown,² in which an assurance company was sued for damages in respect of a slander contained in a circular issued by one of their agents, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the Privy Council declined to disturb their verdict. Accordingly, that case must be taken as settling that there are circumstances in which the principal will be liable for slanders uttered by an agent or servant in the course of his employment.

Now, if this be the case with regard to written slanders, I think there is no sound reason in principle why an employer should not be liable for slander spoken by his agent or servant. But in applying the principle of liability to any particular case, the greatest care must be taken to secure that a principal is not made liable for a slander uttered by a servant or agent unless it be made perfectly clear that the slander was uttered directly in the interests of the master's business and in the course of executing such business, and that the words or some of them complained of in any particular case were not merely the outcome of heated or hasty temper on the part of the servant, or spoken with a view to gratifying his own private spite or malice. As I said in the case of Agnew v. The British Legal Life Assurance Company, Limited,³—"I take it to be a sound rule that it is the person who utters or writes the defamatory matter who is alone responsible for it, and that it is only in very special circumstances that the principal may be held responsible for the language of his agent." Accordingly in that case and in the cases of *Nicklas*⁴ and *Eprile*⁵ quoted by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, the pursuer was refused an issue. And not only must the words of the alleged slander be strictly scrutinised with the view of determining whether the expressions used were such that the principal can in fairness be held responsible for them, but it is incumbent on the pursuer in such action to set forth distinctly and specifically on record facts from which it may be inferred that the verbal slander complained of is a slander that should be held in law to be imputable to the principals so as to justify the issue that it was a slander uttered by them by or through their June 9, 1908.

servant.

I cannot doubt that the pursuer's record in the present case fulfils all the requirements I have been dealing with. They amount shortly to this, that the pursuer having gone with her husband and two friends to the defenders' theatre in Glasgow, and paid for a box, the defenders' under-manager and afterwards their manager, in the course of their employment, and in the supposed execution of their duty both to their employers and to the public of keeping the theatre free from bad characters, insisted on the pursuer leaving the theatre, on the ground, as they then stated, that the pursuer was a notorious prostitute, and had been thrown out of the theatre two weeks before for being drunk and disorderly. This, of course, arose entirely from a mistake, but two things are undoubted, first, that a very gross slander was uttered, and second, that it was uttered in the course of the slanderers' employment by the defenders, and in pursuance of the duty which they had to perform, and in the performance of which they must be held in law to have been acting with the authority and for the benefit of the defenders. I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to an issue.

Finburgh v.
Moss'

Lord Ardwall.

The next question is whether, on the pursuer's record, a case of privilege is disclosed requiring that the pursuer take an issue of malice. I am of opinion that such a case is disclosed. The place where the slander was uttered was a theatre, and under the Act 6 and 7 Victoria, chapter 68, it is provided that it shall not be lawful for any person to have a theatre without procuring a licence from the Lord Chamberlain or the Justices of the Peace, and there are careful provisions for the proper conduct of the theatre. Among others the Justices of the Peace of a district in which a theatre is opened are directed to make suitable rules for ensuring order and decency at the several theatres licensed by them within their jurisdiction, and by the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, sections 395 and 396, additional provisions are made for theatres within burgh, and by section 399 the magistrates are empowered to make bye-laws for the suppression of riots and disorderly conduct in theatres, and similar provisions are inserted in the Glasgow Police Act. Now, these two first Acts are public Acts, while with regard to the Glasgow Police Act, which is referred to in answer 3 of the defenders' statement of facts, that also is an Act of which the Court has judicial knowledge, and in common with the other Acts it provides for the enactment of bye-laws for the decent and orderly conduct of theatres and places of public entertainment. I am therefore of opinion that when it is set forth on record by the pursuer that the incident on record happened in the Empire Theatre of Varieties in Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, and that the expulsion of the pursuer and the giving of the reason for it which constitutes the slander, were the acts of those concerned with the management of the theatre, and were ostensibly and ex facie done and uttered for the purpose of preserving decency and order in the theatre, I think that a complete case of privilege is disclosed, and that the words complained of, however slanderous, were uttered by those who had a right and a duty to utter these words, supposing them to have been true. Not having been true, of course it exposes those who uttered them or their principals to an

June 9, 1908. action for slander, but that does not make the occasion less a privileged occasion, and therefore I am of opinion that the pursuer must take an issue of malice.

Finburgh v.
Moss'
Empires,
Limited.

Lord Ardwall.

The only other question is whether the pursuer is entitled on the record to an issue of malice, and without going into the details of her statements I may say that my opinion is that there are averments charging the defenders' servants with recklessness sufficient, if proved, to entitle a jury to infer malice, and that because it is a rule of law that where statements are made recklessly, without sufficient inquiry, and without ordinary and reasonable regard to the character of others, such words may be held to have been uttered maliciously.

Husband's Action.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The slander here complained of arises out of the same incident as forms the subject of the action at the instance of the pursuer's wife. So far as the pursuer's averments affect the wife, I do not doubt that the words used were calculated to aggravate the slander against her, and that the mere fact that these words are said to have been addressed to her husband instead of to herself, does not mend matters.

But the pursuer does not innuendo the words as affecting the lady. He complains on his own behalf that what was meant was to accuse him of associating with a prostitute, and that he was guilty of deliberate falsehood by attempting to pass her off as his wife. The Lord Ordinary has held that this entitles him to seek damages, and to seek them from the defenders for the imputation on his own character.

I cannot agree with his Lordship's conclusion. I doubt if the words are a slander at all against the husband; at all events they affected him merely obliquely (so to speak), and the obvious intention of the speaker was incidental to the charge against the wife. But I think more decidedly that the pursuer is not entitled to sue the master in respect of it. It is nowhere admitted by the defenders, as it is in the wife's action, that it was any part of the duty of the servants of the defenders to turn out of the theatre men who were in the company of prostitutes or men who were guilty of deliberate falsehood, and all the averments of the pursuer with regard to the duty of the servants have reference to the lady alone. I think the innuendo is too far-fetched to be reasonably admissible. I am therefore in favour of disallowing the husband's issue and dismissing the action.

LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL.—I also am of opinion that the issue in this case should be disallowed.

The averments of the pursuer, though they mix up the accusation made against his wife with the alleged accusation made against him on the part of the defenders' servants, really resolve, when analysed, into two separate and distinct complaints. The one is that his wife was falsely and calumniously described as a woman of bad character. The other is that when he attempted to shield her by saying that she was his wife, he was told in so many words that that was a lie. I can find nothing else in the case, and the joining together of the two things cannot make the pursuer's case better June 9, 1908.

or worse.

Accordingly, the first question comes to be whether the pursuer is entitled to maintain this action in respect of the slander against his wife. Now, it is said, that by calling his wife a prostitute the defenders' servants impliedly accused him of being an associate of prostitutes. I do not think that this presents a relevant case of slander. The fact that a woman has erroneously been called a prostitute, or that a man has been called a swindler or a thief, will not entitle the relatives or friends of such a person, however near or intimate, to raise actions for slander because forsooth the accusation made against their relative or friend implies that they are the relatives or friends of a person of bad character. In my opinion a person who has uttered a slander is, as a general rule, only liable for the direct damage caused thereby to the person of and concerning whom the slander has been written or uttered, and any damage that may have been caused to other persons through the utterance of such slander is too remote and consequential to infer liability against the alleged slanderer.

Coming to the next alleged slander, I think the pursuer's averments are equally irrelevant. It is not slanderous to say that a person is telling a lie, and it has even been held that to call a person a liar where that expression simply means that he has told a lie does not constitute slander.

I am therefore of opinion that the issue ought to be disallowed, and the action dismissed as irrelevant.

ANDREW CARMICHAEL (Judicial Factor of the Greenock Harbour Trust), Defender (Reclaimer).—Clyde, K.C.—Horne.

Judicial Factor—Powers of Factor—Power to Levy Rates—Greenock Harbour Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. clxx.), sec. 70.—The Port and Harbour of Greenock is under the management of a body of trustees appointed under statutory authority.

The Greenock Harbour Act, 1888, created two classes of Debenture Stocks, "A" and "B," which were declared to be respectively first and second charges on "the undertaking" of the trust.

The Greenock Harbour Act, 1895, sec. 10, enacted that on non-payment of interest, and in certain events, any holder of B Debenture Stock might apply to the Sheriff for the appointment of a judicial factor in manner provided by sec. 70 of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880.

Sec. 70 of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880, enacted that the Sheriff may, on application being made, "appoint some person to receive the whole or a competent part of the rates and duties and other revenues of the trust until all the arrears of interest or of principal, as the case may be, then due on the outstanding mortgages, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the said rates and duties and other revenues, be fully paid."

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Dundas) that a judicial factor appointed under sec. 70 of the Act of 1880 had no power at his own hand to alter the harbour rates fixed by the trustees, his only duty being to receive and to apply them.

Cotton v. Beattie, Dec. 18, 1889, 17 R. 262, followed.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

AN action was raised at the instance of the Trustees of the Port and Harbours of Greenock against Andrew Carmichael, shipowner, "judicial factor, appointed by interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of Renfrew and Bute at Greenock, of date 5th August 1905, to receive the whole or a competent part of the rates and duties and other revenues of the Greenock Harbour Trust, until all the arrears of interest or of principal, as the case may be, due to the holders of Greenock Harbour B Debenture Stock, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the said rates and duties and other revenues, be fully paid, as such judicial factor, and also as an individual."

The action concluded for declarator "that the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, has no power to raise or reduce, or in any way vary the rates and duties fixed by the pursuers for goods shipped or unshipped at any of the works of the pursuers, and in particular, but without prejudice to the foregoing generality, that the defender, as judicial factor foressaid, has no power to raise the rate for sugar shipped into or unshipped from vessels (foreign) at the works of the pursuers from 10d. per ton, being the rate fixed by the pursuers, to 1s. 3d. per ton; and further, that the notice issued by the defender, of which he gave intimation to the pursuers on 29th November 1907, and which notice is in the following terms:—'Greenock Harbour Acts, 1866 to 1895. Notice is hereby given that on and after 1st January 1908 there will be levied, demanded, and taken for sugar shipped into or unshipped from vessels foreign, 1s. 3d. per ton, as provided in Schedule' A 'of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880. Andrew Carmichael, judicial factor,'—is ultra vires of the defender, as judicial factor foressaid, and is illegal, and ought not to receive effect, and that the defender, as judicial factor foressaid, is not entitled to levy, demand, or take rates, duties, or charges in terms of said notice."

There was a corresponding conclusion for interdict which was not insisted on.

The circumstances out of which the action arose were not in dispute, and were as follows:—

The Harbours of Greenock were originally constructed under the authority of a series of Acts of Parliament ending in the year 1817. Thereafter by various local Acts,¹ power was given to the Harbour Trustees to borrow certain sums, and in security therefor to assign "the rates, duties, and other revenues of the Trust, and the works and property of the Trust, payable or belonging to the Trust, and all their right, title, and interest of, in, and to the same." Up till 1888 the Trustees, acting in virtue of their borrowing powers, had borrowed from the public the sum of about £1,500,000, in security of which assignations in the terms above stated were duly given.

In 1888 the revenue of the Trust became insufficient to pay the whole of the interest on the harbour securities, and the Trust having in consequence become insolvent, questions arose between the various secured creditors who had lent money to the Trustees, from time to time. A special case was thereupon brought in the Court of Session for the purpose of determining the rights and priorities of holders of said harbour securities. The decision of the Court² was that certain lenders to the amount of £429,523 had a prior security, and that the other lenders to the amount of £1,103,837 were postponed to the foressaid security holders. As a result of the said decision, and upon a preamble referring to it, the Greenock Harbour Act of 1888³ was passed, by which in lieu of the then existing harbour securities there were created and issued A and B Debenture Stocks, which were declared to be respectively first and second charges "on the undertaking" of the said Trust.⁴

By the Greenock Harbour Act, 1888, it was enacted as follows:—

¹ Greenock Harbour Acts, 1842 (5 Vict. sess. 2, cap. liv.); 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. clvi.); 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. lxxi.); 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. clxx.).

Section 21. "It shall not be competent for the holders of the Harbour Stocks to apply for the appointment of a judicial factor except as provided in the next following section of this Act."

Section 22 of the Act of 1888 was repealed by the Greenock Harbour Act, 1895,¹ which, by section 10 substituted the following enactment in lieu thereof:—"In the event of the Trustees failing at any time to make payment of the interest due at the expiry of any half year, it shall be lawful for any holder of A Debenture Stock, and after the expiration of a period of ten years from the passing of this Act for any holder of B Debenture Stock to apply to the Sheriff for the appointment of a judicial factor in manner provided by section 70 of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880."

By section 69 of the Greenock Harbour Act of 1880, it was enacted as follows:—"The mortgagees of the Trustees may enforce payment of arrears of interest or principal or principal and interest due on their mortgages by the appointment of a judicial factor."

By section 70 of the Act of 1880 it was enacted as follows:—"Every application for a judicial factor under the provisions of this Act shall be made to the Sheriff, and on any such application the Sheriff may, by order in writing, after hearing the parties, appoint some person to receive the whole or a competent part of the rates and duties and other revenues of the Trust until all the arrears of interest or of principal, as the case may be, then due on the outstanding mortgages, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the said rates and duties and other revenues, be fully paid. Upon such appointment being made all such rates and duties and other revenues shall be paid to and received by the person so appointed, and the money so received shall be so much money received by or to the use of the mortgagees, and so soon as the full amount of any interest or principal in arrear and costs has been so received the power of such judicial factor shall cease; Provided always that such judicial factor shall distribute among all the mortgagees to whom interest or principal shall be in arrear the rates and duties and other moneys which shall come into his hands, having respect in such distribution to the priorities, if any, of such mortgagees."

The interest payable by the trustees to the holders of the B Debenture Stock having fallen into arrear, certain of the holders of that stock on 7th July 1905 presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Greenock, craving for the appointment of a judicial factor.

On 5th August 1905 the Sheriff-substitute (Neish) appointed a judicial factor by an interlocutor in these terms:—"Appoints Mr Andrew Carmichael, shipowner, Greenock, as judicial factor, he finding caution before extract in common form, to receive the whole or a competent part of the rates and duties and other revenues of the Greenock Harbour Trust until all the arrears of interest or of principal, as the case may be, due to the petitioners and other holders of Greenock Harbour B Debenture Stock, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the said rates and duties and other revenues, be fully paid."

By section 5 of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1866, incorporating section 30 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847,² the Trustees were empowered "to vary the rates or any of them respectively in such manner as they think expedient," subject to the maximum allowed by the special Act. By section 34 and Schedule A of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880, the maximum rate authorised for sugar shipped into or transhipped from vessels (foreign) was fixed at 1s. 3d. per ton. Under the powers thus conferred on them, the Trustees had, prior to this action, fixed the rate exigible for sugar shipped and unshipped from vessels (foreign) at 10d. per ton.

On 29th November 1907 the judicial factor sent to the Trustees and caused to be advertised in the newspapers, a notice in the following terms:—

“Greenock Harbour Acts, 1866 to 1895.

“Notice is hereby given that on and after 1st January 1908 there will be levied, demanded, and taken for sugar shipped into or unshipped from vessels foreign, 1s. 3d. per ton, as provided in Schedule A of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880.

AND, CARMICHAEL,

“Judicial Factor.”

Thereupon the Trustees raised this action, to have it declared, as above stated, that the judicial factor had no power to vary the rates, and that the notice in question was ultra vires.

The pursuers averred:—“The defender has no power, in virtue of his appointment as judicial factor or of the statutes thereanent, to increase, reduce, or vary in any way the rates fixed by the pursuers for goods shipped or unshipped at the Port and Harbours of Greenock, and the said notice intimated and published by the defender, whereby he purports to increase the existing rate of 10d. per ton for sugar (foreign) to the maximum rate of 1s. 3d. per ton is altogether ultra vires of the defender and illegal. The power of increasing, reducing, and varying within the statutory maximum the rates to be levied on goods shipped and unshipped at the Port and Harbours of Greenock has been committed by the Greenock Harbour Acts to the pursuers, and to them alone, and the defender's action in endeavouring to raise the said rate on sugar (foreign) at his own hand, and without the pursuers' sanction, constitutes an unwarranted interference with, and usurpation of, the pursuers' province.”

The defender averred:—“The defender since his appointment has exercised the functions formerly exercised by the Trustees in connection with the receiving of the rates, duties, and revenues of the Trust. It is the duty of the defender, as judicial factor, to levy, demand, and take the whole or a competent part of the rates, duties, and other revenues of the Trust. There is, apart from arrears, an annual deficiency of more than £20,000 in the revenue required to pay the interest due to the bondholders of the Trust, and the defender is bound in the exercise of his duty to obtain the highest revenue obtainable out of the rates which can competently be levied. The rate of 1s. 3d. per ton which he proposes to put upon sugar shipped into or unshipped from vessels (foreign) is the rate authorised by the Greenock Harbour Acts. The defender is consequently entitled to levy that rate, and the Trustees are not entitled to interfere with him in so doing, as they would thereby deprive the bondholders of a material part of their security. The defender has sought, so far as consistent with his duty, to co-operate with the pursuers, and he has induced them to take action which has resulted in considerable reductions in expenditure, and he is of opinion that an increased revenue can be obtained from the undertaking if advantage is taken of the rates authorised by the Act of Parliament. . . . The defender being appointed upon the petition of the bondholders, and for the purpose of obtaining payment to them of their just debt, has the duty imposed upon him of obtaining the largest possible revenue from the harbour. The rate which he now proposes to levy on sugar will be a source of increased revenue to the Trust, and it is his duty and his right to secure the benefit of this revenue on behalf of the creditors of the Trust."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender having no power under the terms of his appointment as judicial factor foresaid, or of the statutes thereanent, to increase, reduce, or in any way vary at his own hand the rates and duties leviable on goods shipped and unshipped at the port and harbours of Greenock, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having no right or interest in the revenues of said trust they are not entitled to sue the present action. (4) The defender having been appointed judicial factor on the undertaking of the trust, and to receive on behalf of the bondholders the rates and duties of said trust, he is entitled to impose the full rates authorised by Act of Parliament.

On 20th February 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law stated by the pursuers: Finds, declares, and decerns that the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, has no power at his own hand to raise or reduce, or in any way vary the rates and duties fixed by the pursuers for goods shipped or unshipped at any of the works of the pursuers, and in particular, but without prejudice to the foregoing generality, that the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, has no power at his own hand to raise the rate for sugar shipped into or unshipped from vessels (foreign) at the works of the pursuers from 10d. per ton, being the rate fixed by the pursuers, to 1s. 3d. per ton; and further, that the notice issued by the defender, of which he gave intimation to the pursuers on 29th November 1907 . . . is ultra vires of the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, is illegal, and ought not to receive effect, and that the defender, as judicial factor foresaid, is not entitled to levy, demand, or take rates, duties, or charges in terms of said notice." *

* "OPINION.—(After a narrative of the facts)—At the discussion in the Procedure-roll, the pursuers' counsel maintained that the defender has no right or power, express or implied, to raise or vary this particular rate, or any other of the harbour rates. They urged that we are here dealing with a great public undertaking, incapable of earning profit, and worked for the benefit of the public, to the statutory trustees of which—and to no one else—Parliament has committed the entire management and control of the concern, including expressly power 'to vary the rates . . . in such manner as they think expedient' (Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. cap. 27), sec. 30, incorporated in the special Acts); that the constitution of the Trust has been gradually broadened by a series of legislative enactments so as to fairly represent all the public interests associated with the undertaking; and that there is no warrant for permitting the defender, representing as he does one private and limited interest only, to supersede the Trustees to any extent in their management of the concern or to interfere with their discretion as to raising or lowering rates. They further argued that, whatever may have been the nature and extent of the security held by creditors of the Trust under the earlier statutes, holders of debenture stock under the Act of 1888 are merely perpetual annuitants, with no right at all to look to the security of the rates, except in so far as actually imposed by the Trustees from time to time.

"To a considerable part of this argument the defender's counsel took no

Argued for the reclaimer;—In order to understand the position and powers of the judicial factor, it was necessary to go behind section 70 of the Act of 1880, which merely provided the manner in which the factor was to be appointed, and to look at the nature of the B Debentures, and the rights of the debenture-holders. By the Act of 1888 these debentures were declared to be a charge upon “the undertaking,” the form of the charge being that of a perpetual irredeemable annuity. The sole purposes to which the revenues of the Trust could be applied were (1) payment of annuities, (2) maintenance of works, and (3) payment of working expenses,¹ and the term “undertaking” must be held to include not merely the rates actually levied, but also the power to levy the rates. Under the earlier Act² the assign-exception; and they especially disclaimed any intention or desire on his part to oust the pursuers from their management. They conceded also that, under normal circumstances, it would be for the Trustees, and for them only, to regulate the harbour rates; but they contended that the circumstances here are obviously abnormal, because it had been found necessary to appoint a judicial factor. There is, they urged, no room for doubt as to the object of such an appointment; it is ‘to enforce payment of arrears’; and, in order to this end, ‘the whole or a competent part’ (i.e., a part sufficient for the purpose) ‘of the rates, duties, and other revenues of the trust’ are to be ‘paid to and received by’ the factor; and when the end and object have been attained, and the arrears, &c. have been fully paid up (and only then), his ‘power’ (an effective power successfully wielded) ‘shall cease.’ The defender’s counsel strenuously maintained that, if the pursuers’ arguments were sound, the factor’s appointment could be no better than a farce; because, being appointed at a crisis when the financial position is, from the debenture-holders’ point of view, a very bad one, he is ex hypothesi to have no power to alleviate it by raising rates—on the contrary, the sole discretion as to maintaining, or even lowering, the rates is (if the pursuers are right) left with the Trustees, whose interests are adverse to those of the stockholders; and that the result must simply be that an already embarrassed situation would be burdened with the additional cost of a totally useless factory. This, it was urged, could scarcely have been the intention of Parliament; and the Court should, in construing the language of the statutes, endeavour to avoid such a result, especially where the opposite construction does no violence whatever to the words used. The defender’s counsel contended that when Parliament provides—as the means of enforcing a specific purpose—the appointment of a judicial factor, the latter is by plain implication vested (even if such vesting is not expressed in so many words) with such powers, means, and privileges as are necessary for the execution of the duty or the attainment of the object which he was appointed to execute or to effect. In support of the last proposition I was referred to text writers on the construction of statutes—Maxwell, 4th ed., 1905, pp. 534, 536; and Hardcastle, 4th ed., by Craies, p. 108 and p. 229. I think the proposition is sound enough; and it seems to be based upon the doctrine of the Roman law (Dig. ii. 1, 2)—‘Cui jurisdictio data est, ea quoque concessa esse videntur, sine quibus jurisdictio explicari non potuit.’ The defender’s counsel further argued that the words ‘the whole or a competent part of the rates,’ &c. are not limited to the rates actually levied by the Trustees at any given time; that the statute does not say so; and that the words, fairly construed, nation in favour of the lenders—now represented by the debenture-holders—was of the widest description, and included all “right, title, and interest” which the Trustees had in the harbour. On the nature of a rate, reference was made to the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Act, 1847,¹ sections 25, 30, 33, and 47. It was not an unheard of thing to give the creditors of an undertaking—such as a municipality—power to force the governing body to levy rates in order to pay their debts.² Unless the debenture-holders had this power their security was illusory, for there was nothing to prevent the Trustees from fixing the rates merely in the interest of the ratepayers and those using the docks, and not with a view to the legitimate object for which alone a revenue was required, namely, the payment of these annuities. These being the rights of the debenture-holders, Parliament had, by section 10 of the Act of 1895, provided the means by which they could be made effective, namely, by the appointment of a must include the whole rates (up to the maxima) which the Trustees are by their acts authorised to ‘levy, demand, and take.’ The holders of debenture stock, although their position since 1888 was that of perpetual annuitants, are, it was argued, entitled to look to the security of the whole rates authorised by the statute, because their stocks were declared to be respectively ‘the first’ and ‘the second charge on the undertaking’; and the defender’s counsel referred, in this connection, to letters in process which are printed in the appendix.

“I was much impressed at the discussion by the arguments put forward for the defender, which I have endeavoured to summarise, and by the broad common sense which appeared to underlie them. If it could be demonstrated that to deny the judicial factor power to raise rates would be to reduce his office to a nonentity and his functions to mere formalities, one would, I think, be constrained to the conclusion that Parliament, in prescribing the appointment of a factor for the particular object specified, intended to confer, and must be held to have conferred upon him, the power which, on the assumption postulated, would be essential to the explanation of his jurisdiction. But I am not convinced that this assumption, which lies at the root of the defender’s argument, is well founded; and if it fails, I do not think I could construe the statutes as giving the factor implied authority at his own hand to raise or vary this, or any other rate, or to issue such a notice as that quoted in the summons. Now, it seems to me that, apart from so raising rates, there is a good deal that the factor could do towards furthering the object of his appointment. This must, of course, depend upon what the scope of his powers and duties truly is. I was not able to extract from learned counsel upon either side any precise view upon this (to my mind) crucial matter. I have come to the conclusion, upon a careful study of the statutes, that the right of the judicial factor is to receive, if necessary, the whole (i.e., gross) revenues of the undertaking, and to apply them in his discretion towards the extinction of the arrears of interest in the stock. To what extent he may consider it prudent or advisable to exercise his right is another matter; but, if the view which I have indicated is sound, it can hardly be said that the power of the factor, though he may not be able to raise rates at his own hand, is necessarily an unreal or ineffectual one. On the contrary, he would have in his hand a powerful lever. A case to which I was referred at the discussion (Cotton v. Beattie, 1889, 17 R. 262), though it does not touch upon the factor’s power to raise or vary rates, seems to me to support the view which I have judicial factor. Leaving out the reference to section 70 of the Act of June 11, 1908. 1880, which merely dealt with the mode of his appointment, section 10 provided simpliciter for the appointment of a judicial factor, i.e., ^{Greenock Harbour Trustees v. Judicial Factor of Greenock Harbour Trust.} a judicial factor with common law powers of management and interference. This was made more evident by the use of the word "enforce" in section 27 of the Act of 1872, repeated in section 69 of the Act of 1880. Even if the powers of the factor fell to be construed with reference to section 70 of the Act of 1880, the claimer's argument held good. "The whole rates" meant the whole rates chargeable, not the whole rates charged, and "a competent part" meant the total amount, subject to the statutory maximum, required to pay the debts. None of the authorities referred to by the Lord Ordinary were in point, and, in particular, *Cotton v. Beattie*¹ was distinguishable. That case decided that, in the circumstances, the factor had no powers of management, whereas in the present case the just stated. It related to a judicial factor appointed under sections 56 and 57 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 17), the language of which does not appear to differ in any material respect from that under construction in the present case. The Lord President (Ingليس) stated in general terms (p. 268) that 'the duty of the factor so appointed is to procure payment to himself as factor of so much of the tolls and other sums coming into the hands of the company as will enable him to pay the balance of interest due to the mortgagee. . . . Lord M'Laren went pretty fully into the matter, and expressed the opinion (at p. 271) that the factor—though his duties are those not of a manager but of a 'receiver'—'is entitled to go directly to the cashier or officers of the company who levy the tolls, and to receive from them these tolls or other sums of money, and that he is not obliged to go to the directors and take from them what they may please to give him. If he had to go to the directors, the mortgagee might not be in a better position than he was before the application, because they would just say after the appointment, as they had done before, that they were without funds, that all their funds were carried away as fast as they were earned by the necessary outgoings of the company. But, being a judicial factor on the estate, he has direct access to the funds of the company, and it is for the purpose of his having such access that the appointment is made, to enable the mortgagee to enter into possession of the revenues of the company to such extent as shall enable him to pay himself through the factor the interest of his debt.' A little further on, Lord M'Laren explained how, in his view, the relations between the judicial factor and the managing body would work out from a practical point of view, and concluded that 'the judicial factor would decide for himself what portion of the tolls or earnings he would draw, and what he would choose to leave for the purpose of enabling the business to be carried on.' Of course, the concern under consideration in Cotton's case was only a tramway company, and not (as here) a great public undertaking. But the opinions expressed have regard to the construction and effect of statutory language substantially identical with that which I am now endeavouring to construe; and to that extent, at least, they seem to me to be in point.

"I ought, at this stage, for the sake of completeness, to note the other cases, Scottish and English, to which I was referred, with such brief comments on them as are necessary. Haldane's case (1881, 8 R. 669) was one where a judicial factor had been appointed on the undertaking of a railway company under section 4 of the Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126). The Lord President (Ingليس) in the course of question was as to the amount of the rates which he was entitled to receive. No doubt the claimer's contention involved a certain power of interference on the part of the factor, but some interference was involved in any view, and the only question was one of degree.

Argued for the respondents;—In considering the rights of the B debenture-holders, it was irrelevant to refer to the earlier Acts and to the powers of security-holders under them. These Acts were all replaced by the Act of 1888, by which alone the position of the debenture-holders was regulated. That Act said nothing as to an "assignment," and neither the debenture-holders nor the judicial factor as in their right were in any sense "assignees." The powers of the judicial factor were contained in section 70 of the Act of 1880, which defined him as a person appointed to "receive" the rates. This plainly excluded any power of management, or any power to determine the amount of the rates which should be levied. There his opinion pointed out that a judicial factor so appointed is really a manager, invested with the charge and management of the undertaking; and dealt—but only incidentally and by way of contrast—with the position of a judicial factor appointed under sections 56 and 57 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. The judicial factor in that case petitioned the Court for special powers, but the Court refused to grant these, upon the ground that the judicial factor was truly manager of the railway company, and that it was therefore unnecessary to confer any additional powers upon him. The Edinburgh Northern Tramways Company (1888, 15 R. 641) was concerned with the appointment of Mr Cotton as judicial factor on the tramway undertaking already referred to, under the sections of the Act of 1845. The Lord President (Inglis) contrasted his position with that of Mr Haldane in the preceding case, and said: 'He is what is called in England a receiver, and, so far as I understand, he was appointed to receive a portion of the income of the company sufficient to pay the overdue interest upon the petitioner's mortgages. That is the whole object and aim of the appointment.' I have already dealt with Cotton's case (1889, 17 R. 262), which was the sequel of the case just referred to, and seems to me to be much the most useful of the decisions, Scottish or English, of which I am aware. Coming now to the English cases, I think they require to be approached with considerable caution and reserve by a Scots lawyer. The name 'judicial factor' is unknown in England. They have there 'managers' and 'receivers.' I gather that the latter word is capable of a great variety of significations and applications. I understand that the English Court of Chancery originally had, and since 1873 the High Court of Justice has possessed, power to appoint a receiver wherever the circumstances appeared to the Court to make it expedient to do so. One may refer to Kerr's Law and Practice as to Receivers (5th ed. 1905), as illustrative of the different duties and functions which a receiver may in England be appointed to exercise. I have not, I confess, been able to derive much assistance from the authorities which were cited to me. These were Gardner (1867, L. R., 2 Chan. 201), the well-known case which immediately preceded, and indeed was the cause of, the railway legislation of that year; Marshall, [1895] 2 Ch. 36,—a tramway case, where a receiver was appointed at the instance of debenture-holders, but the appointment of a manager was refused; In re Manchester and Milford Railway Company, 1880, 14 Ch. Div. 645,—a case under the English Railway Act of 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 127), where the import of the words 'the appointment of a receiver or, if necessary, of a manager' was discussed, and explained by the Court of Appeal; Altree, 1878, 9 Ch. Div. 337,—referred to only for some observations by James, L. J. (at pp. 348, 350), on the

could be no rate at all until it was levied. When Parliament intended to appoint a factor with powers of management they said so in express terms,¹ and in the present case they had not done so. This became more clear by considering the position of the Trustees. They were a statutory body, representative of all the interests concerned—including the debenture-holders—and entrusted with the duties of management.² One of their most important duties was that of fixing and levying the rates, and it was not to be lightly presumed that this function was intended to be taken from them and given to the judicial factor. The position of a person appointed to receive and distribute revenue had been considered in many cases in England.³ It had also been considered in the case of Acts providing for the appointment of a judicial factor in terms almost identical with sections 69 and 70 of the Greenock Harbour Act, 1880. Thus the powers of a factor under sections 56 and 57 of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) functions of a receiver; and Ames v. Trustees of the Birkenhead Docks, 1855, 20 Beav. 332,—for similar observations by Sir J. Romilly, M. R.

“ I have considered the case before me to the best of my ability, with the aid of the opinions expressed in Cotton v. Beattie. As already indicated, I do not think it can be affirmed that power to raise rates is essential to the judicial factor, in order to any effectual exercise of his office. It is not for me to consider whether or not it would have been better that Parliament should have conferred such a power upon him. If such a power is not essential to him, in order to give his office any real significance, it seems to me that the defender's argument loses much of its apparent weight; for, although the possession of a power to raise rates would doubtless enhance the factor's powers, that is not per se a warrant for construing the statutes as impliedly conferring it upon him. I cannot assume that the Trustees will act obstinately or unreasonably in their management, or decline absolutely to co-operate with the judicial factor in endeavouring to further the legitimate interests of all concerned. On the other hand, I apprehend that no prudent and reasonable factor would, in the interests of his constituents, seek to reduce the working expenses of the harbour below the minimum at which the docks (his only possible source of revenue) can be efficiently carried on. But down to that limit he can, if the views I have expressed are correct, exercise a vigilant and effective control over expenditure; as indeed I gather from his pleadings he has to some extent already done. It seems to me that much must depend upon the extent to which the judicial factor and the Trustees, as practical men of business, are prepared to set themselves to co-operate in doing the best for all concerned; the factor having, of course, due regard to the legitimate interests of the stockholders, and the Trustees to those of the harbour. I do not prejudge the question whether, under any circumstances, the Court, on competent application by a factor in the defender's position, and on being satisfied that those charged by Parliament with the management of the undertaking were acting unreasonably in refusing to raise a rate or rates, might not find a remedy by granting the factor special power to do so. All that I now

Judicial Factor of

Harbour
Trust.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question that is here raised is an important and, in one sense, a novel one, and arises between the Greenock Harbour Trustees and the judicial factor who has been appointed in terms of a statute which I shall presently examine. The question as raised is a simple one, namely, whether the factor can at his own hand and against the wish of the majority of the Trustees alter the rate which is presently charged for sugar entering the Port and Harbour of Greenock, it being of course understood that the rate as altered is within the limits of the Parliamentary powers—of the rates as appended to the Acts.

Now, the judicial factor was appointed upon the petition of certain debenture-holders. The history of the Greenock Harbour was this: After being a harbour which, I suppose, existed in a certain state from time immemorial, it was managed by the Town-Council, and then there was a series of statutes which I need not go through. But the crisis of its fate in latter years came just prior to the year 1888 when it could not pay its way. At that time there were various classes of security-holders. I do not particularise more because it does not matter for the purposes of this case; and these security-holders had had their various rights, so far as priority was concerned, determined in an action in this Court. They were, however, in this unfortunate position that, although their rights of priority had been determined, they were practically powerless as to making their securities available, because the harbour could not be sold, and there was, to say the least of it, not much to take in the way of moveable property. At anyrate, all parties concerned came to Parliament and they got an Act of Parliament called the Greenock Harbour Act of 1888. Now, by that Act of Parliament which as regards the pecuniary obligations of the harbour sweeps away all that went before it, two classes of stock were created, namely, A Debenture Stock and B Debenture Stock. A Debenture Stock, roughly speaking, was intended to represent the liabilities which had been declared to be preferable liabilities by the action to which I have referred; and, accordingly, this debenture stock was to be offered to the parties in right of these preferable mortgages. If they accepted, well and good; if not, they were to be paid decide is that, in my opinion, the judicial factor was not entitled, at his own hand, to raise the rate, or to issue the notice, of which the pursuers now complain. Decree of declarator must therefore be pronounced; but I think the words 'at his own hand,' which occur in the pursuers' first plea in law, though not in the summons, should be inserted at appropriate places in the interlocutor, in view of possible eventualities in the future."

in cash. The B Stock, on the other hand, was to be given to those who had securities in whose favour a preference had not been declared, and they were to be compulsorily made to take the B Stock, for the very good reason that there was no money forthcoming and they had better take that than nothing.

The point, I think, which ought to be noted is that whatever may have been the position of the parties historically and whatever may have been their rights in the old time, once the Act of 1888 was passed and the A and B Stock was issued and allotted to the various persons entitled to it, those persons, although in the popular sense of the word you might have called them creditors, were really not creditors at all. They, no doubt, had lent money, but their money did not represent the whole of the undertaking, there was other money there; and they became, as a matter of fact, only shareholders in the undertaking. Now, as a shareholder, of course, at common law you have not any right of diligence against your own company merely because you do not get any dividend upon your shares, or, if you like to put it so, because you do not get any interest for the money which you originally lent and which is now represented by your shares. But, of course, you have other rights and, if you have got nothing and you think that the management might give you something, one right in certain circumstances might conceivably be to get a factor appointed upon the whole property. But this Act of Parliament specially says that that right is not to exist, because in the 21st section, after preventing bondholders from raising actions under certain conditions, it goes on to say,—“Nor shall it be competent for the holders of the Harbour Stocks” (the Harbour Stocks are the A and B Debenture Stocks I have mentioned) “to apply for the appointment of a judicial factor except as provided in the next following section of this Act.” That seems to me a clear provision—with the policy of it I have, of course, nothing to do—but that seems to me to be a clear provision by Parliament, that what I may call the common law rights of these stockholders were gone, and all that they could get is what the next succeeding section of the Act gives them. Accordingly section 22 of the 1888 Act seems to me to be the charter of the bondholders, and that section says this,—“In the event of the Trustees failing at any time to make payment of the interest due at the expiry of any half year, it shall be lawful for any holder of A Debenture Stock, and after the expiration of a period of seven years from the passing of this Act for any holder of B Debenture Stock to apply to the Sheriff for the appointment of a judicial factor in manner provided by section 70 of the Greenock Harbour Act of 1880.” That period of seven years was afterwards extended to ten years by the Greenock Harbour Act, 1895, but the extended period has admittedly now run out, and admittedly the holders of B Debenture Stock, after the expiry of that period, found themselves in the position that they had not got payment of the interest due at the end of the half year, and therefore they were entitled without any question to do what they did—namely, to make an application for a factor in the manner provided by section 70 of the Act of 1880. Well, that of course sends us back to the Act of 1880, and section 70 of that Act says this,—“Every application for a judicial factor under the provisions of this Act shall be made to the Sheriff, and, on any such application, the Sheriff

It therefore comes to the simple question, What is the position of a judicial factor appointed under section 70? He is a person appointed, and he is to receive the whole or a competent part of the rates and duties and other revenues of the Trust. I think that that question is already determined by authority. This clause—I mean that part of it—is a clause which is not at all new. It is really almost word for word the same as section 57 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845.¹ We were furnished by the parties with an excerpt in parallel columns of section 57 of the Companies Clauses Act of 1845,¹ section 87 of the Commissioners Clauses Act of 1847,² section 26 of the Companies Clauses Act of 1863,³ and this particular section 70, and when reviewed it is not too much to say that they are practically identical. They are, in my mind, so identical that it makes authority upon the one authority upon the other.

Now, these clauses in the other Acts have already been subjected to judicial decision in both countries. In this country that clause was narrowly considered in the case of Cotton v. Beattie,⁴ and in England the clause was considered in the case of Attree,⁵ and there was a comment there upon the still older and well-known case of Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company.⁶ The outcome of these decisions was that a person appointed under one of these clauses was not—to use the English phrase—"a manager of the undertaking," or—to use the Scotch phrase—was not "a common law judicial factor," but that he was really a mere receiver of the revenues of the undertaking which he could get, and that accordingly his powers were limited to merely putting into his pocket such money as he could get and paying it out again.

We had a very strenuous argument, and a very weighty argument, from Mr Clyde to endeavour to bring us to the opposite conclusion, but it seems to me that the weak portion of that argument was that it went really to the policy of the statute much more than to what is actually said. All that he urged upon us as to the possibilities of the security-holders being defeated may be very true, but I am afraid the answer is that those who were—I won't say risking their money—but getting what they could get at the time of the unfortunate position of 1888 ought to have taken care that Parliament gave them something more. Mr Clyde's argument really rested upon this: he acknowledged that he could not have any rights other than what the Act of 1888 gave him, but he pointed out that his debenture was to be a second charge, just as the A Debenture was to be a first charge, upon the undertaking; and he said that once his debenture was a charge as upon the undertaking, you must read the expression the factor being appointed to receive a competent part of the tolls as meaning not the tolls actually charged, but the tolls chargeable. I am afraid that same view was tabled and rejected in Cotton's case,¹ because the Lord President (Ingia) in that case recites the interlocutor upon which the appointment was made, which is in practically the same terms as the interlocutor appointing the judicial factor in this case. I remind your Lordships again that the interlocutor was made in respect of the 56th and 57th sections of the Companies Clauses Act of 1845, which, as I have said, are practically identical with this one. The interlocutor was:—"Appoint Mr Cotton to be interim judicial factor upon the undertaking and property of the company, and to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable in payment of the interest payable on the mortgages mentioned in the petition until the same, with all costs, shall be fully paid." Then his Lordship goes on,—“The criticism made upon this interlocutor is that it should have been confined to an appointment ‘to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls,’ and so forth, and that there should not have been an appointment of a judicial factor ‘upon the undertaking and property of the company’; but I am not disposed to acquiesce in that criticism at all, because I think the words used are really statutory words, and although it may be that they have led to some misunderstanding as to the proper powers of a judicial factor under that statute, the words, I think, are fully justified.” And then he goes on to decide that Mr Cotton, in that case, had no power as a manager, but only that of a receiver. In other words, it is tantamount to a decision that a factor being a factor upon the undertaking is not inconsistent with the powers of that factor being limited to the mere powers of a receiver, using the word in the narrower sense.

That seems to me practically to decide the whole thing. It is quite true that the body here who have the fixing of the tolls is not the factor, I can quite see that there may be disparity and discommunity of interest. My only answer is, that that is how Parliament has left it. I should be slow to say that there may not be some way or other of restraining the statutory body of trustees if they really acted in mala fides to the interests of those who had lent their money to the harbour. I mean, for instance, the case as put to us by way of argument—that our decision would necessarily lead to this, that the Greenock Harbour Trustees might let in the sugar practically for nothing, that is to say, let it in for just that bare amount of charge which would be sufficient to pay the going expenses of the harbour without having any heed to paying any money to the shareholders or creditors—call them what you will—at all. I think that would be a proceeding in bad faith, and, if it could be brought up to that, I think the Court might not be without powers of coercing the Trustees. But that is not the question that is raised in this case. The question that is raised in this case is very well put by the Lord Ordinary in the end of his note, where he shews that all he is deciding is that the judicial factor is not entitled, at his own hand and against the wishes of the Trustees, suddenly to change the rate leviable upon sugar or any other commodity as it comes into the harbour. I ought also to say that I am entirely satisfied with the careful note of the Lord Ordinary, who, I think, has said all that is to be said, and I should not have added the observations that I have except to

Greenock
Harbour
Trustees v.
Judicial Factor of Greenock
Harbour
Trust.

LORD M'LAREN.—If the judicial factor is entitled to raise the rates leviable at the harbour, that can only be on the theory that by his appointment the management of the Trustees is displaced, and their whole power of administration devolved upon the judicial factor; because if the judicial factor can alter the rates leviable on the landing of goods—the most important perhaps of all the powers the Trustees possess—I think it follows that every other power which the Trustees have hitherto exercised may equally be taken out of their hands. Now, it is perfectly clear that such was not the intention of the Legislature in passing this private Act of Parliament. I do not need to consider whether the Court, in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction, could have appointed a judicial factor on the undertaking in such terms as would divest the Trustees of their administrative powers. It is quite plain that by the last Greenock Harbour Act the jurisdiction of the Court of Session to appoint a judicial factor is excluded altogether, and that a much more limited power is given to the Sheriff, and only to the Sheriff. That is the power of appointing a judicial factor who is to receive the revenues of the Trust, and out of these to pay the dividends to the holders of the two classes of debenture stock. Now, the difference between the two appointments is perfectly obvious; but the appointment of a factor such as is competent in this case is really the appointment of a person who is to protect the interests of the debenture-holders. He can give them at least this protection, that he would not allow the Trustees to squander the revenue in extravagant management, or to apply the money to new works which would more properly be chargeable against capital. These two protections the debenture-holders undoubtedly have, because the whole revenue comes into the hands of the judicial factor. He, of course, cannot divide the whole of it, otherwise the harbour would come to an end; but it lies with him to assign such sum as he may judge to be necessary for the payment of salaries and wages, and then the balance is appropriated by statute to the two classes of stockholders in their order.

I should have come, without hesitation, to this conclusion upon the words of the statute, but I agree with your Lordship that our opinion is strongly confirmed by the decisions that have been given upon the analogous and almost identical clauses of various general Acts of Parliament, of which the most important is the Companies Clauses Act. It is perhaps unfortunate that the judicial factor has no veto upon the action of the Trustees in fixing the rates, and that even where he may think it perfectly clear that the rate might be raised without injury to the traffic of the harbour, he has no power to do it. I hope, however, with your Lordship that the law is not entirely powerless in giving a remedy in the case of mala fide administration were such a case to arise. I see great difficulty in holding that we could interfere with the action of the Trustees so long as they maintained the rates at the scale which was fixed in the past. On the other hand, I can hardly doubt that if the Trustees were arbitrarily to lower the rates so as to deprive the bondholders of their dividend without any corresponding advantage to the June 11, 1908.

harbour, that would be a breach of duty for which these Trustees, like all other trustees, would be accountable to this Court.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

DAVID WILLIAMSON (Ogilvy's Trustee), Respondent.—Macmillan— June 11, 1908.

Grierson v.
Ogilvy's
Trustee.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Appeal—Competency—Election of Trustee—Eligibility of Trustee—Finality of Sheriff's deliverance—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sections 68, 69, 71.—At a meeting of creditors convened for the purpose of electing a trustee on a bankrupt estate, and presided over by the Sheriff, an objection was stated to W., a candidate, in respect that he was a creditor, that his claim was founded on documents as to which questions must arise, and as to which he would have to adjudicate as trustee, and that accordingly he had an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors. The objection was considered and repelled by the Sheriff, who, after a vote was taken, declared W. elected.

In an appeal against the deliverance of the Sheriff on the ground that sec. 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, enacted that "it shall not be lawful to elect as trustee the bankrupt or any person conjunct or confident with the bankrupt, or who holds an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors," that W. had such an interest, and that therefore the Sheriff's deliverance was ultra vires, held that the objection in question was one for the consideration of the Sheriff, and that after he had considered and repelled it, his deliverance, under sec. 71 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, was final and not subject to review.

ON 22d February 1908 the estates of Thomas Ogilvy, farmer, Ler- 1st DIVISION.
wick, were sequestrated, and a meeting appointed to take place on Bill-Chamber.
20th March 1908 for the purpose of electing a trustee.

The meeting took place at Lerwick on 20th and 21st March, and was presided over by the Sheriff-substitute (Broun). The minutes of the meeting bore that Mr David Williamson, agent, North of Scotland Bank, Lerwick, and Mr J. W. Macintosh, accountant, Glasgow, were proposed for the office of trustee; that Mr J. C. Grierson, a creditor, protested against the eligibility of Mr Williamson (1) in respect that he was identified with the bankrupt's law-agent, and (2) "that he had an adverse interest in respect that his bank had a claim of over £600 against the bankrupt which was improperly vouched"; that "the Sheriff-substitute having examined the claim of the North of Scotland Bank, held that the said claim was sufficiently vouched and repelled Mr Grierson's objections on both heads"; that a vote was taken, when a majority in value of the creditors voted in favour of Mr Williamson; and that the Sheriff-substitute thereupon pro-

Grierson v.
Ogilvy's
Trustee.

Mr Grierson and Mr Macintosh presented a note of appeal against the deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute, and craved for its recall, on the ground that, Mr Williamson being ineligible for the office of trustee, the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, in declaring him elected,* and that the proceedings at the meeting of creditors were ultra vires and illegal.

In support of his contention that Mr Williamson was ineligible, the appellant stated:—"6. During the taking of the sederunt . . . Mr Grierson took personal exception to Mr Williamson acting as trustee in respect (1) that he was the nominee of and confident with the bankrupt's law-agent, and (2) that he had interests conflicting with the general interest of the creditors in respect that his own claim was founded upon documents as to which questions must arise conflicting with the interests of the general creditors, and (3) that there was a claim by the North of Scotland Bank for £643, to which he took exception to the first item of £231 that it was not properly authenticated in terms of the Bankers Books Evidence Act, and the other items were open to objection and inquiry, and Mr Williamson (agent for the bank) was not the party to do so."

Other objections were stated to the regularity of the proceedings to which it is unnecessary to refer.

On 14th April 1908 the Lord Ordinary on the bills (Ardwall) refused the appeal †

* The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), enacts:—

"68. Procedure at meeting for election of trustee.— . . . It shall not be lawful to elect as trustee the bankrupt, or any person conjunct or confident with the bankrupt, or who holds an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors, or whose residence is not within the jurisdiction of the Court of Session.

"69. Judgment of Sheriff as to trustee.—If the Sheriff be present at the election of trustee, and there be no competition for the office, or objection stated to the candidate or candidates, he shall, by a deliverance on the minutes, declare the person chosen by the creditors to be trustee, and if there be competition or objections to the candidate or candidates, such objections to the votes or candidates shall be stated at the meeting, and the Sheriff may either forthwith decide thereon, or make avizandum, and he shall, if necessary, make a short note of the objections and of the answers, on which he shall, within four days after the meeting, hear parties viva voce, and declare the person or persons trustee or trustees in succession whom he shall find to have been duly elected, and state the grounds of his decision in a note, and the same, as well as such short note, shall form part of the process.

"71. Judgment of Sheriff as to trustee final.—The judgment of the Sheriff declaring the person or persons elected to be trustee or trustees in succession, shall be given with the least possible delay; and such judgment shall be final, and in no case subject to review in any Court or in any manner whatever."

† "OPINION.—(After dealing with an objection which is not reported)—All the other objections to the Sheriff-substitute's deliverance appear to me to be irrelevant in view of the provisions of section 71 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which declares that 'the Sheriff's judgment declaring a person elected a trustee shall be final and in no case subject to review in any Court or in any manner whatever.' See also Yeaman v. Little, 8 F. 702, and cases there cited."

The appellants reclaimed.

June 11, 1908.

The case was argued before the First Division on 16th May 1908.

Grierson v.
Ogilvy's
Trustee.

Argued for the reclaimers;—Mr Williamson was a person holding an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors, in respect that he would have to adjudicate upon his own claim, regarding which inquiry would be necessary, which he was not the proper person to conduct.¹ He was accordingly a person whom it was not lawful to elect as trustee,² and in declaring such a person elected the Sheriff had not acted in the exercise of his statutory jurisdiction.³ In such a case his decision was not final, and an appeal against his deliverance was competent.⁴ Reference was also made to Miller v. Duncan,⁵ with regard to the respective duties of the creditors and the Sheriff in the election of a trustee.

Argued for the respondents;—The qualification of a candidate for the office of trustee was one of the matters expressly left by the statute for the decision of the Sheriff.⁶ In this case the Sheriff had heard the objections, had considered them—as appeared from the minutes—and had given his award. In these circumstances his decision was final.⁷ The accuracy of the minutes could not be impugned now.⁸ The purpose of the statute was to provide a speedy method of electing the trustee, and appeals would not readily be allowed.⁹

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a reclaiming note from a judgment of the Lord Ordinary officiating on the Bills, which deals with several points arising in a sequestration. But only one point was argued before your Lordships, which is not expressly dealt with by the Lord Ordinary, but which is covered by that portion of his opinion where he says,—“All other objections to the Sheriff-substitute's deliverance appear to me to be irrelevant in view of the provisions of section 71 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856.” The objection stated is that the gentleman who was declared by the Sheriff to have been elected trustee, was incapable of holding that office in respect that, as is alleged, he had an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors. That is explained to mean that he himself had a claim founded upon documents as to which questions might arise, and that his interest to sustain his own claim thus conflicted with the interests of the general creditors. The argument which was seriously pressed upon us was this: Section 68 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which is headed, “Procedure at meeting for election of Trustee,” provides for the meeting of creditors, and for the election of a trustee, and concludes,—“It shall not be lawful to Section 69 makes the Sheriff the Judge as to the person who Grierson v. Ogilvy's Trustee.

Ld. President. has been elected, and section 71 provides that the judgment of the Sheriff declaring the person elected to be trustee, "shall be final and in no case subject to review in any Court or in any manner whatever." The case for the reclaimers was presented to us, not as an appeal against a judgment of the Sheriff, but as an appeal against an ultra vires act. It being impossible under the statute to appoint a person having an adverse interest, it was competent for this Court, as the reclaimers argued, to set aside such an appointment as an act done outwith the powers of the statute, and the familiar rule was appealed to that no finality clause can prevent an ultra vires act being set aside. I have come to the conclusion that the argument is not well founded. There is no doubt as to the policy of the statute. It was to get the trustee into the saddle as quickly as possible. I need not remind your Lordships of the remarks made in the case of *Yeaman v. Little*¹ by Lord Pearson, who has had a very large experience of this class of case, and by myself, where, with reference to the case of Farguharson v. Sutherland,² it was said that it was not desirable to extend the doctrine of that case or to relax the stringent provisions of the statute as to appeals. I am confirmed in my opinion by the terms of section 69 of the Act. I consider that the objection with which we are now dealing falls within the category of "objections to the candidate," referred to in that section, with regard to which it is provided that they are to be decided on by the Sheriff. If this is so, it was not ultra vires of him to decide upon this objection, and the finality clause applies. It seems to me that you get in the sentence at the end of section 68 an example of two classes of objections. Suppose the bankrupt himself had been appointed trustee. There could be no doubt of the fact that he was the bankrupt, and if you can imagine such an extraordinary thing as the Sheriff declaring the bankrupt elected, no doubt that appointment could be set aside, not by way of reviewing the Sheriff's decision, but on the ground that the appointment was ultra vires. But when you consider the other objections stated in section 68, it is apparent that they are matters which admit of questions being raised and decided, as, for instance, whether a certain person is "conjunct and confident" with the bankrupt. The expression "conjunct and confident" is one which was used in the old Scots Acts, and there are many cases in the books dealing with its significance. I do not suppose that all the possibilities of doubt regarding it are yet exhausted, and there may still be cases where there is room for argument as to who is a "conjunct and confident" person. If such cases arose, it would be for the Sheriff to say whether the objection had been made out or not. Similarly in the present case, it is for the Sheriff to decide whether the candidate has, or has not, an adverse interest, and when he has considered and decided that, his judgment is final. In the practical working out of the statute I do not think that any harm can be done, because, even supposing the Sheriff to have decided wrongly, and that the trustee has an adverse interest, the most he could do June 11, 1908.

 would be to rank his own debt, and as to that he is not final. So that even Grierson v.
 taking the matter at the worst, I do not think that there is any serious Ogilvy's lacuna in the scheme of the Act. [His Lordship then dealt with certain Trustee.
 other objections with which this report is not concerned.] Ld. President.

I accordingly move your Lordships to adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD M'LAREN.—I take the same view as your Lordship. The argument submitted to us was that while the statute determined by exclusion who was eligible for the office of trustee, if the Sheriff confirmed the election, his decision was final, provided of course that he had exercised his jurisdiction. I agree that there may be cases in which the Sheriff's decision would not be final, as, for example, where he had appointed as trustee the bankrupt's brother or the bankrupt's son. In such a case I should hold that the Sheriff's attention had not been called to the relationship, and that, accordingly, he had not applied his mind to the true question, and so had failed to exercise his jurisdiction. On the other hand, if the objection to the trustee was based on agency—that he was the agent of someone who had a claim against the bankrupt's estate—I should not take the same view, because the question of agency is one of degree, and I should assume that the Sheriff had considered the matter and come to a different opinion from the appellant, and whenever it is ascertained that the Sheriff has exercised his jurisdiction the statute declares his decision to be final.

Similarly, where the person elected trustee has an interest which is manifestly opposed to that of the general body of creditors—as for instance where he claims a preference—I should be of opinion that this was a case where the election could not be sustained, and I should assume in such a case that the Sheriff's attention had not been called to the matter, and that accordingly he had not given a decision on the point.

But if all that is said against the trustee's election is that he, in his capacity as an individual, has a claim against the bankrupt estate, you get at once into a question of degree, for the objection taken might be so trifling that no sensible Judge would pay any attention to it, and on the other hand it might be so serious as to require very careful consideration. These seem to me to be just the kind of questions which the statute has left to the determination of the Sheriff, and nothing has been shewn to convince me that in the present instance the Sheriff had not fully considered the matter.

I therefore think the objection fails.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think on the construction of the statute that the question which it is proposed to raise for our consideration is exactly one of those questions which are by the statute to be decided by the Sheriff finally. The statute says that the creditors are to meet and elect a fit person as trustee. Then it says it shall not be lawful to elect as trustee the bankrupt or any person conjunct or confident with the bankrupt, or who has an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors, or whose residence is not within the jurisdiction of the Court of

June 11, 1908. Session. Now, all these objections are objections to the election by the creditors of a particular person, and so must be considered in the first instance by the creditors. Then the statute says that if there is no competition for the office the Sheriff shall declare the person chosen by the Lord Kinnear. creditors to be trustee. If there is competition he has to find who has been duly elected, and his decision is not subject to review in any Court or in any manner whatever. But the question whether it is a good objection to the trustee that he is a conjunct or confident person or has an interest opposed to the general interest of the creditors, is a question which must be decided before the Sheriff can decide whether the trustee is duly elected or not, and when he has applied his mind to that question and settled it one way or other it appears to me that the express terms of the statute make his decision final. I agree with your Lordship's observation as to the true purpose and effect of this provision. For the books shew that under previous statutes the proceedings were apt to be delayed by protracted litigation between persons competing for the office of trustee, and it is clear enough as Lord Adam points out in one of the previous cases that such litigations could be of no advantage whatever to the creditors, or to the estate. This is the evil which the action was intended to meet. But such a question as that which it is proposed to raise in this case is just one of those which might probably lead to protracted litigation, because the decisions rest on fine distinctions, and a defeated candidate was not very likely to be satisfied with a single judgment against him. I think that this is just the kind of question which it was intended to exclude from appeal. In any case I think that the terms of the statute clearly make the Sheriff's decision final. I agree also that this Court is not prevented by the finality clause from setting aside judgments which are not pronounced in the true and honest exercise of jurisdiction conferred by the statute; but I think that the question whether a decision has been pronounced in the exercise of such jurisdiction cannot depend upon the greater or less materiality of the question or upon the amount of attention which may be supposed to have been given to it. I suppose such a judgment might be set aside on the same grounds as any other final judgment, as for example, if it had been obtained by fraud. But it is not necessary to consider what would be a sufficient ground. It is enough to say that there is no ground for reduction alleged in the present case. Whether the Sheriff was right or wrong in declaring this man elected is not material, because his deliverance is final.

Brock v.
Brock.

ALEXANDER BROCK, joiner, Motherwell, son of the deceased John Brock, builder, Linlithgow, brought an action against his brother John Thomas Brock, builder, Linlithgow, in which he concluded for reduction of a codicil bearing to be granted by the late John Brock, dated 24th September 1896.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

The pursuer averred that the codicil was not executed in accordance with law,* seeing that one of the witnesses, John Allan Wilson, did not know the late John Brock, and had no sufficient information as to his identity.

Proof was allowed and led.

The following were the material facts relating to the execution of the codicil under reduction :—

The testing-clause was in the following terms :—“In witness whereof, this codicil, written by David Barclay, solicitor, 30 Hanover Street, Edinburgh, is subscribed by me at Edinburgh, on the 24th day of September 1896 years, before these witnesses, the said David Barclay and John Allan Wilson, residing at 73 Cumberland Street, Edinburgh.

JOHN BROCK.”

“John A. Wilson, witness.

It had been arranged that the deed should be signed in Mr Barclay's office. After Mr Brock had come to the office Barclay went to look for a witness, and, meeting John Allan Wilson, with whom he was acquainted, he asked him to act. Wilson agreed to act, and went to Barclay's office for that purpose. On entering the office Wilson found a man there whom he had not previously known, but whom Barclay introduced to him as Mr Brock. Mr Brock and Wilson bowed to each other in acknowledgment of the introduction. Mr Brock, who had already adhibited his signature to the codicil, then acknowledged his signature. Barclay said to Mr Brock that he should not have signed until Wilson was present. Mr Brock reiterated his acknowledgment of the signature. Barclay then signed as a witness; and then Wilson signed. Wilson then left the office. Wilson knew Barclay well and had on previous occasions acted as a witness at Barclay's request.

On 20th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary granted decree of reduction on a ground not now reported.

The defender reclaimed.

The case was heard before the Second Division on the 4th, 5th, 10th, 11th, and 12th June 1908.

The argument for the defender and reclamer was directed solely to the ground on which the Lord Ordinary proceeded.

Argued for the pursuer and respondent;—Under the Act 1681, cap. 5, no person was entitled to act as a witness unless he knew the granter. Now it was settled that it was not necessary that the witness should have a particular antecedent knowledge. It was enough if he had credible information that the party subscribing was the granter of the deed.¹ But a mere introduction by the other June 12, 1908. witness was not enough. The object of the Act was to guard against personation. The safeguard provided was that each witness should have credible information as to the identity of the granter. Where the information of one witness was derived wholly from the other witness, the information was truly the information of only one witness. The safeguard provided by the statute, therefore, was not present, and the attestation was bad.

The defenders were not called on for a reply.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK (after discussing a question not now reported).—With regard to the attestation, I have never understood that it was necessary for a witness to be in any other position than that he should be told, if he does not know already, whose signature it is that he is to witness. If the granter is introduced to him that is sufficient; because what he is to witness is the fact that he saw the signature exhibited or heard the granter acknowledge it. A simple introduction by name is all that is necessary if the witness does not know the granter personally.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

LORD LOW (after discussing a question not now reported).—I should like to say a single word as to the argument that was addressed to us for the pursuer founded on his fourth plea in law, which is to the effect that “the said codicil, in respect that it was not executed in accordance with law, should be reduced.”

That plea is founded on the allegation that one of the instrumentary witnesses neither knew Mr Brock nor had any sufficient evidence of his identity.

The question depends on the construction of the Act of Parliament 1681, cap. 5, which, inter alia, enacts that “no witness shall subscribe as witness to any partie’s subscription, unless he then know that partie, and saw him subscribe . . . or that the partie did, at the time of the witnesses subscribing, acknowledge his subscription.” There are two decisions on the question what is required under the enactment by way of knowledge on the part of the witnesses of the identity of the party whose signature they are to witness, and these decisions have been held to rule the law ever since. The first is the case of Campbell v. Robertson.¹ There the sufficiency of the attestation of a bond was challenged on the ground that one of the witnesses was a boy of fourteen, who was called off the street to be a witness, and who deposed that he did not know the granter. The Court held that that was not a good attestation, but they laid it down that the knowledge of the party required by the Act “cannot be understood of a distinct, particular, antecedent knowledge, but only that he called himself so to the witnesses.” According to that decision, therefore, a statement by the person whose signature is to be attested that he is the granter of the deed is sufficient to warrant the witness to subscribe as witness.

The second case is Walker v. Adamson,² where the circumstances were different. The deed challenged was a disposition granted by one Janet daughter of John Handyside, merchant in Edinburgh; and at her subscrib- Lord Low.

 ing the said Janet declared to the deponent and two of the neighbours then present that she was the daughter of the said John Handyside, upon the faith whereof the deponent subscribed as witness." In these circumstances the report bears that:—"The Lords found that the witnesses had such credible information that the subscriber was the true person designed in the writ, that they might lawfully sign as witnesses to a subscription."

The result of these decisions seems to me to be that when a deed is challenged on the ground that the witness did not know whose signature he was attesting, the question is whether he had credible information that the person whose signature he attested was the granter of the deed.

Now, the present case stands thus:—Mr Barclay says that having no clerk in the office, he was in the habit of obtaining the services of a neighbour, a Mr Keenan, and that he had arranged that Mr Keenan should be present on the occasion in question. Keenan, however, did not appear and could not be found, and accordingly the services of Mr Wilson, an acquaintance of Mr Barclay, were obtained. Barclay introduced Wilson to Mr Brock, and the latter acknowledged his signature, and Wilson signed as witness, Barclay being the other witness.

I am of opinion that Wilson had sufficient and credible information that the person to whom he was introduced was the person designed in the writ to justify him in subscribing as witness. Wilson knew Barclay well, and was aware that he was a qualified law-agent and carried on business. When, therefore, Barclay introduced a gentleman to him as a client by the name of and as being the person designed in the writ as granter thereof, and when that gentleman tacitly assented to Barclay's statement by acknowledging the introduction, and then acknowledged his signature, I think that witness had such credible information as to the identity of the person whose signature he witnessed as is required by the statute as construed by the judgments to which I have referred. I am therefore of opinion that the codicil cannot be set aside on the ground of insufficient authentication.

LORD ARDWALL concurred.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied the defender.

Cuthbert v.
Cuthbert's
Trustees.

The case was dismissed as incompetent, on the ground that any judgment which the Court might pronounce would be premature, and would not be res judicata in questions which might arise in the future with possible alimentary creditors.

Question whether an alimentary provision is adjudgeable.

1ST DIVISION. By trust-disposition dated 6th April, and registered in the Books of Council and Session 4th May 1904, the now deceased John Cuthbert, who then resided at Carpow, Abernethy, Perthshire, and afterwards at Kildrochet, Stranraer, Wigtownshire, assigned and disposed to trustees his whole means and estate.

By the ninth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement the deceased John Cuthbert directed his trustees to pay the whole free income of his estate to his nephew, Arthur Cuthbert, and to his nephew's son, Claude Arthur Cuthbert, equally between them or to the survivor, "for their and his liferent alimentary use allanarly, and free from their and his debts or deeds or the diligence of their or his creditors."

Questions having arisen regarding the extent to which Arthur Cuthbert's life interest could be alienated so as to make it available for payment of his debts, a special case was presented, to which the parties were (1) Arthur Cuthbert, and (2) John Cuthbert's trustees.

The case stated :—

"3. The said John Cuthbert, the truster, died on 20th May 1905, survived by the said Arthur Cuthbert and Claude Arthur Cuthbert. The said Arthur Cuthbert is the party of the first part. The said Arthur Cuthbert is forty-seven years of age and is married, and has only one child, the said Claude Arthur Cuthbert, who is seventeen years of age. His wife is still living. She is possessed of separate estate, and is not dependent upon him for her support. The trustees named accepted office and are the parties of the second part.

"4. . . . The whole free income of the said trust means and estate is at present in terms of the said trust-disposition divisible equally between the said Arthur Cuthbert and Claude Arthur Cuthbert. The present free annual income of the trust is estimated at upwards of £11,000, of which the said Arthur Cuthbert is entitled to one-half. . . .

"5. The affairs of the first party have recently become embarrassed in consequence of his having contracted debts amounting to £23,000. He has no available assets other than the alimentary income payable to him under the above-mentioned trust-disposition. In these circumstances his creditors are threatening him with action or sequestration, with a view to attaching by diligence the income payable to him under the said trust-disposition in so far as in excess of a reasonable alimentary provision. The first party is desirous of obviating such proceedings, and has made a provisional arrangement with the Norwich Union Assurance Society whereby, in consideration of his granting to them an assignation to the sum of £2100 per annum payable out of his said liferent provision, together with covering policies of insurance on his life, the Society will advance to him a sum sufficient to enable him to pay off his whole creditors at once in full. The parties are agreed that the said debts are due and payable by the first party, and that the balance of the first party's income under the said trust-disposition, over and above the annual sum of £2100 proposed to be assigned will, if the trust income be maintained at its present amount, constitute an ample alimentary allowance to the first party. The creditors of the first party have been apprised of the proposed transaction, and have agreed to hold their hands in the meantime. The second parties consider the proposed arrangement a reasonable one and advantageous for the first party. A question has, however, arisen in view of the terms of the said trust-disposition as to the power of the first party to grant an effectual assignation in the terms proposed, and as to the power of the second parties to recognise and act upon the same."

June 12, 1908.
Cuthbert v.
Cuthbert's
Trustees.

The first party contended that in order to raise funds to pay off his creditors he was entitled to grant a valid assignation of such an annual sum out of the alimentary liferent payable to him under the said trust-disposition as would leave him a reasonable alimentary provision, and in particular that he was entitled to grant an assignation of an annual sum of £2100 payable out of the said liferent, and that the second parties were bound to recognise and give effect to such an assignation when duly intimated to them. In any event, the first party contended that he was entitled to grant a valid assignation to his said liferent provision in so far as in excess of £1000 per annum.

The second parties contended that the first party was not entitled to assign any part of his income from the trust-estate. They maintained that he was not now entitled to determine what would be a sufficient alimentary provision for him during the whole of his life, and that in any event £1000 was not sufficient as an alimentary provision. They further maintained that in any event he must primo loco have secured to him such sums as would from time to time, and having regard to all circumstances, be a sufficient alimentary provision for him, and that he could not effectually grant, and they were not bound to recognise, an assignation for the whole of his life of a fixed amount out of his income, thus restricting his alimentary liferent to the balance, whatever it might happen to be, of the yearly income.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Has the first party power, in order to raise funds to pay off his creditors, to grant a valid and effectual assignation to the sum of £2100 per annum, payable out of the income provided to him under the said trust-disposition? And if so, are the second parties bound to give effect to such an assignation? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the negative, has the first party power, in order to raise funds to pay off his creditors, to grant a valid and effectual assignation to his liferent provision under the said trust-disposition in so far as in excess of a sufficient alimentary income? And if so, are the second parties bound to give effect to such an assignation? (3) In the event of the second question being answered in the affirmative, is the sum of £1000 per annum a sufficient alimentary provision for the first party?”

Argued for the first party;—A provision even if declared to be alimentary was only protected from the diligence of creditors to the extent of a reasonable provision, and quoad excessum was open to diligence.¹ Not only were the termly payments attachable, but the June 12, 1908. right itself was attachable, and therefore assignable.¹ In the cases referred to and in many others the Court had entertained and decided the question of what constituted a reasonable alimentary allowance. In the present case a reasonable allowance would remain secured to the first party if an assignation were made to the Norwich Union Society in either of the forms indicated in the questions. The questions could be competently decided in a special case since they were such as could have been raised in an action of declarator.²

Cuthbert v.
Cuthbert's
Trustees.

Argued for the second parties ;—It was well settled by authority that in general an alimentary provision was not assignable,³ although in the cases referred to it was true that no distinction was taken between a reasonable provision and one which, though declared to be alimentary, was more ample in amount. In any event, such a provision was assignable only to alimentary creditors, for it was only by such creditors that it could be attached.⁴ The practical difficulty in the way of validly executing such an assignation as was here proposed lay in the fact that it was impossible to predict that the income might not shrink, so that, after deduction of the sum assigned, the remainder would be insufficient to meet the claims of future alimentary creditors, or of the beneficiary himself. The person in whose favour the proposed assignation was to be made was not an alimentary creditor.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a special case between Arthur Cuthbert, who is the nephew and beneficiary under the testament of the late John Cuthbert of the first part, and the said John Cuthbert's trustees of the second part. The question relates to the effect of an alimentary liferent interest, and the extent to which that alimentary interest can be alienated so as to make it available for payment of debts.

The provision under consideration is the ninth purpose of Mr John Cuthbert's will, which provides that the trustees shall hold and apply, pay and convey the whole free income of the trust-estate to Arthur Cuthbert and another, equally between them, or to the survivor of them in liferent for their and his liferent alimentary use allenary, and free of their and his debts or deeds, or the diligence of their or his creditors. Arthur Cuthbert has, we do not know how, but probably through business transactions, incurred debts to the extent of £23,000, but having no capital, and being threatened with diligence by his creditors he has entered into a preliminary arrangement with the Norwich Union Assurance Society, whereby, in consideration of his granting to them an assignation to the sum of £2100 per annum payable out of his said liferent provision, together with covering policies of assurance on his life, the Society will advance a sum of money sufficient to enable him to pay off his whole creditors at once. The trustees seem willing to support this agreement, which is one, no doubt, very advanteagous to Mr Cuthbert at the present moment, but they decline to take the June 12, 1908. responsibility of doing so unless with the approval of the Court. In these ^{Cuthbert v.} circumstances three questions have been submitted for our opinion. The ^{Cuthbert's} first is as to the first party's power to grant a valid and effectual assignation ^{Trustees.} to the sum of £2100 per annum payable out of the income provided to him ^{Lord M'Laren.} under the said trust-disposition; that is to say, cutting off that fixed sum from the amount of the alimentary interest and leaving the remainder for his enjoyment. The next question, in the event of the first question being answered in the negative, is whether the first party has power to grant a valid and effectual assignation to his liferent provision under the said trust-disposition in so far as it is in excess of a sufficient alimentary income. Now, that seems quite a harmless question, as it is in accordance with the spirit of the law on this subject, but it is followed by the third question which is to the following effect,—“In the event of the second question being answered in the affirmative, is the sum of £1000 per annum a sufficient alimentary provision for the first party?”—so that by questions two and three taken together we are asked to say whether it is a legal arrangement that Mr Cuthbert's income should be reduced for all time coming to the minimum sum of £1000 as being sufficient to satisfy his alimentary requirements. The Court has recognised the principle that where a person is in the enjoyment of an annual income under the form of an alimentary liferent that sum may be made available to his creditors year by year in so far as it is in excess of the amount which is required for an alimentary provision, and no difficulty attends this view, because in any one year the income is known, and an opinion can be formed as to what is the necessary sum to maintain the person in the rank of life to which he belongs, without deteriorating to a lower style of living. These facts can be ascertained from year to year. But I am not aware that it ever has been held that an alimentary interest is adjudgeable, and it is impossible to determine the question in this case because other parties who would be interested in the decision of that question are not here, that is to say, the alimentary creditors of the beneficiary whose claims may emerge from year to year. But we are asked in the first question to affirm that the Norwich Union Society have an effectual assignation to this liferent provision, and we are asked to do so on the ground that the sum remaining is sufficient to satisfy the wants of the first party. This year we are told, the income amounts to over £5000. But that is only the condition in this year. There is no difficulty in holding that for the present, more than sufficient would be left for alimentary maintenance. But then we do not know what the income in future years will be. There may be losses through the depreciation of securities or from other causes which may sweep away the fund altogether. Such things have happened, and in some future year the estate of the uncle might be so diminished as not even to provide the £2100 payable to this Insurance Company. In such a case nothing would be left for the beneficiary, and I need hardly say that an alimentary income of nil is not enough for anyone to live upon. This seems to be an insuperable obstacle to giving any answer whatever to the first question.

Questions two and three proceed on the supposition that the Insurance Company instead of having security over the entire estate should limit that

June 12, 1908. security to the annual income less £1000, which would always remain for the aliment of the beneficiary. Well, if he has considered this question, and has come to the conclusion that £1000 is enough to satisfy his alimentary wants, it is highly probable that this would be a satisfactory arrangement, but as one of your Lordships has observed, this only goes to prove that the Insurance Company have a good speculative security for their advance. I do not think that this Court in administering this somewhat delicate equitable jurisdiction can assume that a sum sufficient for the aliment of a party in the present year would remain sufficient for his aliment in all time. We do not know that the value of gold for instance may not change, and that a sum now sufficient to maintain a person with decency in the position in life which he occupies might not be sufficient to maintain him in a similar position twenty years hence. Accordingly, I see considerable difficulty in answering questions two and three at all. Indeed, the theory of this case involves the startling assumption that an alimentary interest is adjudgeable, because I do not see how otherwise a security can be created over that interest for the money it is proposed should be advanced. I have therefore come to the conclusion that it is impossible to give any answer to either of these questions. It must be left to the Insurance Company, if they are satisfied with the security, to consider whether they will make this advance without the authority of the Court. If we were so ill advised as to answer the questions as the parties to this case desire, this would not prevent creditors coming forward in the future to make a claim on the annual income, because our decision would not be res judicata in a question with them. The question would then arise whether the assignation which had been made to the Insurance Company was valid, and whether it gave a preference to the Insurance Company over these other creditors. I therefore move that we should dismiss the case.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also think that this case must be dismissed as incompetent. I do not think that the incompetency arises from the shape in which the case is presented, for I assent to the view which was stated by counsel, viz., that the Court may entertain in the form of a special case any question which might be entertained as a declaratory conclusion in an action of declarator. But I think that if an action of declarator had been brought in which the Court was asked to affirm the proposition which we are asked to affirm in this case, such an action must have been dismissed. The question we are asked is whether, if the first party grants an assignation to the Insurance Company of part of his income, that will be a valid and effectual assignation in circumstances about which it may be easy to speculate, but which it is impossible to foresee, and we are to decide this in the absence of persons who may have an interest and who are not now before the Court. Whether there is left a sufficient margin of income to make the proposed loan a safe investment is a question of which the lenders may be able to judge, but about which they are not entitled to ask the Court to speculate or to advise them. The practical question is whether if this assignation were now granted it would be valid and effectual in the event of questions arising at some future time between the assignees and creditors of the grantor, who might arrest a term's income for an alleged alimentary debt.

This question we cannot decide, because our decision would not be res June 12, 1908.
judicata against the hypothetical arrester. It is perhaps natural that as ^{Cuthbert v.}
 both parties desire a judgment, they should not have called our attention ^{Cuthbert's} to the many cases in which the Court has refused to entertain questions of ^{Trustees.}
 this kind. The Court has uniformly refused to consider a declaratory ^{Lord Kinnear.}
 conclusion that if such and such a thing were done, it would make a valid and effectual deed; and that is just the proposition that we are asked in this case to affirm or deny. I need only refer to two authorities, viz., Earl *of Galloway v. Garlies*¹ and Harvey v. Harvey's Trustees.² In the latter case the principle is explained by Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis. The question there was whether children who had an interest in certain provisions were entitled to test on their provisions, and Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis said (p. 1325),—"The question presents itself for our consideration whether if we were to pronounce judgment upon this question of the right of the younger children to test upon any portion of the provisions settled by the deed of 1839, that would be an operative and conclusive judgment when the question really arises. It might or might not. . . . There might be parties coming before the Court at a distance of years and trying that question over again, and representing your Lordships' judgment pronounced now as utterly inoperative and useless. For what reason? Simply because it was a premature judgment that ought never to have been pronounced." His Lordship goes on to point out that the fatal objection to such a premature judgment is that it will not become res judicata against all persons who can become interested in the matter.

Upon the same ground, viz., that any judgment we pronounced now would be premature, I think this case ought to be dismissed.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I concur. I regret that we cannot save Mr Arthur Cuthbert from one of the disagreeable results of the circumstances which have placed him in his present position. I am afraid he must either execute a trust-deed or go through the Bankruptcy Court, and there the question which we are asked to decide ab ante may properly be tried between his trustee and his creditors.

It is unfortunate that this should be necessary. But I do not think the questions attempted to be raised can otherwise competently and effectually be raised.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT dismissed the case as incompetent.

Poor—Settlement—Lunatic—Residential Settlement—Retention—Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 75.—The Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857, sec. 75, enacts:—"Every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted, and the expense of his maintenance in such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly, and the residence of any pauper lunatic in any such district asylum shall be deemed to be the residence of such lunatic in the parish legally chargeable with the maintenance of such lunatic."

A lunatic who was born in the parish of Parton, and who had on 15th August 1895 a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, was admitted to an asylum in another parish as a pauper lunatic on that date. For a few months after her admission she was maintained by the parish of Kelton. For the next ten years she was maintained by her brother in the same asylum as a private patient, and her name taken off the poor's-roll. Thereafter her brother ceased to contribute to her support, and she again fell upon the rates, being detained in the same asylum under the order granted when she was first admitted.

In a question between the parish of Kelton, who contended that she had lost her residential settlement by non-residence during the period when she was a private patient, and the parish of Parton, who contended that her settlement remained the same as at the date of her admission, held that the lunatic had not lost her residential settlement, and that she was chargeable to the parish of Kelton as the parish of her settlement at the time when the order for her reception was granted,—(disc. Lord Johnston, who was of opinion that when the lunatic became a private patient she ceased to be a pauper lunatic, and that sec. 75 no longer applied).

Kirkwood v. Lennox, July 10, 1869, 7 Macph. 1027, followed.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Dumfries and Galloway.

MILES M'INNES, inspector of poor of the parish of Dumfries, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, against Samuel Rigg, inspector of poor of the parish of Kelton, and James Bell, inspector of poor of the parish of Parton, in which the Court was craved to ordain the defender Rigg, or otherwise the defender Bell, to relieve the pursuer of the advances made and to be made by him on account of Janet Cannon, a pauper lunatic, residing in the Crichton Royal Institution, Dumfries.

The Crichton Institution is situated in the parish of Dumfries, and for the purposes of the Lunatics Act, 1857, is the district asylum for pauper lunatics in the district of Dumfries.

The following narrative of the facts, which were not in dispute, is taken from the averments of parties:—

Janet Cannon was born in the parish of Parton, and on 15th August 1895 had a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton. On that date, being a pauper and a lunatic, she was admitted to the Crichton Royal Institution as a pauper lunatic. The parish of Kelton admitted liability for her support, and maintained her until 2d November 1895.* From 2d November 1895 until 1st May 1906,

* The Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict. cap. 71), sec. 75, is quoted in the rubric.

Janet Cannon was maintained by her brother as a lunatic at the Crichton Institution, and during that period her name was transferred from the list of pauper patients to the list of private patients kept at the asylum, and was thereupon struck off the poor-roll of the parish of Kelton. After 1st May 1906 her brother ceased to contribute to her support, and she again became a pauper. As she had not recovered, she continued to reside in the Crichton Institution, and at the date when the action was raised she was still detained there under the order which was granted when she was first admitted in 1895. June 12, 1908.
Rigg v. Bell.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pauper not having a parochial settlement in the parish of Dumfries, the pursuer is entitled to be relieved of her maintenance by the Parish Council of the parish in which such settlement exists. (2) The pauper having a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, the pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for against the defender Samuel Rigg, as representing the Parish Council of that parish. (3) Alternatively, and assuming that such residential settlement has been lost by absence, the pursuer is entitled to decree against the defender James Bell, as representing the Parish Council of the parish of Parton, which is the parish of the pauper's birth settlement.

The parish of Kelton pleaded;—(1) The pauper, Janet Cannon, having been resident outwith the parish of Kelton, and not having been in receipt of parochial relief from the period from 2d November 1895 to 1st May 1906, and having thus lost her residential settlement in the said parish, the defender Samuel Rigg is entitled to be assolized. (2) The pauper, Janet Cannon, having lost her residential settlement in the parish of Kelton as before mentioned, and being a lunatic and incapable of acquiring a residential settlement, the parish of Parton, as her birth settlement, is bound to support her, and the defender Samuel Rigg should be assolized.

The parish of Parton pleaded;—(1) The pauper not having a parochial settlement in the parish of Parton, said parish of Parton is not liable in relief to the pursuer for the pauper's maintenance. (2) The pauper having a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, that parish is alone liable to the pursuer for the sums sued for, and the defender James Bell is entitled to be assolized. (3) The pauper having a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, the defender James Bell is entitled to be assolized.

Joint minutes were lodged for the parties, by which they renounced probation, and admitted that either the parish of Kelton or the parish of Parton was liable in relief to the pursuer for the sums sued for.

On 15th May 1907 the Sheriff-substitute (Napier) pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds in law (1) that Janet Cannon has lost her residential settlement in the parish of Kelton by non-residence therein; (2) that the parish of Parton, being the parish of her birth settlement, is now bound to support her: Therefore sustains the pursuer's third plea in law, and pleas one and two of the defender Samuel Rigg, inspector of poor of the parish of Kelton: Repels the pleas stated by the defender James Bell, inspector of poor of the parish of Parton; and decerns against the said James Bell as craved.

The defender James Bell appealed to the Sheriff.

On 6th August 1907 the Sheriff (Fleming) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the appeal; recalls the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 15th May 1907 complained of; finds of new, in fact, in June 12, 1908. terms of the findings in fact in said interlocutor: Finds, in law, that by the provision of section 75 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857, Janet Cannon has not lost her residential settlement in the parish of Kelton, and that that parish is still bound to support her; therefore sustains the pursuer's second plea in law, and the defender James Bell's second plea in law, and decerns against the defender Samuel Rigg as craved." *

The defender Samuel Rigg appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—Apart from the effect of section 75 of the Lunatics Act,¹ there could be no doubt that the lunatic had lost her settlement in Kelton by non-residence.² [Counsel for respondent stated that he did not dispute this.] Section 75 had no bearing, for it applied only to the case of a person who, throughout the whole period of his residence in the asylum, was both pauper and lunatic. In the present case the lunatic was supported by her brother for more than ten years, during which time she was capable of losing, and did lose, her residential settlement.³ *Kirkwood v. Lennox*⁴ was not conclusive against the appellant's contention. The Lord President in that case, on whose opinion the respondent founded, proceeded on the view that a lunatic could neither acquire nor lose a settlement—a view which was inconsistent with Keith Parish Council v. Kirkmichael

* "NOTE.—The only question in this cause is whether the 75th section of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857, applies. If it does not, the residential settlement acquired in Kelton has been lost by absence, for the fact that the person was a lunatic during that absence does not render him incapable of losing such a settlement (Crawford v. Beattie, 24 D. 357), and the birth settlement in Parton revives. If it does apply, the residential settlement in Kelton, being the lunatic's legal settlement when the order for her reception in the district asylum was granted, continues notwithstanding her bodily absence from that parish.

"This section was carefully considered in the case of Kirkwood v. Lennox, 7 Macph. 1027, where the circumstances were very similar to the present case, and the Court there held that the section did apply. The ground of judgment given by Lord President Inglis was that a study of the section shewed that the only conditions imposed by it were, first, that the person is a pauper lunatic, and, second, as a pauper lunatic is detained in the asylum, and his Lordship came to the conclusion that it was clear 'to my mind that if the person was sent to the asylum as a lunatic, and there became a pauper, the section was meant to apply.'

"Lords Deas and Ardmillan proceeded on the ground that a person sent to an asylum by an inspector of poor is a pauper lunatic within the meaning of the section, and therefore the settlement will not change.

"Were it necessary, I should be prepared to follow the opinion of the Lord President; but it is not, for the further facts desiderated by Lords Deas and Ardmillan are here present. The lunatic was a pauper at the date of her committal to the asylum, and was sent there by the inspector of poor. What happened afterwards during her detention in the asylum does not, in the opinion of any of those Judges, affect the applicability of the section, and therefore the settlement as at the date of the lunatic's committal remains."

Rigg v. Bell.

Argued for the respondent, James Bell;—The present case was indistinguishable from the case of Kirkwood,² by which it was ruled. The crucial point was the settlement of the pauper lunatic at the date when she was admitted to the asylum,⁴ and so long as she continued to reside in the asylum her settlement could not change.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—The essential facts in this poor-law case are of the most simple character. The pauper, when admitted to the Crichton Lunatic Asylum at Dumfries, was chargeable to the parish of Kelton, which was her residential settlement. After a short interval she came to be practically maintained by her brother, and was taken off the pauper roll. But latterly her brother ceased to contribute to her support, and she then became again chargeable. The parish of Kelton says that the parish of Parton, the birth settlement of the pauper, is liable on the ground that the pauper's residential settlement in the parish of Kelton was lost by her residence in Dumfries. This would probably be the case were it not for the provisions of the 75th section of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857, which provides that every pauper lunatic "shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted."

I am unable to see that the effect of the 75th section is displaced by the circumstance that during part of the period of the ward's detention she was to a certain extent maintained by a relative. Under the statute, the condition of chargeability is indefinite as to time, and, as I think, is applicable to the whole or any part of the period of the insane person's detention in an asylum. Accordingly, when the question of chargeability now arises, I think it must be solved by the 75th section. If my proposition is sound, there can be no difficulty in applying the 75th section, which is perfectly explicit on this subject. It says that the lunatic shall be chargeable to the parish of her legal settlement at the time the order for her reception was granted. Now, Kelton was the parish of her settlement at the time the Sheriff's order was granted, and it follows, in my opinion, that Kelton is liable.

If it were necessary to consider the motive of this statutory provision, it is not difficult to infer that it was considered that a lunatic during the period of his or her detention had neither the volition nor the power to perform such acts as are usually necessary to the acquisition or the loss of a settlement. But, in my view, it is unnecessary to consider the motive of the framer of the clause, because even if we were to regard it as arbitrary, and inconsistent with the principles that regulate settlements when these

Rigg v. Bell.

Lord M'Laren.

I am further of opinion that the present case is governed by the opinion of Lord President Inglis in the case of Kirkwood v. Lennox,¹ an opinion which, as I read it, is altogether independent of the special circumstances of the case considered. The Lord President's opinion, I think, must be taken to represent the opinion of the majority of the Court, though Lord Kinloch took a somewhat different view. It has often been observed that a point in the law of parochial settlement when once decided ought not to be disturbed, because it is much more important that the law should be known and acted on than that it should be theoretically perfect. In the present case, which depends on the construction of statute law, this consideration has great weight, and even if I were less clear in my own mind as to the meaning of the 75th section, I should not be disposed to reconsider the judgment in the case of Kirkwood,¹ which is one of great authority. I am accordingly of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree with Lord M'Laren. I should have thought it enough for the decision of this case to say that the question here raised is answered in the opinion of Lord President Inglis in the case of Kirkwood v. Lennox,¹ which decision, in my opinion, rules the present case. I do not think that the soundness of that decision has been questioned. I am aware that there was a difference of opinion upon the bench, but I do not think that the authority of the decision is open to challenge upon the ground that the Lord President and Lord Deas differed upon a question which it was, as the learned Judges point out, unnecessary to decide, and which certainly did not determine the judgment. As I read the opinions the majority of the Court agreed with the Lord President in the construction which he put upon the 75th section of the Lunacy Act of 1857, which is the only question we have to consider here. I find it difficult to regard the Act of Parliament as requiring further interpretation, but reading it for myself I come to the same conclusion which has been already judicially arrived at by Lord President Inglis. I agree with Lord M'Laren that it is not necessary to consider the motive of the statutory provision, but the purpose which it had in view seems to be clear enough. The main object of this part of the Act was to establish district asylums in which the pauper lunatics from the various parishes in each district were to be received. It would have been inconvenient and inequitable to regulate the mutual liabilities of such parishes by the existing law of settlement, because that would have imposed upon the parish in which asylums happened to be situated the burden of maintaining all the paupers which other parishes, originally liable, had sent to the asylum as lunatics, so as to determine their own liability by the cessation of residence, as soon as the lunatic had been three years in the asylum. This inconvenience is obviated by the provisions of section 75, which are perfectly simple and adequate. The section provides that "every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted, and the expense of his maintenance in such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly." In applying that enactment to the present case, the first question is whether the pauper is detained in a district asylum under the Lunacy Act; and as to that, it is admitted that the pauper is detained in the Crichton Royal Institution, which for the purposes of the Act is a district asylum, on a warrant obtained from the Sheriff-Clerk of Dumfriesshire at the instance of the inspector of poor of the parish of Kelton. The first condition of the 75th section is therefore satisfied; and the only remaining condition to fix liability on Kelton is that Kelton shall be shewn to have been the parish of the legal settlement of the lunatic at the time the order for her reception in the Crichton Asylum was granted. But that, again, is settled by admission. It is not disputed that that parish was liable for her maintenance at the time of her admission. The section goes on to provide, "and the residence of any pauper lunatic in any such district asylum shall be deemed to be the residence of such lunatic in the parish legally chargeable with the maintenance of such lunatic." Again, there is no dispute that the pauper has continued to reside in the district asylum ever since, and accordingly, in my opinion, Kelton is the parish that remains chargeable for her maintenance. It is said by the Sheriff-substitute that during the time when her brother was able to give some assistance towards her maintenance she might have been removed from the Crichton Institution, with the consent of the authorities, to another asylum. What might have been the effect of such a removal upon the settlement of the pauper is a totally different question, but it is not one that we are called upon to answer in this case. But the answer is that that did not happen. If she had been removed she would not now have been detained upon the order obtained by the inspector of the poor of Kelton in 1895. I therefore agree with Lord M'Laren that the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed.

June 12, 1908.
Rigg v. Bell.
Lord Kinncar.

LORD JOHNSTON.—I regret that I am unable to concur in the judgment which your Lordships propose.

Janet Cannon, whose settlement is in dispute, had admittedly her birth settlement in the parish of Parton. Prior to 15th August 1895 she had acquired a residential settlement in the parish of Kelton. On that date she was admitted as a pauper lunatic to the Crichton Royal Institution, Dumfries, a district asylum in the sense of the Lunatics (Scotland) Act, 1857. At the date of her becoming chargeable she was not actually residing in Kelton but in Crossmichael, but Kelton, as the parish of her then residential settlement, properly admitted liability, and she was maintained down to 2d November 1895, a period of two and a half months, at the expense of Kelton. The Crichton Institution is, either by endowment or otherwise, a wealthy corporation, and is able on a comparatively small payment to receive paying patients, who thus are supported partly at the expense of the institution and partly by contributions from their own funds or from relations, but as private and not as pauper patients. On 2d November 1895 the lunatic's brother, Frederick S. Cannon, undertook to make the necessary contribu-

June 12, 1908. tion, which I understand was only £10, and his sister was at that date removed from the list of pauper to that of private patients of the asylum kept in terms of the Lunatics Act, 1857, section 96, and Schedule I, and Rigg v. Bell. her name was struck off the poor-roll of the parish of Kelton. The brother continued to make the necessary payment, and Janet Cannon was maintained as a private or non-pauper lunatic in the Crichton Institution for ten and a half years, or down to 1st May 1906, when her brother's contributions ceased, and she again became chargeable as a pauper lunatic. The question is, whether Kelton, the parish of her former residential settlement, still remains liable, or whether she reverts to her birth settlement in Parton. Ld. Johnston.

It is admitted that unless the 75th section of the Lunatics Act, 1857, applied to keep alive the lunatic's residential settlement in Kelton, not only for the two and a half months of her maintenance by Kelton, but also for the ten and a half years of her maintenance by her brother in the Crichton Institution, in the parish of Dumfries, Parton, as the parish of her birth settlement, is liable. That question depends upon the construction to be put upon that 75th section. But it is maintained by Parton that the question of such construction is foreclosed, so far as this Division is concerned, by the decision in the case of Kirkwood v. Lennox.¹

I find myself unable, owing to the circumstances of that case, and the divergent grounds of judgment on which the four Judges who took part in it reached their decision, to satisfy myself whether the question is foreclosed, without first considering for myself the enactment in question.

The ostensible purpose and operative result of the 75th section of the Act is, writ short, that the residence of a pauper lunatic in a district asylum is to be deemed residence in the lunatic's parish of settlement, whatever that was at the date of admission. In other words, its object and effect is to treat the district asylum as conventionally situated in the parish of each lunatic pauper's settlement, so as to obviate any result from residence in a parish which would very seldom be the same de facto as the parish of settlement. Whether more was intended or is effected depends on a scrutiny of the clause in detail.

But I entirely demur to considering this 75th section by itself. I think for its sound construction a consideration of the general provisions of the Act, so far as bearing upon pauper lunatics and district asylums, is absolutely requisite.

The object, as stated in the preamble of the Act, is to make more efficient provision for the care and treatment of lunatics, and for the provision, maintenance, and regulation of lunatic asylums in Scotland; and accordingly it repeals all previous Acts regulating lunatic asylums. It bears therefore to be complete within itself. Now, the first thing that strikes one is the distinction disclosed in the interpretation clause (section 3), and constantly appearing throughout the Act between public asylums, private asylums, and district asylums. And as the section in question is concerned only with district asylums, it is necessary to ascertain with definiteness what a district asylum is.

If I were to describe shortly the main objects of the Act, I should say they were—First, the creation of a new General Board of Commissioners in Lunacy in Scotland, and the definition of their powers and duties; second, the placing under their supervision all asylums and all lunatics in Scotland; third, the regulation of the admission of lunatics and their detention in asylums; and fourth, the provision for pauper lunatics. And I think that this last-mentioned purpose was more of a new departure, and bulks more largely in the Act, than any of the others. It is with it only that we are here concerned.

June 12, 1908.
Rigg v. Bell.
Ld. Johnston.

A district asylum is defined (section 3) to “mean an asylum, in terms of this Act, of one of the districts described in the Schedule H hereunto annexed.” By Schedule H the whole country of Scotland is divided into districts, and the Dumfries district is declared to comprise the counties of Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, and Wigton. Kelton (and also Parton, if that were material) is in Kirkcudbright, and thus in the Dumfries district.

The enactments regarding district asylums are contained in sections 49 to 80 of the Act, and it must, from a consideration of these sections, be at once apparent that the sole object of the creation of district asylums was to provide for the maintenance of pauper lunatics. The country is divided (section 49 and Schedule H) into districts. District Boards are created (section 50). The Board (i.e., the Commissioners in Lunacy) are (section 51) on inquiry to determine whether the existing accommodation for pauper lunatics for each district is sufficient, or whether a district asylum for pauper lunatics shall be provided. The provision and the maintenance of district asylums is to be defrayed (sections 52 to 55) out of an assessment. But to obviate the necessity of erecting new district asylums, “special arrangements” are (section 56 et seq.) sanctioned whereby a District Board may obtain the transfer of an existing asylum, or the appropriation of a portion of an existing public asylum to its use for its pauper lunatics. But with regard to the Dumfries district it is exceptionally enacted (section 60) that the Crichton Institution shall be obliged to receive the pauper lunatics of the Dumfries district “upon the conditions herein provided and prescribed in respect to pauper lunatics sent to the district asylums to be established in virtue of the Act.” Therefore in the Dumfries district, the Crichton Institution stands for the district asylum, but, exceptionally, the District Board neither obtains the transfer of it or of appropriated accommodation in it.

There immediately follows the section to which I have referred a series of clauses (sections 73 to 79) which provide for payment of the expense of maintaining lunatic paupers. It is assumed that the District Board in respect of the previous provisions is the paymaster in the first instance. It is then provided (section 73) that “there shall be paid to the District Board for each pauper lunatic sent to and detained in any district asylum such sum,” &c., and the money so to be paid to the District Board is to be applied by them in defraying the maintenance and expenses of the patients, salaries of officials, and all other necessary expenses of the district asylum. I pass over section 75 in the meantime. The provisions of sections 76 to 79 are not in any very logical order, but their gist is this:—The expense of examining, removing, and maintaining any lunatic shall primarily be a charge on the estate of such lunatic, and failing such estate, shall be a charge on the parish of settlement, subject to this, that if the parish of settlement

June 12, 1908. cannot be ascertained the said expense shall be a charge on the parish in Rigg v. Bell. and from which the lunatic was taken and sent, with recourse to such parish against any other party or parish liable. Then there is a provision in section Ld. Johnston. 77 which I think is not without bearing on the question at issue. It says that the expense incurred for "or in relation to the examination, removal, and maintenance of any lunatic, shall be defrayed out of the estate of such lunatic; or if such lunatic has no adequate estate, and if such expense shall not be borne by the relations of such lunatic, then the lunatic shall be treated as a pauper lunatic, and such expense shall be defrayed by the parish of settlement of such lunatic." I emphasise the words "if such expense shall not be borne by the relations of such lunatic," if they are so borne then such lunatic shall not be treated as a pauper lunatic. And I think it follows that though a lunatic has been admitted and maintained for a time properly as a pauper lunatic, if afterwards the expense of maintenance comes to be borne by the relations of such lunatic then the lunatic must cease to be treated as a pauper lunatic. And it is quite in accordance with this that the authorities of the Crichton Institution in November 1895 transferred the lunatic Janet Cannon from the statutory list of pauper lunatics to that of private patients, and that she continued on the latter list from November 1895 to May 1906.

Now, embedded in this fasciculus of clauses relating to the payment and repayment of the expense of maintenance of pauper lunatics is the 75th section, which the Court is now called on to interpret. It provides, in the first place, that "every pauper lunatic detained in any district asylum under this Act shall be deemed and held to belong and be chargeable to the parish of the legal settlement of such lunatic at the time the order for his reception in such asylum was granted." Found in the company in which it is, and expressed as it is, that provision has reference solely to those lunatics who in terms of section 77 are to be treated as pauper lunatics. I am not moved by the fact that the expression used is "detained," whereas in other sections it is "sent to and detained." Where the words "sent to" are added there is a reason, for they always have reference not merely to maintenance but to preliminary examination and removal. Further, I cannot read the expression "such lunatic" as meaning anything more or less than "such pauper lunatic," which is its proper relative. I cannot hold that where a lunatic is received and detained for a time properly as a pauper lunatic, but afterwards becomes, either by succeeding to property or by the intervention of friends, a private patient, that the provision above quoted is intended to interfere, or has the effect of interfering, with the ordinary law of settlement after the lunatic has ceased to be treated as a pauper lunatic so that his settlement at the date of his reception is necessarily to regulate his settlement during the whole period of his residence in the asylum.

I do not think that it was the intention of the Legislature to deal in this section with any but those lunatics who were under the Act to be continuously treated as pauper lunatics, and that to interpret the provision above quoted as the respondent seeks to do, and to apply it to the present case, is inadmissible. When I speak of the intention of the Legislature, I mean of course its intention as gathered from the expressions it has used, and from the surrounding circumstances, particularly including the surrounding provisions amongst which or the collocation in which the enactment in question June 12, 1908. is found. But at the same time I think that the deductions from the expressions used, interpreted as a Court must interpret them, are entirely consistent with what one must infer was the legislative intention of Parliament. There is no doubt that section 75 is necessary in the matter of pauper lunatics, as a supplement to sections 73 and 76-78, and that it prevents the residential settlement of a lunatic, admitted as a pauper, from being lost by residence as a pauper in a district asylum and consequent absence from the parish of such residential settlement. But does it do more? It must be admitted on the authorities—(Crawford and Petrie v. Beattie; ¹ Thomson v. Kidd and Beattie; ² Keith v. Kirkmichael ³) that a lunatic admitted as a private patient, in course of time loses by detention any residential settlement he or she may have had on admission, and none the less that the private patient after having lost such residential settlement has become a pauper patient. The extraordinary result of the strained interpretation proposed to be put on the word “detained” would clean upset the result of these decisions, for it would send back the lunatic who, after losing his residential settlement by residing as a private patient in an asylum which happens to be like the Crichton Institution a pro-district asylum, has become a pauper, upon the residential settlement which he has lost, for that was the settlement he had when his order for reception was granted. Or else it must be held that the section does not apply to such case, because there is no order of the Sheriff for reception of the lunatic as a pauper in a district asylum, but only for his reception as a lunatic. Admittedly this extraordinary result cannot be reached. Was then the 75th section intended to distinguish, and does it distinguish, between the case of the lunatic who has been detained long enough to lose a residential settlement after ceasing to be a pauper, and that of the lunatic who has been detained long enough to lose such settlement before becoming a pauper? I humbly think not.

Rigg v. Bell.
Ld. Johnston.

The following consideration materially confirms the above conclusion. The district asylum is in its conception an asylum only competent for pauper patients. The moment the patient ceases to be a pauper—though, as in the Crichton Institution, he may continue to reside under the same roof—the asylum ceases to be, in the conception of the Act quoad him, a district asylum.

I return to the terms of the 75th section. Having provided for the conventional continuance of the existing settlement, it enacts, in the second place, that “the expense of his maintenance in such district asylum shall be defrayed by such parish accordingly.” “His,” just as “such,” can only refer to pauper lunatic, for the parish has nothing to do with the maintenance of any lunatic not a pauper.

Then lastly and, as I think, conclusively, to provide or explain the ratio of the above chargeability which is inconsistent with the ordinary law, the section goes on to say,—“The residence of any pauper lunatic in any such district asylum shall be deemed to be the residence of such lunatic in the parish legally chargeable with the maintenance of such lunatic.” These words aptly suit the necessity of the situation, if the earlier part of the sec-

³ 4 F. 76.

June 12, 1908. tion is confined in its operation to the case of the lunatic who is a pauper when admitted and remains a pauper during his detention, to which only do I think that the section applies. But it is wholly inappropriate in its terms if it be attempted to construe it as providing that the residence of a lunatic, not only while he is a pauper but also after he ceases to be a pauper, shall, if he again becomes chargeable, be necessarily deemed to be in the parish of his legal settlement at the time he was originally admitted to the asylum.

Rigg v. Bell.

Ld. Johnston.

I would therefore, if I felt myself free to form an opinion for myself, be for reverting to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. In doing so I am satisfied that I should be giving effect to every word of the section and straining none. A lunatic admitted as a pauper will retain his parish of settlement so long as he is detained as a pauper. When he ceases to be a pauper he is found to have that settlement which he has so retained. But he then becomes as capable of losing that settlement if he continues in the asylum as a private patient as he would be if he went to a different asylum or returned to his friends. This gives full effect and does no violence to the terms of the enactment.

But it is maintained that the question is foreclosed by the decision of this Division of the Court in Kirkwood v. Lennox.¹ I admit that the question is foreclosed by the judgment of the late Lord President Inglis, and if I found that his ground of judgment had been adopted by the rest of the Court I should of course be bound by it, whether I agreed with it or not. The case, however, presents itself in a very exceptional light. A lunatic with a residential settlement in Govan was admitted to and detained in Gartnavel Asylum as a private patient from 10th August 1864 to 30th November 1868, when, her funds being exhausted, she became a pauper lunatic. Now, Gartnavel being in Govan, there happened in this case to be no change of residence occasioned by the committal to the asylum. Had there been, there would de facto have been absence from Govan for more than four years, and the residential settlement would admittedly not have been retained. The late Lord President personally held the opinion, which is not generally received, that mental capacity was requisite for the retention as well as for the acquisition of a settlement, and hence it would have followed that the pauper's residential settlement would have been lost by more than four years' residence as a lunatic in an asylum, though locally situated in the parish of residential settlement. If in the late Lord President's opinion this ground of judgment was not to receive effect, resort must be had to the 75th section of the Act of 1857, and on consideration of its provisions his Lordship held it to apply; and if it properly applied in that case, I admit that it must a fortiori apply in the present. The judgment is, I admit, not merely an obiter dictum of the late Lord President, it is his judgment in deciding the cause. But it is not the judgment of the Court. Lord Kinloch differed from the Lord President in thinking it necessary to have recourse to the statute, which he therefore did not attempt to interpret. For he held, disagreeing with the Lord President, that mental capacity is not necessary for the retention of a residential settlement, and based his judgment in favour of the liability of Govan on the ground that de facto June 12, 1908.

 there had been continued residence in Govan, though in an asylum. Lord Rigg v. Bell.
 Deas, again, does not adopt the interpretation put upon the 75th section — by the Lord President, but bases his judgment on the view that the discovery of certain funds did not take the lunatic out of the category of a pauper lunatic, in which he thought the pauper was at the date of her confinement. And I think, though his Lordship's meaning is not very clear, that Lord Ardmillan agreed with Lord Deas. In these circumstances the interpretation of the 75th section of the statute contended for is that of the Lord President Inglis alone. The Court is therefore not precluded from consideration of the question as an open question, though bound to recognise the weight of the great authority of the late Lord President in favour of the respondent's contention. I have given the most respectful consideration to his Lordship's judgment in Kirkwood v. Lennox,¹ but for the reasons I have stated I am unable to follow it. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be sustained. —

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the Sheriff.

No. 142.

THE HONOURABLE WILLIAM JAMES HEWITT AND OTHERS (Horatio June 16, 1908.
 Granville Murray Stewart's Trustees), Respondents.—D.-F. Campbell Gardiners v.
 —Hon. W. Watson. Stewart's
 Trustees.

Lease—Outgoing Tenant—Obligation to take over sheep stock—Transmission of obligation against representatives of lessor—Entail—Lease by heir of entail—Executor.—An heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate granted a lease of a sheep farm which contained this clause :—"The proprietor binds and obliges himself that he or the then incoming tenant shall purchase the waygoing blackfaced hill sheep stock . . . at the expiration of this tenancy . . . at the valuation of two arbiters mutually chosen." The granter of the lease died and was succeeded in the entailed estate by the next heir of entail, who disentailed and died before the termination of the lease. The lease being about to terminate, his representatives and the incoming tenant both intimated to the outgoing tenant that they declined to purchase the sheep stock. The tenant then sought to enforce the obligation against the trustees and executors of the granter of the lease by presenting a petition against them for the appointment of an arbiter to value the sheep stock.

Held that the obligation had transmitted against the trustees and executors of the granter, and that they were bound to appoint an arbiter.

By lease dated 25th and 28th January 1896 Horatio Granville 1st Division.
 Murray Stewart, heir of entail in possession of the entailed estate of Lord Guthrie.
 Cally, in Kirkcudbrightshire, let to Robert Gardiner and Alexander Gardiner the farms of Killeron and Orchars, forming part of that

June 16, 1908. estate, for a period of nineteen years from Whitsunday 1896, with a break in favour of either party at Whitsunday 1908.

Gardiners v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

The lease contained this clause :—" And the tenants hereby undertake to purchase the blackfaced hill sheep stock usually kept on the said farms, and also the last crop of grain and the dung on the lands at their entry, and the threshing-mill, grates, and bells at Killeron, all at the valuation of arbiters or oversman as aforesaid. Further, the tenants bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids to sell, and the proprietor binds and obliges himself that he or the then incoming tenant shall purchase, the waygoing blackfaced hill sheep stock usually kept on the lands at the expiration of this tenancy, and not exceeding nineteen hundred head in all on the farm of Orchars, and two hundred head on the farm of Killeron, and the last crop of grain under this lease, the manure made upon the lands from the time of the input of the last green crop, and the threshing-mill, grates, and bells at Killeron, all at the valuation of two arbiters mutually chosen, or oversman as aforesaid, at the usual times."

Mr Murray Stewart died in May 1905, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he appointed the Honourable William James Hewitt and certain others to be his trustees and executors, and disposed to them his whole estate, heritable and moveable, in Scotland for the purposes therein mentioned. He also left a will in English form conveying to the same parties, as his trustees and executors, the residue of his real and moveable property situated in England and Ireland.

Mr Murray Stewart was succeeded in the entailed estate of Cally by the next heir of entail, Colonel James William Murray Baillie, who disentailed the estate, and thereafter conveyed it to a body of trustees for certain specified purposes. Colonel Murray Baillie died in March 1906, and at Whitsunday 1906 his trustees were the heritable proprietors in possession of the estate of Cally, including the farms of Killeron and Orchars.

The Messrs Gardiner, the tenants of these farms, took advantage of the break in the lease, and gave notice to Colonel Baillie's trustees that they would terminate their tenancy at Whitsunday 1908. Colonel Baillie's trustees intimated that they were not prepared to take over the sheep stock at the termination of the lease, and the incoming tenant of one of the farms (the other remaining unlet) also declined to take over the stock on his farm. The Messrs Gardiner then called upon Mr Murray Stewart's trustees to fulfil the obligation undertaken by the granter of the lease, and nominated Mr George G. B. Sproat to act for them as arbiter in the valuation of the sheep stock. Mr Murray Stewart's trustees repudiated the obligation to take over the sheep stock, and declined to appoint an arbiter.

On 29th April 1908 the Messrs Gardiner presented a petition under section 3 of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. cap. 13), to which Mr Murray Stewart's trustees were called as respondents, craving the Court to appoint an arbiter to act along with Mr George G. B. Sproat in the valuation of the sheep stock. Answers were lodged for Mr Murray Stewart's trustees in which they stated, inter alia :—" The respondents are not parties to the lease within the meaning of section 3 of the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894, and there is no agreement between the petitioners and the respondents to refer the valuation of their sheep stock to two arbiters. The obligation in the lease to take over the sheep stock did not become exigible during the period when Mr Murray Stewart was proprietor of the subjects, and said obligation was intended by both parties to the lease only to be, and could only be, prestable against the person who should be 'proprietor' of the subjects at the date when said obligation became exigible. Said obligation did not become prestable against Mr Murray Stewart, and accordingly the respondents are not liable thereunder, or parties thereto."

June 16, 1908.
Gardiners v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

Owing to the near approach of the Whitsunday term the petitioners moved for an interim appointment of an arbiter, and on 16th May 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuses the motion for the interim appointment of arbiter, and decerns: Reserves meantime all questions of expenses, and grants leave to reclaim."

The petitioners reclaimed, and as the case was not heard till 28th May 1908, being the Whitsunday term day, the petitioners no longer pressed for an interim appointment, and the parties asked the Court to dispose of the case on the merits.

Argued for the petitioners and reclaimers;—The specialty here was that this was an entailed estate, and therefore the ordinary question between heir and executor did not arise. Standing the judgment in Gillespie v. Riddell,¹ such an obligation as this did not transmit against the succeeding heir of entail, and therefore the question came to be, was it enforceable against the representatives of the granter or not enforceable against anyone, and the latter was not lightly to be presumed to be the nature of an obligation that a tenant would be willing to enter into. This was in fact a personal obligation binding on the granter, and therefore it transmitted in the ordinary way against his representatives unless there was something in the deed constituting the obligation to shew that they were excluded. There was nothing of the kind here. This question had been raised and decided in Todd v. Moncreiff and Skene,² and that decision had been followed in Fraser v. Fraser.³ These decisions were in favour of the reclaimers' contention, and were directly in point. There were also previous decisions to the same effect.⁴ The *Duke of Bedford v. Earl of Galloway's Trustee*⁵ was distinguishable, for there the word "fore-saids" was used, which was held to mean "heirs of entail," and the obligation in that case was one which ran with the lease. If this obligation had transmitted against the respondents they were bound to appoint an arbiter.⁶ There was no force in the argument that this was an obligation ad factum præstandum; it was only an obligation to pay a sum of money, the amount of which fell to be ascertained by arbitration.

Argued for the respondents;—On a true construction of this lease there was clearly no intention to impose a personal obligation on the

The word "proprietor" meant "proprietor for the time being," and in fact the parties had dealt as if this was a lease of a fee-simple estate and not of an entailed estate. The intention then being to make the landlord at the time of the lease liable to the tenant in this obligation, it was doing violence to the terms of the lease to construe it as imposing an obligation on the personal representatives of the grantor. It might be that the obligation was not binding on the succeeding heir of entail, but that was not a ground for creating an obligation which was never intended to be created. Indeed, such an unnatural obligation could never have been intended. It was natural that the landlord should take over the sheep stock; it was most unnatural that the representatives of a deceased landlord, who no longer owned the land, should take them over. If they were bound to take them over, they were equally entitled to insist on taking them over, which was an absurd construction of the lease. It was to be noted that what was sought to be enforced here was an obligation ad factum præstandum—viz., to take over the sheep stock. It was not competent to enforce such an obligation, any more than the obligations as to manure, &c., against those who no longer owned the land; if any remedy was competent to the petitioners it must take the form of an action for damages. *Todd v. Moncreiff and Skene*¹ was distinguishable on the ground that the obligation there was an existing obligation enforceable on the grantor during his lifetime, not one to arise in the future as here. *Fraser v. Fraser*² was distinguishable on the same ground. In all the cases where personal representatives had been held liable the obligation was either one necessary to make good the subject of the lease, or one enforceable against the grantor at the inception of the lease.³ The decision in the *Duke of Bedford v. Earl of Galloway*⁴ was directly in point, and ruled this case.

At advising on 16th June 1908,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In 1896 Mr Murray Stewart let to the petitioners two farms on the estate of Cally, of which he was then heir of entail in possession, for nineteen years, with a break at Whitsunday 1908, on twelve months' prior notice by either party. The said lease contained, inter alia, the following clause:—(His Lordship read the clause quoted supra).

Mr Murray Stewart died in May 1905. The respondents are his executors. He was succeeded in the entailed estate by Colonel Murray Baillie, as next heir of entail, who disentailed the estate and conveyed it to trustees, who presently hold it.

The petitioners gave due notice to the said trustees of their intention to avail themselves of the break in the lease. The said trustees intimated that they did not intend, as representing Colonel Baillie, the heir of entail, to take over the sheep stock at a valuation; and the incoming tenant of one of the farms (the other had not been again let) made a similar intimation. The petitioners then called upon the respondents to take over the stock as representing the late Mr Murray Stewart, and to appoint an arbiter June 16, 1908. for the purposes of valuation; and on their refusing to do so, the petitioners presented this application under the provisions of the Arbitration ^{Gardiners v. Stewart's Trustees.} (Scotland) Act, 1894. The petition having been presented before Whitsunday 1908, the petitioners moved for the interim appointment of an ^{Ld. President.} arbiter, but the Lord Ordinary held such a motion to be incompetent and refused it, but granted leave to reclaim. As his Lordship's interlocutor was dated 16th May 1908, it followed that Whitsunday was past before the reclaiming note came before your Lordships. The parties then concurred in asking your Lordships to decide the case on the merits instead of sending it back to the Lord Ordinary.

It must be assumed that, in accordance with the judgment recently pronounced in the case of Gillespie v. Riddell,¹ the refusal of Colonel Baillie's trustees to take over the stock was justified. We are told that that case is under appeal, but until reversed it remains the law. Nor do I see any advantage in postponing our judgment in this case to await the result of that appeal. The simple question then is—Did the late Mr Murray Stewart become personally bound in the obligation quoted?—in which case his executors must fulfil his obligation—or, did he contract qua heir of entail only?—that is to say, contract in such a way that the obligation was prestatable from him during his life, but was not exigible from either his heirs or his executors, although it was ineffectually sought to be imposed upon the heir of entail.

I do not doubt that such a bargain is a legal possibility. Indeed, all bargains, unless forbidden by positive law, or struck at on some such ground as being contrary to public policy, are possible. And there is, so far as I know, no such disability here. Nevertheless, it is, I think, clear that if a man binds himself he must make it very clear that he does not bind his representatives, for if he fails to make that clear the usual result will follow—that a man's representatives are bound by his obligations.

But further, though not actually decided—for after all each deed must be judged of according to its own terms—I am of opinion that the matter is practically settled by authority. This is not the first time that an obligation intended to fall upon heirs of entail (and if it was not intended so to fall, then cadit questio) has missed its mark. In the review which my brother Lord Kinnear gave of the decided cases in *Gillespie v. Riddell*¹ he especially mentions Todd v. Moncreiff and Skene,² which was a judgment of the House of Lords, and which decided that while the heir of entail was free the executor was bound. It was urged that that case was distinguishable from the present by the fact that the debt sought to be imposed on the future heir of entail was a debt which otherwise would have been presently exigible from the granter of the lease, for he had practically borrowed £625 from the tenant, as the tenant put up the steading instead of the landlord; whereas it is said here that the transaction was all in futuro. It is a little doubtful whether in substance the present case is truly distinguishable. For the tenant here was taken bound to buy the sheep stock at his entry from the outgoing tenant at that date; and it is not rash to

June 16, 1908. conjecture that the landlord was, or thought he was, liable to that tenant if he could not find someone else to take up the obligation. But even if Gardiners v. Stewart's Trustees. that were not so, there are at least two of the earlier cases which are approved in *Todd v. Moncreiff and Skene*¹ which cannot be distinguished in Ld. President. that way, and in which, though no decision could be pronounced, opinions to the same effect were given. I refer to *Webster v. Farquhar*² and Taylor v. Bethune.³ I am aware that the opinion that the executor is liable is, in the first of the cases, only to be found in the rubric. But the cases were advised together, and the general question was held to be the same in both. I would also refer to the case of M'Gillivray's Executors v. Masson,⁴ and especially to some portions of the opinion of Lord Deas. That was not a case of entail. The landlord had bound himself to pay to the tenant the value of meliorations at the end of the lease. He died during the currency. The executors brought an action to have themselves declared free in a question with the tenant, and the tenant was assoilized. But the remarks of Lord Deas are very valuable as shewing the distinction which falls to be made between different stipulations which may all be included in a lease. He says,—“I do not say that although an heir-at-law has entered into possession and drawn the rents, the landlord's executors must nevertheless remain under every obligation undertaken by the landlord to the end of the lease. But in this matter we must distinguish. There are obligations incumbent respectively on landlord and tenant, inseparable from the nature of the right, such as the obligation to pay rent, on the one hand, and to maintain the tenant in possession, on the other; and it may very well be that the heir and the tenant, who assume towards each other the relative position of landlord and tenant, may become alone responsible to each other in such obligations. Nor do I say that no course of dealing between the heir and the tenant will extend the same rule even to an obligation like the present.” And then he goes on,—“In entail law accordingly all leases are regarded as, strictly speaking, alienations; and agricultural leases of ordinary endurance are held excepted only because they are necessary acts of administration.” But obligations may be engrafted upon a lease (as upon any other deed) which are extrinsic to its character as a real right, and not even essential to its objects as a contract. Such obligations are not necessarily to be dealt with in the same manner with the proper and inherent subject-matters of the tack. It is said there is no case affirming the liability of executors. But there is the express authority of Lord Braxfield in Taylor v. Bethune,³ and there is no case or authority the other way. Lord Braxfield's opinion goes even to the executor's ultimate liability, and I am not to be understood to question its soundness to that extent, although it is not necessary to go into that point here. The case of Webster v. Farquhar,² decided about the same time with the case of Taylor,³ and following the case of Blythwood,⁴ goes deep into the principle. It was there held that an obligation to pay at the end of the lease for the houses built by the tenant was not prestatable from the next heir of entail, but solely from the representatives of the granter of the lease, although the houses were quite necessary for the estate, and went to increase its value. Now, this could only have been because the June 16, 1908. obligation was deemed extrinsic to the lease, for the heir in possession had full powers to grant a lease with all clauses and obligations properly incidental to a lease. Gardiners v. Stewart's Trustees.

The authority on which the respondents really relied was the Duke of Bedford.¹ That, however, does not seem to me to aid them. In the first place, it was decided strictly upon its own words of obligation, "himself and his forebears," when all the Judges held that "forebears" must, from the context, mean heirs of entail, whereas here the expression is merely "himself," without any addition of forebears to qualify or restrict it. In the second place, the question there was of warranty of what was contained in a lease as a composite contract, whereas here there is no question of warranty, but a question of who is bound to perform an obligation, with the possibility, and I think necessity, of distinguishing between different sorts of obligations, as was pointed out by Lord Deas.

My opinion, therefore, is that the petitioners are entitled to hold the respondents bound. Inasmuch, however, as the respondents have intimated through their counsel their willingness, if such is our opinion, to appoint an arbiter, I think they may be allowed to do so; and if they do so by minute, it will be unnecessary hoc statu to grant the prayer of the petition. The petitioners, however, must, I think, have their expenses.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNENR concurred.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT subsequently pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall said interlocutor: Appoint W. J. Sproat, Borgue House, Kirkcudbrightshire, to act as arbiter along with George G. B. Sproat, Boreland of Anwoth, Kirkcudbrightshire, in the reference mentioned in the petition, with the same powers as if the said arbiters had been duly nominated by the parties to the lease referred to in the petition, and decern. . . ."

VII. cap. 58), sec. 1, subsec. 1—Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment—Rescuing fellow-workman not engaged on employer's work.—Mullen, a workman, justifiably left the works in which he was employed, to obtain refreshment. While returning to his work he met a squad of his fellow-workmen, who were engaged in hauling a bogie across a public street which intersected the works. M'Ginlay, a fellow-workman of Mullen, came up, and improperly seized the rope by which the bogie was being hauled, and began to pull against the squad. In doing this M'Ginlay slipped and fell over the rope, and was in danger of being injured by the bogie. Mullen came to M'Ginlay's assistance, and succeeded in rescuing him from danger, but before he himself could get out of the way he was jammed by the bogie, and sustained severe injuries. Mullen v. Stewart & Co., Limited.
2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

OWEN MULLEN, labourer, 30 Villiers Street, Townhead, Glasgow, having claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, from Messrs D. Y. Stewart & Company, Limited, St Rollox, Glasgow, the matter was referred to the arbitration of one of the Sheriffs-substitute (A. O. M. Mackenzie) at Glasgow, who refused compensation, and at the request of the claimant stated a case for appeal.

The case set forth that the following facts were established :—
“(1) On 2d September 1907 the appellant was in the employment of the respondents in their works at St Rollox. (2) These works are situated partly on the north and partly on the south side of a public street called Charles Street. (3) A single line of rails, sunk to the level of the causeway, has been laid across the street to enable steel castings to be moved on bogies from the one part of the works to the other. (4) On entering the works on the south side of the street the rails are flanked on either side with brick retaining walls 2 feet in height, and built so near the rails that there is no room for a man between the wall on either side and a bogie passing on the rails. . . . (6) On the day mentioned the appellant was one of a squad of eight men employed in coremaking at a place in the works to the north of Charles Street, and some distance to the west of the line of rails already mentioned. (7) As the job at which the squad was engaged was not completed at 6 P.M., being the close of the ordinary day's work, the squad returned after a short interval for supper to work overtime until it was finished. . . . (10) Taking advantage of [an] interval the appellant and two of his companions left the works and went to a public-house about three or four minutes' walk distant for a glass of beer, and after spending a minute or two there they proceeded to return to the works with the intention of finishing their job. (11) In order to reach their working-place the appellant and his companions had to cross the rails already mentioned, and when they came near them they saw that a squad of men were engaged in hauling a bogie loaded with a steel casting by a rope from the north to the south side of the street. (13) The appellant and his companions were upon the pavement on the south side of the street, and were able to cross the rails in front of the men who were hauling the bogie. (14) Two other members of the appellant's squad, who had left the works at the same time and for a like purpose as the appellant and his companions, were a short distance behind them when they crossed the rails. (15) On coming to the rails one of these men, James M'Ginlay by name, seized the rope at a point between the hindmost member of the hauling squad and the bogie, and saying 'Now comes the tug of war' began to pull against the squad. (16) In doing this M'Ginlay slipped and fell across the rope, and as he could not at once regain his feet and the bogie was coming near the narrow entrance to the works on the south of the street, his position was very dangerous. (17) The appellant, whose attention had been attracted by a cry, seeing M'Ginlay's precarious situation, ran to his assistance, and having reached him just before the bogie entered the narrow way, he succeeded in hoisting him on to the top of the retaining wall on the west side of the rails at a point just inside the entrance, but before he could get clear of the rails himself the bogie jammed his left foot against the retaining wall. (18) The injuries which the appellant thus received were so serious that it was found necessary June 17, 1908.

to amputate his foot above the ankle, and he has been since the accident, and still is, totally incapacitated for work.”

Mullen v.
Stewart & Co.,
Limited.

The Sheriff-substitute found “that the appellant’s injuries were not sustained by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.”

The question of law was :—“ Whether the accident which occurred to the appellant on 2d September 1907 arose out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents ? ”

The appellant maintained that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment.¹

Counsel for the respondents was not called on.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—The Sheriff-substitute in this case has come to the conclusion that the injuries sustained by the appellant were not sustained in an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

I am of opinion that his conclusion is a sound one.

The manner in which the accident took place is clearly set forth by the Sheriff-substitute, and there is no dispute as to the facts. It occurred at a time when the appellant was outside of the works of his employers and not upon their premises. I do not think that that fact, although in certain circumstances it might be of great importance, would, in the present case, have prevented the appellant obtaining compensation if the injuries he met with had been sustained while he was engaged in his employers’ service. It appears, however, that the appellant and two comrades were returning to the works after having obtained a glass of beer during an interval in their employment, a perfectly legitimate and indeed a necessary proceeding in view of the fact that they were working overtime, and had not nearly completed the task they had in hand. While thus returning to the works the appellant suddenly saw a fellow-workman, M’Ginlay, in a position of considerable danger and went to his assistance. I need not refer to the circumstances in detail, as they are fully stated by the Sheriff-substitute. The act of the appellant was undoubtedly a very meritorious one, but the question which we have to decide is whether the injuries he sustained while carrying it out are injuries for which he can claim compensation under the Act. Mr Christie maintained that they were, and dwelt on the fact that he was acting in the interest of his employers. In a certain sense of course that is true, for it is always to the advantage of employers to have accidents and possible claims for damages prevented when possible. But the real question is, was the appellant’s act done to prevent an accident to a fellow-workman in the course of the latter’s employment, and for which he might have made a claim against his employers. The answer must clearly be in the negative. M’Ginlay was not engaged in his employers’ business; in fact it would appear that he was actually interfering with those who were engaged in carrying it on. However plucky, therefore, and praiseworthy

That being so, it follows that he is not entitled to compensation under the Act.

Mullen v.
Stewart & Co.,
Limited.

LORD LOW.—I am sure that we have all great sympathy with the appellant, who has lost one of his feet in trying to save a fellow-workman from a position of danger. But this cannot influence our judgment on the question which we have to determine, whether he has a claim for compensation under the statute. I am of opinion that he has not, and I go upon this, that in no reasonable sense could the accident be said to have arisen out of the employment. I do not think that the appellant's claim for compensation is affected by the fact that M'Ginlay was a fellow-workman. The case would, in my judgment, have been the same if M'Ginlay had been a stranger, or if instead of falling in front of a hutch belonging to the respondents he had fallen in front of a tramway car. I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the Sheriff-substitute was right.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur with your Lordships. I think that the appellant here deserves very great sympathy and very great praise. But the question we have to decide is whether the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents.

Shortly before the accident happened the appellant along with two of his companions had left the works and had gone to a public-house for a glass of beer. Now, I do not think that that fact would have disentitled the appellant to recover compensation. In the circumstances it was most reasonable to go and get some refreshment. The men had been at work all day, it was now after 9 P.M., they had one more hour's work before them, and the public-house was probably the only place they could get some refreshments. But the question still remains whether the accident arose out of his employment. I am of opinion that it did not. It arose out of an attempt by the appellant to rescue a workman named M'Ginlay from danger. If M'Ginlay had been engaged on his master's work at the time of the accident, and the appellant had also been engaged in his master's work, the case would have fallen under the case of the London and Edinburgh Shipping Company v. Brown.¹ But these are not the circumstances before us. M'Ginlay had improperly begun to play with a rope by means of which another squad of men were hauling a bogie from the north to the south side of the street, and he had fallen across the rope, so that at the time of the accident M'Ginlay had not returned to his own working place. He was not engaged on his master's work; on the contrary, he was impeding another squad of men in their work, and he was in no different position as regards the respondents than he would have been if he had been a stranger who had fallen in the street in front of a lorry or a tramway car, and it is obvious that in neither of these cases could it have been said of Mullen if he had been injured in trying to rescue M'Ginlay, that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute was right.

Process—Appointment of curator ad litem—Minor defender not appearing—Multiplepinding—Minor and Pupil.—It is not competent on the motion of a pursuer to appoint a curator ad litem to a minor defender who has not appeared in the action.

This rule applies in the case of a multiplepinding.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

In an action of multiplepinding, brought by the testamentary trustees of the late Sir James Thompson Mackenzie of Kintail and Glenmuick, Baronet, for the determination of various questions regarding the succession of the testator, and with a view to the division and administration of his estate and the exoneration of the trustees, a question arose with regard to the competency of appointing, on the motion of the pursuers, a curator ad litem to a minor who had been called as a defender, but who had not appeared or made any claim in the action.

With reference to this matter the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) reported the case to the Second Division.*

* In reporting the case the Lord Ordinary said :—" This is a case which has been more than once before your Lordships' Division—a multiplepinding under which the estate of the late Sir James Thompson Mackenzie of Glenmuick is being distributed. A question has arisen with reference to the appointment of a curator ad litem to one of the minor defenders, and I report it to your Lordships because it appears to me that a mistake has been made which I myself have no power to put right.

" The action was raised so far back as 1892 by the trustees of the late Sir James T. Mackenzie. The defenders called included the eldest son of the late Sir James T. Mackenzie, viz., the now also deceased Sir Allan Russell Mackenzie and his children. At the date in 1892 when the action was raised, two, at anyrate, of these children were pupils and were represented and their interests protected by their father as their administrator-in-law. The action has proceeded upon this footing, that the various questions which have from time to time arisen in connection with Sir James's succession have been brought before the Court by separate records made up on claims and answers within the multiplepinding. More than one of these questions has been before your Lordships, and even reached the House of Lords. During the first fifteen or sixteen years that the process has been running, the younger children of Sir Allan Mackenzie made no appearance either through their father or directly, and indeed have made no appearance to this day. Sir Allan Mackenzie himself died on 19th August 1906, and as he died intestate appointing no tutors or curators to his children, the Argued for the trustee (pursuer, real raiser, and claimant);—The position of the minor defender would not be prejudiced by the appointment of a curator ad litem. Such an appointment did not per se have the effect of making any decree thereafter pronounced a decree in foro. If the curator in the case of a pupil appeared, or in the case of a minor induced his ward to appear in the action, then the decree would be in foro, but unless the curator so appeared or induced his ward to appear, any decree pronounced would be a decree in absence notwithstanding the appointment of a curator.¹ There was therefore no reason why a curator should not be appointed here. But whatever might be the rule in an ordinary action the case of a multiplepoinding was special. It was not disputed that a defender sued by a pupil or minor without tutors or curators was entitled to have a curator appointed to such a pursuer as a condition of the result is that from 1906 onwards the younger children of Sir Allan have been without tutors and curators. The process has gone on without consideration of the change of circumstances arising from Sir Allan's death, and during the last winter session I had before me two new branches of the case, both of which involved very large interests indeed. One of them is raised on a record which is dated March 19th, 1907, and deals with the rights of parties in the residue of the estate, which amounts to about £170,000. That question was raised by a new claim for the present Sir Victor Mackenzie, the eldest surviving son of Sir Allan, who, under the settlement would have been the heir of entail of Kintail had that entail not been broken. He claims the residue, and not only claims that it has vested in him, but claims that as much of it as is free should immediately be paid over to him. He is opposed by the surviving trustee, but no appearance having been entered for the minor beneficiaries under the settlement—the beneficial contradictors, if I may so style them—the case has gone on between the present Sir Victor and the surviving trustee. I have pronounced findings in which I have, so far as the Outer-House is concerned, disposed of the question of principle on which the residue is to be distributed, and the case was continued to deal with the questions of accounting that it might be ascertained how much the residue really was, and how much of it was free from prior obligations to be paid by Sir Victor. The other case also involves a claim by Sir Victor as in the position of a person who would have been heir of entail to an English estate, in which a large sum of money was directed to be invested for the purpose of a trust settlement. The claim is to the entailed money. The persons interested are Sir Victor, the present baronet, and certain substitutes. Here again, there being no appearance for anybody else, the case has proceeded between Sir Victor and the trustee. That case is in the position of the parties having been ordered, with the assistance of Professor Rankine, to adjust a case for the English Courts.

“ My last interlocutors in both these cases were dated 26th February 1908. At that stage the trustee, acting I have no doubt on advice and with the object of assisting to protect, as he thought, the minor beneficiaries, made an application in which he stated that Allan Keith Mackenzie and Eric Dighton Mackenzie, the second and third surviving sons of the late Sir Allan Mackenzie, were still in minority, and that in consequence of the death of their father, he considered it proper that a curator ad litem should be appointed to them, to protect their interests in the present process, and therefore craved the Court to make such appointment.

“ Upon that request by the trustee, Lord Salvesen, who was acting on action being allowed to proceed at his instance. The pursuer and real raiser in an action of multiplepinding and exoneration was really in the position of defender against the claims of all the parties called. The trustee therefore in any view was entitled to have a curator ad litem appointed to this minor defender so that she might get a good discharge. The curator ad litem had therefore been competently and properly appointed, and if the present curator was discharged another should be appointed in his place. June 17, 1908.

Argued by counsel for the curator ad litem;—The appointment of the curator ad litem should never have been made. It was incompetent at the instance of a pursuer to appoint a curator ad litem to a pupil who had not appeared in the action.¹ The same rule applied in the case of a minor.² The fact that the action was a multiplepinding made no difference. A person who had been called as a defender in a multiplepinding, but had not appeared in the action, my behalf at a time when I was absent from Court, pronounced an interlocutor, treating it, as I have no doubt I should have done myself, if incidentally brought before me, as a mere matter of form, appointing John Cowan, Esq., advocate, Edinburgh, to be curator ad litem to these two minors. Mr Cowan accepted the office and acted. But he has now presented a minute in the Outer-House which has led me to make this report.

"After narrating his appointment, the curator says he instructed an agent to prepare a memorial to the Right Honourable Charles Scott Dickson, K.C., for the purpose of, inter alia, obtaining his opinion as to whether he should advise his wards to reclaim against the interlocutors to which I have referred; that on 6th April he wrote to both Allan Keith Mackenzie and Eric Dighton Mackenzie intimating his appointment, explaining the position of matters, and stating the steps already taken in their interest; and that on the 10th April he received a letter (undated) from the said Allan Keith Mackenzie intimating that he did not desire an appeal to be taken. This letter is produced. The said Allan Keith Mackenzie, however, attained majority a few days afterwards, on 26th April 1908, and the curator's duties, if he any had, in regard to him were thus ended. On the 29th of April 1908 the curator also received a letter from the said Eric Dighton Mackenzie (that is, the younger boy), who is still under seventeen years of age, and at Eton College, intimating that he also did not desire any appeal to be taken. That letter is also produced. On the 14th May he received Mr Dickson's opinion. The opinion shortly stated was to the effect that it was advisable to reclaim, and that it was the duty of the minuter to have a personal interview with his ward. On the same date the curator wrote to the said Eric Dighton Mackenzie, enclosing a copy of Mr Dickson's opinion and requesting a personal interview. On 22d May 1908 an interview between the curator ad litem and his ward took place in Edinburgh. At the said interview the curator explained the case and the effect of the interlocutor as fully as possible to his ward. He strongly urged the ward to concur with him in taking such steps as might be necessary for obtaining the judgment of the Inner-House. The ward, however, refused his concurrence. The minuter then states that he has been advised that without the ward's concurrence it is impossible for him to take any effective steps to protect further the ward's interest, and in these circumstances he desires to be relieved from the office of curator ad litem to the said Eric Dighton Mackenzie, and he craves the Court accordingly.

"Now, the reason that I have reported the matter to your Lordships is that I feel that inadvertently a mistake was made in the Court's interfering was not in the position of a pursuer. The appointment of the curator ad litem in this case was not made in the interest of the minor, but in the interest of the trustee and of Sir Victor Mackenzie, with the object of putting the minor in a worse position if at a future date he desired to re-open the questions dealt with in this multiplepinding. The present curator should therefore be discharged, and no new curator should be appointed.

At advising on 17th June 1908,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question which has been reported upon to this Division by the Lord Ordinary is whether an appointment of a curator which was made to certain minors was one which should not in the circumstances have been made. The circumstances in which the question arises are these: In 1892 an action of multiplepinding and exoneration was at all to appoint a curator to these two minors, but I feel also that if I am wrong in that, while it may be my duty at his request to relieve the curator, Mr Cowan, it would be my duty to appoint someone else in Mr Cowan's place, and I therefore desire your Lordships' instructions in the matter.

"My reason for holding that no such step should have been taken is founded upon the position as litigants of pupils and minors. In the case of Sinclair, which your Lordships will find reported in 6 S. 336, the matter was very solemnly considered by the whole Court in the matter of a pupil, and your Lordships will find upon page 338 the law very carefully laid down in the opinion of eight of the consulted Judges to the effect that where a pupil is a pursuer the opposite party may require that he be properly represented or that the action do not go on, but that where a pupil is a defender no one can compel him to come into Court, and that the appointment of a curator ad litem is truly an interference to compel the pupil to come into Court, so that a judgment might be pronounced against him on a different footing from that on which it would be pronounced against him were he left to himself.

"That authority has been frequently referred to, and your Lordships will find a very good example in the case of Grieve, 9 Macph. 582, of the result of proceeding against a pupil who had no tutor, and the position in which such pupil is entitled to be placed. It illustrates the position in which a pupil ought to find himself when he becomes major where he has been brought into Court and has not appeared, and which would be interfered with by the appointment of a curator ad litem at the instance of any pursuer.

"I do not find—and counsel will no doubt assist your Lordships—any case which has dealt with the matter from the point of view of a minor in the same circumstances as those of the pupil in Sinclair's case. But it appears to me that the same principles apply, and if it would be erroneous practice to compel a pupil to come into Court, it would be equally improper to compel a minor to come into Court by the appointment to him of a curator ad litem.

"I think the only case that counsel referred me to in which the position of a minor is concerned is the case of M'Conochie, 9 D. 791, but that was the case of a minor pursuer. The father refused to concur in the action. It was held that as the minor was a pursuer in that case, and was entitled to have her case brought before the Court, a curator ad litem should be appointed for the purpose of the action in consequence of the father's refusal to protect her interests.

"In these circumstances I have reported the matter to your Lordships, and the only other question is this: This is an action of multiplepinding raised in reference to the very large estate of the late Sir James Thompson June 17, 1908. Mackenzie, Baronet, who died in August 1890. There has been protracted procedure in the case. Sir Allan Russell Mackenzie and his children were called. For many years his children did not appear in the proceedings, and up to the present time the younger children have not entered appearance. He died in 1896, and did not appoint any tutors or curators to his children.

Mackenzie's
Trustee v.
Mackenzie.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

The case has reached the stage of the rights of parties in the residue having to be settled. The eldest son of Sir Allan, Sir Victor, claims the whole residue, which is resisted by the trustee. After certain procedure had taken place the trustee took steps to have a curator ad litem appointed to the other sons of Sir Allan, who were in minority. The appointment was made by Lord Salvesen, who was acting for Lord Johnston when he was absent from Court because of indisposition.

The curator appointed applied to be relieved of office in respect that Mr Allan Keith Mackenzie and Mr Eric Dighton Mackenzie, his two wards, refused to allow him to reclaim against an interlocutor, as to which advice of counsel had been taken. Mr Allan having become major the curatory fell as regarded him. As regards Eric, the curator on the advice of counsel had a personal interview with him, when he found him fixed in his determination not to give his name to a reclaiming note. In these circumstances the curator desires to be relieved of office.

That being the present position of matters the Lord Ordinary desires the instruction of the Court. He is prepared to relieve the present curator, but he feels that if it was right to appoint a curator at all, then the question of the appointment of another gentleman to be curator would at once arise.

The Lord Ordinary's difficulty is that he has strong doubt whether, in the circumstances, any appointment should have been made. The point in question is, Can a person who is not major be compelled against his will to compare as a defender in an action? On that question I have come to the conclusion that the view of the Lord Ordinary is sound. In the case of —not an ordinary action—and it was maintained to me by the counsel for the trustee that a multiplepinding must be treated on a different footing from an ordinary action, because it involved the exoneration of the pursuer, and that the pursuer was entitled to compel everyone to attend for their interest, for the purpose of enabling him to get his exoneration. I venture to think that this is a consideration which ought not to vary the result. If in an ordinary action a curator should not be appointed, I think in a multiplepinding he should not be appointed either. As to the circumstance of one of the defenders being a minor preventing the trustee getting his exoneration on distributing the funds, that is a question between them, just as much as if they were parties to an ordinary action, and it seems to me that the same principle applies as in an ordinary action.

“Lastly, my reason for reporting the question is that it appears to me to be a matter with which I cannot very well deal. The interlocutor, though granted by Lord Salvesen, is really my interlocutor, for it was signed by him for me, and I cannot recall my own interlocutor. I therefore report it to your Lordships, because it is not a question on the merits—it is a question of putting right an administrative, not a contentious matter in the suit. In these circumstances, I ask your Lordships to deal with the matter, as your Lordships may be advised, either by disposing of it yourselves, or by remitting to me with instructions to do what your Lordships deem proper.”

June 17, 1908. *Sinclair*¹ the question arose very sharply, and was decided by a full Bench. And this is confirmed by the subsequent case of Grieve.² The principle seems to be that the rights and interests of a young person are not to be affected by an action raised against him in any way which may affect his asserting any right he may have when he comes of age to act for himself. As it is expressed in the Lord Ordinary's judgment in Calderhead v. Fyfe,³ "The Judge has no power . . . to exercise any jurisdiction over an absent defender. Hence he cannot appoint a curator for him." These were cases of pupils, but I see no difference in principle in the case of a minor. He of course is in one respect in a different position from a pupil, because he is not held to be incapable of contracting, but is only protected in doing so. But if he does not choose to become a defender in proceedings, then I cannot see why the opposing party should be entitled to force his hand by getting a curator ad litem appointed to him, he having no desire to have anything to do with the litigation.

Mackenzie's
Trustee v.
Mackenzie.

Lord Justice-
Clerk.

I agree with the view expressed by the Lord Ordinary in reporting the case that the fact that the present proceedings are in the form of a multiplepinding should not make any difference as to the result. The rights of the minor to be affected by the proceedings are just such rights as could be dealt with in an ordinary action. It is a mere accident that the existence of double distress leads to the form of the case being a multiplepinding, which is after all a conglomeration of actions. The position of a party in a multiplepinding is that he defends against the claims of other litigants so as not to have his own claims defeated.

I am therefore of opinion that a curator should not have been appointed to this minor, who is not, and refuses to be, a litigant in the cause. That he is not a pursuer is plain, for he is not a party to the litigation at all. As a defender he cannot be dealt with by the Court as having any power over him, and those who are in Court have no right to move for a curator to be appointed to him, and the Court cannot grant the appointment.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING, LORD LOW, and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary with instructions to recall the appointment of Mr John Cowan, advocate, as curator ad litem to the minors Allan Keith Mackenzie and Eric Dighton Mackenzie, of 11th March 1908, and with power to the said Lord Ordinary to dispose of the expenses incurred in the Inner-House, as also the remuneration of, and the expenses incurred by, the said curator ad litem, and thereafter to proceed as accords."

M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees, Jan. 16, 1891, 18 R. 417, and Wallace v. Braid, Feb. 16, 1899, 1 F. 575, distinguished.

IN an action of divorce at the instance of John Patterson Hutchison against his wife, Mrs Agnes F. Stevenson or Hutchison, the Lord Ordinary (Guthrie), on 26th May 1908, pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defender.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Guthrie.

On 16th June (the twenty-first day after the date of the interlocutor), the pursuer presented a reclaiming note. Of the copies of the reclaiming note placed in the boxes only a small number had a copy of the record attached, and when the principal copy of the reclaiming note with record attached was presented to the boxing clerk, he refused to certify it as boxed, on the ground that it was not conform to the copies placed in the boxes. On the record being detached from the reclaiming note he certified the latter as boxed, and it, together with a separate copy of the record uncertified, was thereafter lodged with, and received by, the Clerk of Court.

When the case appeared in Single-Bills, counsel for the reclaiming, in moving the case to the roll, stated that he thought it proper to draw the attention of the Court to the fact that the regular number of copies of the record had not been boxed, although enough had been tendered to the boxing-clerk for the use of the Judges of the Division.* In explanation of the failure to box the record counsel stated that the reclaiming had changed his agent during the currency of the reclaiming days, that his original agent had omitted, after the closing of the record, to have a sufficient number of copies of the record printed, as was the usual practice, in case they should be required for the purpose of a reclaiming note, that the new agent, relying on a sufficient

* The Court of Session Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 18, enacts:—"When any interlocutor shall have been pronounced by the Lord Ordinary either of the parties dissatisfied therewith shall be entitled to apply for a review of it to the Inner-House . . . provided that such party shall, within twenty-one days from the date of the interlocutor, print and put into the boxes appointed for receiving the papers to be perused by the Judges a note reciting the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor . . . and if the interlocutor has been pronounced without cases the party so applying shall, along with his note as above directed, put into the boxes printed copies of the record authenticated as before."

The Act of Sederunt, 11th July 1828, sec. 77, directs that reclaiming notes shall first be moved as Single-Bills, and sent to the roll—"Provided always that such notes, if reclaiming against an Outer-House interlocutor, shall not be received unless there be appended thereto copies of the mutual cases, if any, and of the papers authenticated as the record in terms of the statute, if the record has been closed; and also copies of the letters of suspension or advocacy, and of the summons with amendment, if any, and defences . . ."

June 17, 1908. number of copies being in existence, had only discovered that they were not on presenting the reclaiming note, when it was too late to have them reprinted, the type having been taken down.¹

Hutchison v.
Hutchison.

Counsel for the respondent, on being asked by the Court if he pressed the objection to the competency of the reclaiming note, referred to the cases of Burns v. Waddell & Son,² and Wallace v. Braid,³ to shew that, whether he pleaded the objection or not, the omission to box the records was fatal to the competency of the reclaiming note.

LORD M'LAREN referred to section 16 of the Court of Session Act, 1808.*

LORD PRESIDENT.—The point here raised is an unusual one. This is an ordinary twenty-one days' interlocutor reclaiming note, and it appears that although the reclaiming note was tendered on the last of the reclaiming days with a copy of the closed record attached to it, the boxing-clerk quite properly refused to certify it as having been boxed, since the reclaiming notes which had been put into the boxes did not have copies of the record attached to them. There is no question that ordinarily this would be fatal, but here the circumstances are peculiar—a change of agency took place during the currency of the reclaiming days. The second agent quite naturally assumed that the printing of the record had been carried on in the usual way. At the lodging of the reclaiming note he sent for extra copies, but discovered that the first agent had not a sufficient number, that the printer had none, and that the original number printed had been only thirty instead of sixty, with the result that there was a shortage for boxing to the Inner-House, and the type had been taken down. We were referred to the cases of *M'Evoy v. Braes' Trustees*⁴ and Wallace v. Braid,³ which embrace both Divisions of the Inner-House. There is no doubt that those cases are binding upon us, but in neither of them was there any attempt to shew that the mistakes which arose were really beyond the control of the agent.

Lord M'Laren has pointed out that under section 16 of the Court of Session Act of 1808, if the reclaiming days have from mistake or inadvertency expired, it is competent to submit the interlocutor to review by petition, and it seems that this is a case where if this form were gone through we could reponne the reclaimer. That being so, we would not think nowadays of compelling a party to go through a mere form, so I propose that we should allow the reclaiming note to be received, the party

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship. I think we have to consider the question here as being under precisely the same conditions as if a petition had been presented under section 16 of the Court of Session Act of 1808, and that we should only give relief if an excusable mistake has been made. I think that the mistake was, in the peculiar circumstances, excusable, but this decision is no encouragement to neglect precise rules of procedure.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD PEARSON was absent.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency of the re-claiming note.

THOMAS OGILVIE Senior, Appellant.—D.-F. Campbell—W. Mitchell. No. 146.
INLAND REVENUE, Respondents.—Sol.-Gen. Ure—Munro. —

*Revenue—Income-Tax—Foreign Possessions—Business carried on abroad by person residing in United Kingdom—Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, Schedule D—Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, Cases I. and V.—*O., a British subject resident in Aberdeen, was the sole partner of the firm of O. & Sons, carrying on business in Toronto, Canada. O. carried on the business by managers in Toronto, who were required to render to him a weekly statement of all the transactions. O. had the sole right to manage and to control every department, and was alone entitled to the profits, and alone liable for the debts.

O. having been assessed for income-tax under Schedule D, Case I., upon the whole profits of his business in Canada, appealed, contending that the Canadian business being entirely conducted by the managers there without his interference it was to be regarded as a foreign possession liable to income-tax only on the profits received in this country under Case V.

Held that the business was carried on by O. in the United Kingdom, and that he was liable to be assessed on the whole profits of the business under Case I. of Schedule D.

THOMAS OGILVIE senior, residing at Keppelstone, Aberdeen, the 2^d Division, sole partner of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons, woollen warehousemen, 72 Exchequer and 74 Bay Street, Toronto, Canada, appealed to the Commissioners Cause. for the General Purposes of the Income-Tax Acts for the county of Aberdeen against an assessment for the year ended 5th April 1907 of £ made on him under Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act in respect of the profits of the business of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons. The assessment was made under authority of the Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), sec. 100, Schedule D, First Case; the Income-

Ogilvie v.
Inland
Revenue.

The following facts were admitted:—" . . . (2) That in 1904 Thomas Ogilvie senior acquired the business of woollen warehousemen carried on at 72 and 74 Bay Street, Toronto, Canada, and has since by himself, and for his own behoof, continued and carried on said business under the firm name or style of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons. . . . * The Income-Tax Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict. cap. 34), sec. 2, Schedule D, imposes income-tax—"For and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and for and in respect of the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in the United Kingdom, from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation, whether the same shall be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and to be charged for every twenty shillings of the annual amount of such profits and gains."

Sec. 5 enacts that the duties granted by the Act shall be raised, levied and collected under the regulations and provisions of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35 (Income-Tax Act, 1842).

The Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35), enacts:—

Sec. 100. "The duties hereby granted contained in the schedule marked (D) shall be assessed and charged under the following rules, which rules shall be deemed and construed to be a part of this Act, and to refer to the said last-mentioned duties, as if the same had been inserted under a special enactment. . . .

"Schedule D. . . . Rules for ascertaining the said last-mentioned duties in the particular cases herein mentioned.

"First Case.—Duties to be charged in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule to this Act.

"Rules: First, Computation of Duty on Trade.—The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern upon a fair and just average of three years ending on such day of the year immediately preceding the year of assessment on which the accounts of the said trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern shall have been usually made up. . . .

"Fifth Case.—The duty to be charged in respect of possessions . . . in the British plantations in America or in any other of Her Majesty's dominions out of Great Britain [now the United Kingdom] and foreign possessions. The duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the actual sums annually received in Great Britain [now the United Kingdom; see sec. 5 of the Act of 1853] . . . computing the same on an average of the three preceding years, as directed in the First Case. . . ."

Sec. 39. "No person who shall on or after the passing of this Act actually be in Great Britain [now the United Kingdom] for some temporary purpose only and not with any view or intent of establishing his residence therein, and who shall not actually have resided in Great Britain [now the United Kingdom] at one time or several times for a period equal in the whole to six months in any one year, shall be charged with the said duties mentioned in Schedule D as a person residing in Great Britain [now the United Kingdom] in respect of the profits or gains received from or out of any possessions in . . . any other of Her Majesty's dominions for any foreign possessions."

firm name or style of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons at 72 and 74 Bay Street, Toronto, aforesaid, and is alone entitled to the profits and liable in the losses of and in connection with said business. (5) That said business of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons . . . is carried on for and on behalf of the said Thomas Ogilvie by managers in accordance with agreement with them produced . . . * Said managers report state of trade and progress of business from time to time to the said Thomas Ogilvie senior. (6) The said managers—Messrs Canavan and Hire—do the whole buying and selling for the Canadian business, sending to this country statements of sales, &c., as provided in Article 3 of the agreement with them. (7) The whole transactions of the Canadian firm are recorded in books kept in Canada, and the accounts are audited annually, and yearly balance-sheets made up by auditors in Canada. . . . (9) The whole capital of the Canadian business is supplied by Mr Ogilvie. (10) No portion of the profits of the Canadian business has been remitted to this country.”

On 5th September 1907 the Commissioners found—“(1) That the undertaking or business of woollen warehousemen carried on at 72 and 74 Bay Street, Toronto, Canada, under the firm name or style of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons is the sole property of Thomas Ogilvie senior, residing at Kepplestone, Aberdeen, Scotland; (2) That the said Thomas Ogilvie is by himself the sole trader carrying on business under said firm name or style of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons, and vested with the sole right to manage and control every department of its affairs, and is alone entitled to the profits and liable in the losses of and in connection with said business; (3) That the managers and other employees associated and employed in the carrying on of said business of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons have no power to act in the carrying on of the trade apart from the authority express or implied which they hold from the said Thomas Ogilvie senior; and (4) that the said Thomas Ogilvie & Sons and Thomas Ogilvie, the sole partner thereof, are bound and liable to account to the Revenue for the profits earned by them, and that said profits are liable to assessment for income-tax purposes under the Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, Case I., and the Income-Tax Act, 1853, Schedule D. Accordingly the Commissioners refused the appeal, and remitted to the parties to adjust the figures liable to assessment.”

The appellant required the Commissioners to state a case for the opinion of the Court, which they did, setting forth the facts given above. The cause was heard before the Second Division on 3d and 4th June 1908.

Argued for the appellant;—The question was whether the assessment was to be made on the whole profits of the business under Case I. of Schedule D,¹ or only on the profits received in the United Kingdom under Case V. Case I. was an extremely general enactment, and must give way to the more specific enactment of Case V. if that were applicable. If, therefore, the business was a possession in His Majesty's dominions out of the United Kingdom the assessment must be made under Case V. No doubt the appellant was the sole

June 17, 1908. owner of the business and was resident in Scotland. But he did not interfere with the conduct of the business. The whole trading operations were carried out by the managers in Canada; the books were kept there; and the audit took place there. The agreement between the appellant and the managers was not an ordinary contract of service. The managers were engaged for five years; they were partly remunerated by commission; and the amount of the profits was determined not by the appellant but by the auditor. In these circumstances, it was plain that the business was wholly carried on in Canada. It was therefore a colonial possession within the meaning of Case V., and the assessment must be made under that Case, and not under Case I.¹ The respondents could not succeed unless the facts that the appellant was the owner of the business and was resident in Scotland were conclusive. That contention was unsound.² No doubt the owner of the business had the control over it in the sense that he could bring it to an end. But in determining where the business was carried on, the true criterion was not ownership but management,³ and in the present case it was clear that the management was in Canada. The contention that ownership was conclusive involved unreasonable consequences in the case of foreigners temporarily resident in this country. Under section 39 of the Income-Tax Act, 1842,⁴ a foreigner temporarily resident here was exempted from the duties imposed by Schedule D in respect of profits derived from foreign possessions. Now, under Case V. profits derived from foreign possessions were assessable only in so far as they were received in the United Kingdom. If foreign possessions did not include a business exclusively carried on abroad, it followed that a foreigner temporarily resident here would be liable to pay income-tax on the whole profits derived by him from a business carried on in his own country, whether they were received in the United Kingdom or not. It was unreasonable to suppose that the foreigner should be exempted from taxation in respect of investment profits received in this country and yet should be assessed on trade profits which were not received here, and a construction involving this result should be rejected. The cases of the *San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Co., Limited, v. Carter*⁵ and *De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited, v. Howe*⁶ were distinguishable. In these cases it was held that the business was managed in the United Kingdom. In *Lloyd v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue*⁷ the only question raised was whether the party assessed was resident in this country. That case therefore had no application to the present.

Argued for the respondents;—The appellant was the sole owner of the business, and was resident in Scotland. Accordingly Case I. applied, and the appellant was assessable on the whole profits of the business.⁸ Further, the appellant could not succeed unless the business were wholly carried on abroad. If it were partially carried on June 17, 1908. in the United Kingdom he was assessable on the whole profits.¹ Now, the appellant was the sole owner of the business; he had provided the whole capital; the managers were his servants, and had no authority to carry on the business apart from that which they derived from him; he could bring the business to an end at any time; and the Commissioners had found that he was the sole trader. In these circumstances it was clear that the control of the business remained with the appellant in this country, and that was quite inconsistent with the idea that the business was exclusively carried on abroad. It followed that the assessment must be made under Case I., not under Case V.² *Colquhoun v. Brooks*³ was distinguishable. There the party assessed was a sleeping partner in a business wholly carried on in Australia. He had no control over the business, and there was no machinery for estimating the profits which remained in Australia, because accounts were not sent home. It was on the last point that the decision mainly turned, and that difficulty was not present here. *Kodak Limited v. Clark*⁴ was a case where a British company held a large majority of the shares of an American company. That was plainly a case of an investment, and therefore fell under Case V., and did not fall under Case I.

At advising,—

LORD STORMONT-DARLING.—This case is not complicated by any question as to the trade or business carried on at Toronto being a trade or business carried on by a partnership or company, or by any question as to where the residence of the firm or company, if there were one, should be held to be. It is the case of Thomas Ogilvie senior, who is declared by the findings of the Commissioners to be “by himself the sole trader, carrying on business under the said firm name or style of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons, and vested with the sole right to manage and control every department of its affairs, and alone entitled to the profits and liable in the losses of and in connection with said business.” That seems to me to be enough for the decision of the case in favour of the Crown, and I am therefore of opinion that the determination of the Commissioners is right, and that the appeal ought to be refused.

It is settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in the San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Company, Limited,⁵ that “where a trade is carried on either wholly in the United Kingdom, or partly within and partly outside it, and profits accrue therefrom to a person or a corporation residing in the United Kingdom” (in this case the profits accrue to a person residing in Aberdeen), “the assessment for income-tax falls under the first case of Schedule D of 5 and 6 Vict. cap. 35, section 100, and does not fall under June 17, 1908. the fifth case, and the duty is to be computed upon the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of the trade, and not only upon the actual sums received in the United Kingdom." Therefore the question is whether the trade is carried on either wholly in the United Kingdom, or partly within and partly outside it. And it is enough for the view that the assessment for income-tax falls under the first case and not under the fifth, if the necessary inference from the facts is that the trade is carried on partly in the United Kingdom and partly outside it. In the San Paulo case¹ the Lord Chancellor (Halsbury), at p. 38, and Lord Watson, at p. 41, both held that a great deal of the trade was carried on in Brazil, where the railway was made, and had to be managed and worked (as, indeed, the memorandum of association itself required), but both of the noble and learned Lords, while admitting that these facts determined in a sense the locality of the trade, were equally clear that they did not determine, or even aid in determining, where the "head and brain of the trading adventure" were situated, and they had no difficulty in holding that these were to be found in London, and in rejecting the contention that the particular localities in which debts were incurred to the company or were paid to its agents were of any consequence in ascertaining by whom its trade was carried on.

Ogilvie v.
Inland
Revenue.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

Now, apply this judgment to the case in hand, and what do you find? The "head and brain of the trading adventure" in Toronto are undoubtedly to be found in Aberdeen, where Mr Thomas Ogilvie senior resides, to which weekly statements of the transactions of the Toronto business in all its departments are sent (App. No. I, p. 9 of the case), and where the sole right to manage and control every department of its affairs is centred. Mr Ogilvie senior is Board of Directors and Company all in one, for the case states that "the managers and other employees associated and employed in the carrying on of said business of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons have no power to act in the carrying on of the trade apart from the authority, express or implied, which they hold from the said Thomas Ogilvie senior."

It is said that, although all this may be true, although Mr Thomas Ogilvie senior may have in theory the absolute control of the business or trade locally situated in Toronto, since it is carried on for his sole benefit, and he could do with it what he likes, with no one to say him nay, yet not a single instance has ever occurred in which he has, as matter of fact, attempted to exercise his control, or to give directions even about the smallest detail. Yet the right of control is there all the time, and might be exercised at any moment. It is a matter, as it seems to me, of power and right, and not of the actual exercise of right or power. The necessary inference from forbearance to exercise the right of control is that the man who possesses it is content for the time with the way in which his wishes are being carried out, and his interests attended to by his employees. "He cannot, according to the rule established in Colquhoun v. Brooks,² escape from liability under the first case, unless he is able to shew that no part of the trade is carried on within the United Kingdom, or, what comes to precisely the same thing, that the trade is exclusively carried on in a country or countries outside the United Kingdom, whether subject to Her Majesty or not"—so said Lord Watson at p. 40 of the San Paulo case.¹ It is only when the trade is carried on exclusively abroad that the question so anxiously discussed about "foreign possessions" in *Colquhoun v. Brooks*² has any significance.

Ogilvie v.
Inland
Revenue.

It remains to notice in passing the reservation (for it is no more than a reservation) contained in Lord Davey's opinion at p. 43 of the San Paulo case,¹ thus:—"Whether it would be possible in any case for a sole owner of a foreign business having exclusive power of control over it, but resident in this country, successfully to maintain that he did not carry on a business here, it is unnecessary to say. That question, which is probably one of fact, will be dealt with when it arises according to the circumstances of the case." The form in which the question is put rather suggests the reply. I am of opinion that the question which Lord Davey adumbrated arises for decision here, and that it should be answered for the Crown.

LdStormonth-
Darling.

LORD LOW concurred.

LORD ARDWALL.—I concur generally in the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling, and propose only to touch on a ground regarding which I have some difficulty, namely, the question of whether the mere possession of "full control" by a person in this country brings the business over which such control exists within the category of "a business carried on partly in this country." I do not think it is necessary to decide this question, and desire to reserve my opinion upon it. The second finding in fact stated by the Commissioners, which has been quoted in full by Lord Stormonth-Darling, taken along with the third finding of the Commissioners to the effect that "the managers and other employees associated and employed in the carrying on of said business of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons have no power to act in the carrying on of the trade apart from the authority, express or implied, which they hold from the said Thomas Ogilvie senior," and the fact that Thomas Ogilvie senior resides in Scotland, appear to me, in view of the provisions of the statutes and the decided cases, to settle the question put to us in the respondent's favour, because it appears that it is the firm of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons, resident in Scotland, who carry on the business in question by means of "salesmen and agents" at their "branch" (as they call it) in Canada. There is accordingly no such question regarding "control" as arose in the case of Kodak Limited v. Clark,³ where although a British Company had in a sense the control of an American Company by reason of owning 98 per cent of the American Company's shares, yet because the American Company was a separate company with different interests and entirely distinct and separate management from the British Company, the American Company was held not to be partly carried on in this country—nor is *Colquhoun's*² case an authority for the present, where the active partners were in Australia, and a sleeping partner, possessing some powers of control, but exercising none, lived in this country. In such cases, and in several other reported cases, it became a question of importance whether, although a power of control existed to some effects, it was ever so exercised

June 17, 1908. as to constitute a "carrying on" of the business in this country. In the present case, however, not the control merely but the whole command and management of the Canadian business rests with the "firm" of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons, which is resident in Scotland. The "salesmen and agents" Lord Ardwall. in Canada have no powers except what are delegated to them, expressly or impliedly, by the said "firm"—that is, by Thomas Ogilvie senior.

I am accordingly constrained to hold that the business of Thomas Ogilvie & Sons, of which the appellant is the sole partner, is partly carried on in this country, and that the present case falls under Case I. of Schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred with Lord Stormonth-Darling.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners, and decerned.

Beaton v.
Corporation of
Glasgow.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Slander—Slander by Servant—Liability of Master—Scope of Employment—Relevancy.—Murray, the Superintendent of the Gorbals Public Baths, Glasgow, employed by the Corporation of Glasgow, sent a report to Thomson, the General Manager of the Public Baths, Glasgow, also employed by the Corporation, commenting adversely on the conduct of Beaton, a swimming instructor at the Gorbals Baths, employed by the School Board of Glasgow. Thomson, the General Manager, sent the report to the School Board of Glasgow.

In an action of damages raised by Beaton against the Corporation the pursuer averred that Thomson, "in the execution of his duty as General Manager of the Public Baths," had forwarded the report to the Glasgow School Board, who employed Beaton to teach swimming, and that the report was slanderous, and caused the School Board to dismiss him. "In writing and dispatching the said report the said Robert A. Murray and William Thomson acted within the scope of their authority from the defenders, and in the discharge of their duties as servants of the defenders, and in the supposed furtherance of the interests of the defenders."

The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant, and that the defenders were not responsible for the acts of their servants "outwith the scope of their duties and authority."

Held (aff. judgment of Lord Mackenzie) that prima facie it was no part of the duty of the general manager of baths to make communications on behalf of the Corporation to the School Board, that it was not enough to aver generally that the report was forwarded by the general manager "in the execution of his duty," and that in the absence of any averment that he had special authority to act as he did, the action was irrelevant.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Mac-
kenzie.

THE CORPORATION OF GLASGOW have the control and administration of the public baths of Glasgow under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.

In 1907 William Thomson was general manager of the Corporation Baths, and Robert A. Murray was superintendent of the Gorbals Baths.

In May 1907 Murray, the superintendent of the Gorbals Baths, being dissatisfied with the conduct of Daniel Beaton, a swimming instructor appointed by the School Board of Glasgow, sent a written report on the subject to Thomson, the general manager, who sent the report to the School Board.

June 17, 1908.
Beaton v.
Corporation of
Glasgow.

On 30th October 1907 Daniel Beaton raised an action against the Corporation of Glasgow, concluding for £1000 as damages for alleged slander.

The summons also contained conclusions for interdict and reduction, to which it is unnecessary to refer.

The pursuer averred :—(Cond. 7) "On or about 1st May 1907 the said Robert A. Murray, as superintendent of the said Gorbals Baths, delivered to the said William Thomson, as general manager of the public baths, a written report, in the following terms :—' Board school boys had large pond to-day. Right away at 10 o'clock 20 lads came in. Our head bathman was at the door to control them, and asked them to take dressing-boxes in rotation, but Mr Beaton interfered, and shouted to the boys, "spread yourselves, lads," with the result that 20 boys were all over the place, and he had disorder at the very start of the day. . . . In short, it looks like a repeat of last summer's performance, as Mr Beaton is allowing or winking at all regulations, and playing on his position as instructor, and if he is allowed to go on as he has begun, I must be freed of all responsibility as to the conduct of the place.' The said report was forwarded by the said William Thomson in the execution of his duty as general manager of the public baths to the Clerk of the Glasgow School Board, who employed the pursuer as swimming instructor, as before mentioned, and particularly employed him to teach swimming at the Gorbals Baths. The statements in the said report are of and concerning the pursuer, and they are false, and were intended to prejudice the pursuer, and otherwise to damage him in the eyes of the Glasgow School Board, with the view of bringing about his dismissal from their employment. The statements contained in said report are slanderous, and the said Robert A. Murray in writing and handing over the same, and the said William Thomson in dispatching the same, represented, and intended to represent, that the pursuer had been guilty of . . . contravention of the bye-laws, and of continued misconduct in, and misuse of, his position as an instructor, and was unfit to occupy the position and discharge the duties of a swimming instructor. The said Robert A. Murray and William Thomson were aware of the falsity of the charge, but nevertheless maliciously, and without probable or any cause, preferred it against the pursuer, with the object of persuading the said School Board to dismiss him from their employment, which in consequence thereof, and of the illegal actings of the defenders . . . they did. In writing and dispatching the said report the said Robert A. Murray and William Thomson acted within the scope of their authority from the defenders, and in the discharge of their duties as servants of the defenders, and in the supposed furtherance of the interests of the defenders."

The pursuer pleaded ;—(5) The defenders having libelled the pursuer in his character and in his reputation as a swimming instructor as condescended on, and the pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage thereby, he is entitled to reparation therefor.

The defenders in answer stated :—"Believed to be true that in May 1907 the said Robert A. Murray wrote a letter, referred to above as a report, to the said William Thomson in the terms quoted, and that June 17, 1908.—the said William Thomson forwarded it to the Clerk of the Glasgow School Board. Explained that such letter was not known to or authorised by the defenders, and that in forwarding it to the Clerk of the Glasgow School Board the said William Thomson was acting out-with the scope of his duties as General Manager of the Public Baths. The said letter is referred to.”

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed. (7) The defenders, not being responsible for any actings of their said servants outwith the scope of their duties and authority, are not liable for the loss or damage, if any, thereby caused to the pursuer.

On 19th March 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Mackenzie) pronounced this interlocutor:—“ Allows the parties a proof of their averments other than the averments relating to the question of slander.”*

The pursuer reclaimed.

The case was argued before the First Division on 17th June 1908.

Argued for the reclamer;—(1) The report complained of was plainly slanderous and capable of bearing the innuendo put upon it. It was injurious to his credit and reputation, and charges made in similar terms had been held actionable.¹ (2) A corporation was liable for a slander uttered by one of its servants while acting within the scope of his employment. Although the particular act might not be authorised, still if the act were done in the course of employment which was authorised, the master was liable.² Prima facie, in forwarding the report to the School Board, Thomson was acting within the scope of his employment as a servant of the Corporation, and it was so averred by the pursuer. In any event, it was a question of fact whether or not Thomson was acting within the scope of his employment, and the pursuer was entitled to a proof of his general averment to that effect.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

* “OPINION.— . . . As regards the alleged slander, the averments upon this point are contained in cond. 7 as amended. I do not doubt that the statements contained in the report by Robert A. Murray, the Superintendent of the Gorbals Baths, which he delivered to William Thomson, as general manager of the public baths, are capable of being innuendoes as set out in cond. 7. The consequence to the pursuer was serious according to this averment, as he says in consequence of its dispatch to the School Board they dismissed him from his post of swimming instructor. The question, however, is whether the defenders can be sued by the pursuer in respect of what Murray and Thomson did. This question has come up in the recent cases of Ellis v. The National Free Labour Association, 1905, 7 F. 629; and Agnew v. The British Legal Life Assurance Company, 1906, 8 F. 422. The question is whether there is any prima facie case that Thomson was acting within the scope of his authority in sending this report to the School Board. In my opinion no such case has been averred. I am quite unable to see that Thomson had any authority or duty to do anything in the matter but report to his committee. Accordingly I am of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to sue the defenders for damages for slander. . . .”

LORD PRESIDENT.—I have not the slightest doubt that the Lord Ordinary June 17, 1908. is quite right in not admitting these averments relating to the question of slander to proof, and, in truth, I think there are more objections than the Lord Ordinary has stated. I find it myself exceedingly difficult to hold that there is matter which can be innuendoed at all, but I will not go into that matter, because I shall assume—as the Lord Ordinary has come to a conclusion that they may be innuendoed—that upon that matter he is right.

Beaton v.
Corporation of
Glasgow.

But then, what are the circumstances which are averred? It is averred that the local custodier of a bath belonging to the Glasgow Corporation made a report to his superior, the General Manager of the Baths Department, in which he commented strongly upon the conduct of the pursuer; and I will assume that the statements therein were slanderous and untrue. But, none the less, it was a report. Well, the General Manager of the Baths Department then, according to the averment, sends this report which was made to him to an outside party—the Glasgow School Board—who, by that means, become cognisant of these slanderous statements. Upon that the pursuer sues, not the sender of the letter, but the Glasgow Corporation.

Now, it is true that it has recently been held, and I think rightly held, that a corporation may be liable for slander. It was not an easy result to arrive at, and I may remind your Lordships that there was one very eminent Judge (Lord Bramwell) who resisted it with might and main. But, at any rate, it has been allowed; but I think it has been allowed within very narrow limits. And one necessary limit is that the person who is guilty of the slander or libel—a corporation, of course, is a being that cannot act by itself and cannot act except by agents—must be acting within the scope of his authority. Now, it is quite true, of course, that what is the scope of authority is a question of fact. But then, none the less, it is a question of fact which allows of immediate determination when you set forth the particular position that a person is in, unless you can make special averments of authority given. To illustrate my meaning, it is quite obvious that whereas the secretary of the corporation, who is the natural mouthpiece of the corporation, may be understood to have a very general authority, and, therefore, the corporation may have to prove that he acted outside the scope of his authority in doing any particular thing, that could not possibly be said of the office-boy. If you suppose that the office-boy had written the letter which the secretary wrote in the Citizens Life Assurance Company v. Brown,¹ I take it that there would have been no case unless, of course, you could make a special averment that by a mandate of the directors of the Corporation—the governing body—this particular office-boy had been given these powers.

Now, that is the first ground upon which these averments fail, and that is the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has gone. The General Manager of the Baths Department is toto caelo removed from being the general manager or the secretary of the Glasgow Corporation. He is not the person who generally makes communications on behalf of the Glasgow Corporation, and, therefore, I think that when you merely table the person who wrote the letter as the General Manager of the Baths Department you put yourself

June 17, 1908. out of court, unless you can add a special averment that he had been given special powers to make communications of this sort. No such special Beaton v. Corporation of Glasgow. averment is made, and, therefore, I do not think there is any ground for the contention which was very well urged by the counsel for the reclaimers, Ld. President. the contention, namely, that authority being a question of fact you ought not to determine it until the facts are known. That is quite true; but, at the same time, you must have a proper averment of the facts before you are allowed to go to proof upon the general issue.

But then, there is another objection which is not noticed by the Lord Ordinary, but which, to my mind, is quite conclusive. This so-called slanderous document is a report and nothing else, and the province of a report is that it is confidential and is meant to be communicated to the superior officers to whom the report is made. If, accordingly, we find upon the facts averred that the report, instead of being communicated to any superior officer, was sent away to an outsider by the action of a servant, I think that shews, on the face of it, that the servant was not acting within the scope of his authority, but was going outside it—in the absence, of course, of any averment which would shew that this particular act was within the instructions that had been given.

I think, therefore, that upon the pursuer's own shewing, when he says that the General Superintendent of the Baths communicated the report he had got from his inferior officer, not to the Town-Council, but to an absolutely outside body (the Glasgow School Board), that shews that he was acting outside the scope of his authority. Therefore, upon both these grounds I hold the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is perfectly right.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I assume with your Lordship that the words complained of might bear an innuendo. But I must say I have the greatest doubt, to put it no further, whether they can possibly bear the only innuendo which the pursuer desires to put upon them. However that may be, I agree with your Lordship that the Lord Ordinary has refused a proof of this particular part of the case upon a perfectly right ground. To make a corporation liable for a slander by a person in their employment it is not enough to say generally that what that person did was done in the execution of his duty. You must go on and make some averment to shew what his duty was, so as to make it apparent that the particular thing complained of at least belonged to the class of services which he was employed to perform. All that is said about the kind of employment that is committed to Mr Thomson, whose conduct is here complained of, is that he was employed as General Manager of the Public Baths. Now, if he had done any wrong in the course of his management of the baths, then it may very well be that the Corporation would be responsible for it. But what he did was not an act of management of the baths in any sense. It was a communication to the Glasgow School Board of a report made to him by another person in the same employment, which is said to be slanderous of the pursuer. But then the only averment which could have made that a relevant ground of complaint would have been an averment that it was part of his employment under the Corporation of Glasgow to make reports to the Glasgow School Board as to the business of the baths. If it was part of his employment to make reports or communications of any kind on behalf of the Corporation to the School Board it would have been perfectly easy to say so. But that is not said. There is nothing to suggest that he was in any sense, or for any purpose, the mouthpiece of the Corporation. I therefore agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary.

Johnstone v.
Spencer & Co.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. c. 58), secs. 1 (3), 13, First Sched. 8—Arbiter—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Proof of relationship incidental to arbitration.—The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, sec. 13, includes among the dependants of a workman an illegitimate child dependent upon his earnings, and by Schedule 8 provides that "any question as to who is a dependant shall" be settled by arbitration under the Act.

In an arbitration under the Act, a claim was made by a girl who alleged that she was an illegitimate child of the deceased workman. The arbitrator sisted procedure in order that she might establish her allegation in a competent Court.

In an appeal the Court recalled the sist, holding that it was the duty of the arbitrator, in determining the question whether the claimant was a dependant, to decide incidentally her relationship to the deceased.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, brought in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, Jeanie Wright Johnstone sought compensation from James Spencer & Company for the death of her alleged father, William Johnstone. The defenders having denied that Johnstone was her father, the Sheriff-substitute (Fyfe) sisted procedure, in order that the claimant might prove her relationship in a competent Court, and at the instance of the claimant stated a case for appeal.

The case stated:—"The following facts were admitted:—(1) Holt & Company are owners of the steamship 'Yangtze'; (2) In October 1907 this vessel was put in the berth at Glasgow as a general ship to receive cargo for eastern ports; (3) Spencer & Company, who are stevedores at Glasgow, were employed by the shipowners to load the vessel; (4) William Johnstone was one of a squad of quay labourers employed by the stevedores, Spencer & Company; (5) Whilst engaged at the loading of the vessel on 2d October 1907, William Johnstone accidentally fell into the hold and was killed. The appellant, Jeanie Wright Johnstone, alleges that she is an illegitimate child of the said deceased William Johnstone. This allegation is denied. . . . I held that, in this process, I could not decide the disputed question whether Jeanie Wright Johnstone is the illegitimate child of the deceased William Johnstone. I accordingly sisted procedure in the June 18, 1908. arbitration process that she might establish her title in a competent Court."

Johnstone v.
Spencer & Co.

The following question of law was, inter alia, stated for the opinion of the Court:—“(1) Whether sisting the action, in order that the appellant may establish in a competent Court that she is the illegitimate child of the deceased William Johnstone, was the proper procedure?”

Argued for the appellant;—The arbiter had erred in declining to consider the question of the paternity of the claimant. Section 8 of the First Schedule of the Act expressly provided that “any question” relating to the matter of dependency was to be settled by arbitration, and this was clearly a question of that nature.* It was no novelty for the Sheriff to deal incidentally with questions of status, for it had been decided that, in an ordinary civil action, it was competent for the Sheriff to decide, for the purposes of the action, whether two persons, not parties to the action, had been irregularly married.¹

Argued for the respondents;—Questions of status could not competently be decided in an arbitration, and it was doubtful whether such questions could be dealt with by the arbiter even incidentally.² In the present case, if the appellant's contention were upheld, there would be manifest injustice to third parties, who had an interest in denying that the deceased workman had any illegitimate children, but who were no parties to the action and had no right to appear. The Act of 1906 was meant to confirm to the arbiter the jurisdiction he had always had in questions of dependency, but not to extend it to questions of status. The arbiter was not necessarily a trained lawyer, and it was not to be supposed that the Legislature intended to confer on him a jurisdiction which was withheld even from a Sheriff. The proper course was to have a separate and preliminary inquiry to determine the matter of the claimant's parentage.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case a claim is made by a child, alleging herself to be the illegitimate child of a deceased workman. The employers answer, “You are not the illegitimate child of the workman,” and the learned Sheriff-substitute has held that he cannot decide whether the child was the child of the workman or not, and he has sisted procedure in the arbitration process in order that the child might establish her title in a competent

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58) enacts:—Sec. 1 (3). “If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act . . . the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the First Schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the Second Schedule to this Act.”

Sec. 13. “In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . ‘dependants’ means such of the members of the workman's family as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death . . . and where the workman, being the parent or grandparent of an illegitimate child, leaves such a child so dependent upon his earnings . . . shall include such an illegitimate child. . . .”

Court. I think the matter is settled by the terms of the Act of 1906. June 18, 1908. Section 13 defines dependant as including illegitimate children, and by Johnstone v. section 8 of the First Schedule any question as to who is a dependant is to Spencer & Co. be settled by arbitration under the Act. That seems to me to put upon the Ld. President. arbiter the clear duty of settling such a question as this. It is said that that would involve the decision of a question of status, whereby other persons might be prejudiced, and that such a question cannot be competently entertained by the Sheriff. But that is just part of the necessity of the situation, which was presumably faced by Parliament when the Act was passed. That is enough for the decision of the case, but I may add that it is not a novel idea that the inferior Court should have to decide such questions incidentally for the purposes of the action, and of this a good illustration is found in the case of M'Donald v. Mackenzie,¹ where in a question between two parishes in a matter of settlement the Sheriff had to decide whether two persons, not parties to the action, had been irregularly married. There the Sheriff had to decide the question for the purposes of the poor-law, and here he has to decide for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, a question which he could not decide otherwise as a question of status.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

June 23, 1908.

Lamont & Co.
v. Dublin and
Glasgow
Steam Packet
Co.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Dundas.

HENRY LAMONT & COMPANY, steamship owners and agents, Glasgow, raised an action against the Dublin and Glasgow Sailing and Steam Packet Company, concluding for an order on the defenders "to exhibit and produce a full and particular statement and account of the gross earnings of the defenders' Company, from 4th December 1878 until 30th November 1907, whereby the true amount due by them to the pursuers for commission thereon, and for rent of office and profit on Clyde dues, may appear and be ascertained," and for payment of £15,000, or such other sum as should be found to be the true balance on an accounting.

The pursuers averred that they had acted as sole agents for the defenders in Glasgow from the date of their commencing business until 30th November 1907. (Cond. 2) "The agreement between the pursuers and the defenders regarding the pursuers' appointment and remuneration as agents was embodied in four letters. . . . By the said agreement the pursuers' remuneration for their services as sole agents in Glasgow, including the provision of office and staff and the guaranteeing of the freights, was to consist of the following,—(1) A commission of 3 per cent on the gross earnings of the Company; (2) an allowance of £100 per annum (afterwards reduced to £80 per annum) in consideration of the Company receiving the use of the pursuers' office; and (3) the benefit or profit upon all Clyde dues on goods carried to Glasgow by the defenders' steamers was to belong to and be accounted for to the pursuers." The defenders had failed to pay the full amount of commission due to the pursuers, and had refused to produce a full statement of their gross earnings and of the profits on Clyde dues that the amount of the remuneration truly due to the pursuers might be ascertained.

The defenders stated:—(Ans. 2) "The letters founded on are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made. Denied that the pursuers' remuneration under said letters was to be 3 per cent on the gross earnings of the Company. Explained that the commission was to be on the gross earnings of the steamers in the Glasgow and Dublin trade alone, for which ships the pursuers were acting as agents. Explained further, that it has been upon this footing that a commission on gross earnings has all along been paid to the pursuers and their predecessors. Explained further, that the profit on Clyde dues, which the pursuers were to get, applied only to the profit on inward dues. The pursuers' predecessors had had this profit, and the defenders desired to put a stop to that part of the arrangement, but, by the letters in question, it was agreed that the pursuers should receive the profit as before. The outward dues were never in question. . . ." They admitted that they had declined to produce the full accounts called for, and denied that the pursuers had any right to require such accounts.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers having acted as agents for the defenders in terms of the agreement founded on, and the defenders having failed, though called upon, to account to the pursuers for, and wrongfully and illegally withheld in their hands the true balance due to the pursuers, decree should be pronounced against the defenders in terms of the first conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) On a sound construction of the agreement libelled in condescendence 2, the pursuers' claims 1 and 3 as therein set out are irrelevant, and ought not to be admitted to probation. (2) The defenders, having all along accounted to the pursuers for any balances due, fall to be assoilzied. (3) The payments made by the defenders to the pursuers having been accepted by them in full knowledge of the system on which the amounts were arrived at as a settlement of all claims competent to them, the pursuers are barred from pursuing this action, and the defenders fall to be assoilzied. (4) The pursuers being barred by mora from insisting in the present action, the defenders fall to be assoilzied therefrom.

Lamont & Co.
v. Dublin and
Glasgow
Steam Packet
Co.

On 13th March 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Dundas), before answer, allowed parties a proof of their averments.

On 23d May 1908 the First Division recalled this interlocutor on the ground that the allowance of proof was premature, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as accords.

On 4th June 1908 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel in the Procedure-roll, before answer, appoints the defenders to lodge in process within three weeks the statement and account called for in the summons, and the pursuers to answer the said statement and account, if so advised, within three weeks thereafter."

The Lord Ordinary refused leave to reclaim.

The defenders reclaimed.

The respondents objected to the competency of the reclaiming note. Parties were heard on 23d June 1908.

Argued for the respondents;—This interlocutor, not being one disposing of the whole merits of the cause, could not be reclaimed against without leave, unless it was held to be one "importing an appointment of proof or a refusal or postponement of the same."¹ It was not an interlocutor of this class, but merely a step in procedure.² The Lord Ordinary had considered it a proper and necessary step, and after he had, in the exercise of his discretion, refused leave to reclaim, the Court could not review his decision.

Argued for the reclaimers;—In an action of accounting the first question was whether the defenders were bound to account at all, and, if that point were decided against them, the next question was on what basis were they bound to account? These were questions on the merits, involving matters of fact, and both these questions were raised in the present case. The interlocutor reclaimed against disposed in effect of the whole of the defenders' preliminary pleas, and amounted, from one point of view, to a refusal of proof, since it prejudged questions which could only be decided on evidence, and from another point of view to an appointment of proof, since the account ordered would be evidence, and indeed the only possible evidence, against the defenders. It was accordingly an interlocutor of the kind specified in section 2 of the Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, and reclaimable without leave.³ This interlocutor might entail great hardship on the defenders, since it would force them to disclose their books for thirty years, although finally it might appear that they were under no obligation to account at all. The proper order would have been one allowing proof as to the liability to account and as to the basis on which the accounts were to be made up.

¹ Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), secs. 28 and 54; Act of Sederunt, March 10, 1870, secs. 1, 2; Mackay's Manual, p. 294.

³ Little v. North British Railway Co., July 4, 1877, 4 R. 980; Quin v. Gardner & Sons, Limited, June 22, 1888, 15 R. 776.

June 23, 1908. LORD M'LAREN.—This is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ordering the defender to give in an account, and that account must necessarily be on the basis of the summons, because it is an action of accounting in which an account is claimed for gross profits. It is plain enough that an interlocutor in general terms which orders the account sued for to be put in does touch upon the merits of the case, and I can also sympathise with the objection that was made to the order that a man engaged in commercial business does not wish to have his books made the subject of investigation, or even to give in an account shewing his whole profits for a series of years. Such an account is usually made up for the information of shareholders or partners, and there are obvious inconveniences resulting from its publication. But then, while there may be a little hardship in a particular case, we are dealing with rules of procedure, and we must remember that fixed rules are necessary, and that however carefully these rules are framed, they must inevitably in some cases be attended with present hardship, although without eventual prejudice to the case. I do not think there is any eventual prejudice, because at a certain stage every interlocutor is subject to review, and the whole merits of a case can be brought before the Inner-House.

Lamont & Co.
v. Dublin and
Glasgow
Steam Packet
Co.

The objection to the competency is that this reclaiming note is taken without the leave of the Lord Ordinary. Unless an interlocutor disposes of the whole merits of the case, it cannot, as a rule, be reclaimed against without leave, and it cannot be said that this interlocutor disposes of the whole merits of the case, because the Lord Ordinary has neither dismissed the action nor given decree. It is said that the case falls within the provision of the 28th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868, and the relative Act of Sederunt dated 10th March 1870. I think that whether we look at the Act of Parliament, or whether we look at the Act of Sederunt, it is equally clear that the right to reclaim without the leave of the Lord Ordinary was only intended to be given where the interlocutor reclaimed against made irrevocable findings touching inquiry into the facts of the case. If proof were allowed or the case were sent to a jury, and the interlocutor was not reclaimable without leave, then it is perfectly clear that in the event of the Lord Ordinary refusing his leave a certain amount of prejudice is incurred by the defender who is resisting a proof, because he is subjected to a very costly, and as it may turn out useless, inquiry into the facts. But the same thing cannot be said regarding a preliminary disposal of legal questions because, although there may be an inconvenience in the meantime, there is not much expense, and the whole question can eventually be brought before the Court for review. In this case I think the provision of the Act of Sederunt is even clearer than the Act of Parliament, and of course it was intended to be an improvement on the Act of Parliament, the result of experience in the working of the Act. The provision in section 2 of the Act of Sederunt is that the provisions of the 28th section of the statute giving the right to review without leave shall apply "so far as these import an appointment of proof, or a refusal or postponement of the same." There has not been a refusal or postponement of proof in this case—certainly not a refusal—and it cannot be said to be a postponement, because the Inner-House had already found that an order for proof in this case was premature. But again I do not think we can hold this to be an June 23, 1908 interlocutor necessarily importing an appointment of proof. I rather think the view of the Lord Ordinary is that if an account is given in he will be in a better position to judge as to how far proof is necessary, or how it is to be limited, than he would be at the present time. In fact, if proof were to be allowed at this stage, I do not see how the interlocutor could be framed except by an order in general terms, and that is the very thing which this Division of the Court has already decided against. I may say that but for the fact that there had been a former unsuccessful reclaiming note causing a certain interruption in procedure, I think it is very likely the Lord Ordinary would have given leave to reclaim against the interlocutor now sought to be reviewed. At all events, he might in the exercise of his discretion have given leave to reclaim, but I presume that his acquaintance with the case had led him to think that it would not be to the benefit of either party to be allowed to reclaim, and we cannot interfere with his Lordship's discretion. Accordingly I move your Lordships that we should dismiss the reclaiming note.

Lord M'Laren.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that this is a reclaiming note which cannot be entertained without the leave of the Lord Ordinary, and as the Lord Ordinary has refused to grant leave, it must necessarily be dismissed. If we had to determine the question arising on Mr Clyde's argument, I should think that it would have required serious consideration, and I have no doubt it did receive serious consideration from the Lord Ordinary. But then, having considered it and disposed of it, he says it is not a fit case to bring before the Inner-House, and we cannot interfere with his discretion on this point.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I am of the same opinion.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906,* in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, in which Charles M'Innes, labourer, claimed compensation from Dunsmuir & Jackson, engineers, Govan, the Sheriff-substitute (Boyd) awarded compensation, and at the request of the defenders stated a case for appeal.

The case stated:—"The following facts were established:—(1) That the respondent is a labourer, and on 6th November 1907 was in the employment of the appellants at a wage of 18s. a week; (2) that the respondent, along with another labourer, had been engaged for some hours in arranging plates in which holes had to be punched by a punching machine; (3) that these plates were between 3 and 4 cwt. each; (4) that the two labourers followed the ordinary and usual course of working:—they lifted the plates on to a barrow, which was managed by a third workman, and the plates were conveyed to the vicinity of the punching machine and stacked on end; (5) that after they were thus arranged, the respondent and another labourer placed before the punching machine a cylindrical pedestal called a 'thimble'; (6) that they then took hold of a plate and brought it to a vertical position, and edged it, with arms and shoulders, towards the thimble and laid it down, so that it leant against the thimble, with the lower edge on the ground; (7) that they then lifted the plate to a horizontal position on to the thimble, and held it until the slings of a crane were attached to each side; (8) that the crane was then heaved until the plate swung, and the labourers then directed the plate under the punching machine; (9) that after the crane was heaved there was no weight on the arms of the labourers; (10) that on the occasion in question a plate had been slung, and subjected to the punching machine for about ten or twelve minutes, when the respondent felt a slight pain on the left side of his head, accompanied by a giddy feeling, which caused him to seize hold of the side of the machine for support; (11) that he was helped outside by his fellow-labourer, and remained resting for a quarter of an hour, and then returned to work; (12) that he worked for about three-quarters of an hour, when he again became giddy, and complained of want of power in his right arm and leg; (13) that he was taken home, and still complained of this loss of power, but by the afternoon he had recovered from this, and shewed no trace of powerlessness in either arm or leg; (14) that he remained in bed, and on the 10th November he had an attack of cerebral hæmorrhage, which caused right side paralysis, from which he still suffers; (15) that the respondent's arteries were, on 6th November 1907, in a degenerate and hard condition, rendering an attack of hæmorrhage more likely to occur; (16) that on said 6th November he had an attack of cerebral hæmorrhage as the result of the exertion he was using in the course of his employment, as described above."

The Sheriff-substitute found that the respondent thus received personal injury by accident in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, that his average weekly wage was 18s., and that he is still unable for his ordinary employment. He therefore awarded him the sum of 9s.

* The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1, subsec. (1), enacts:—"If in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall . . . be liable to pay compensation. . . ."

sterling per week as from and after 13th November 1907 until the June 23, 1908. future orders of Court, with expenses.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was:—"Did the respondent sustain injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906?"

M'Innes v.
Dunsmuir & Jackson.

Argued for the defenders;—The injury in respect of which compensation was sought was not caused by an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. In the ordinary sense of the term, an accident connoted a fortuitous and untoward event, such as an act of over-exertion causing strain,¹ or the alighting of a bacillus in a man's eye causing anthrax.² It did not include a disease contracted by a workman in the course of his employment, except in the case of "industrial diseases," which were expressly provided for in the Act.³ In the present case the cause of the injury was a disease, and not an accident. The workmen's arteries were in such a condition that an attack of cerebral hæmorrhage was bound to occur at some time. It happened to occur at a time when he was working, but there was no fortuitous element in the event, for, as the Sheriff found, the "ordinary and usual course of working" was being followed, and no injury would have resulted to a man in good health. If the claimant's contention were upheld, it would obliterate the distinction between injury caused by accident and injury caused by disease. Further, there was no finding to justify the inference that the injury complained of (paralysis) was caused by the attack of hæmorrhage on 6th November. Prima facie it would appear to have been brought on by the attack on 10th November, when the man was not at work.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called upon.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is true that the general question in this case is not precisely the same as that which was put in the case of *Stewart*⁴ or in either of the two English decisions in the House of Lords; but if I am asked if it differs in principle I am unable to say that it does. If we look for guidance to the case of Stewart,⁴ that was a case of injury to the muscles of the back caused by over-exertion in the course of the man's employment; there was nothing external or visible in the injury. Nevertheless it was an injury which prevented the workman from following his employment, and which in fact disabled him from any other employment for some time, and the decision of the Court was that an injury of that kind, which is not visible and external, may nevertheless be an injury caused by accident within the meaning of the statute. That seems a very simple case, and Lord Robertson said in *Brintons, Limited, v. Turvey*² that he thought that a case of rupture was also a very simple case of accident in the sense of the statute. His Lordship's dissent was founded on the ground that in a case of anthrax what was communicated was a disease. I may say that these cases of industrial disease are all now regulated by the

June 23, 1908. Act of 1906, and therefore we have not to consider whether the contracting of an industrial disease is an accident in the ordinary acceptance of the term. But the present case is not the case of an industrial disease. It is the giving way of an artery causing effusion of blood on the brain, and I am unable to see any distinction between this kind of physiological injury resulting in disablement and the kind of injury we had to consider in the case of Stewart.¹ The real difficulty in the case is not to connect the attack of partial paralysis which the claimant sustained in immediate sequence to heavy exertion with that exertion; it is rather whether we are to connect that with the subsequent and more serious paralysis which occurred four days later, and which seems to have resulted in permanent disablement. It is said that the Sheriff has refused to make a finding directly finding that the second attack was consequent upon the first. That may have been because it was one of the matters which he desired to leave to the decision of the Court. At all events, before we can affirm the Sheriff's decision I think it will be necessary that we should hold that these two attacks were connected. The first attack was a slight one, and the man was in course of recovering from it when the second attack supervened. But unless we had evidence which would enable us to assign a different origin to the second attack, I think the logical deduction from the evidence is that the man's improvement was only a partial recovery from the first attack, which was caused by the arteries of the brain being in a strained condition in consequence of over-exertion, and that this second attack was a further development of the injury he suffered from the over-exertion. I think that the decision of the Sheriff as arbiter, holding that the man received injury by accident in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act, is a right decision, and that it ought to be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think it must in all these cases be kept in view that we are required to construe words of ordinary language, and therefore that the question we have to decide is whether any injury which a workman is said to have sustained, and which is said to be within the definition of the Act, is or is not an accident according to the ordinary sense of the words. I refer to the opinion of Lord Macnaghten in the case of Fenton,² where he says that if a workman has suffered an injury by breaking a limb or by a rupture while he is trying to lift a weight too heavy for him, then according to the ordinary uses of language one would say that that injury was caused by an accident which he met with while he was engaged at his work. I think the same rule of construction applies to the question before us, and that we should say that this man suffered from the bursting of a blood vessel while trying to lift a weight too heavy for him. That it might not have been too heavy for a man whose arteries were in a sound condition is nothing to the purpose. In the condition in which this man's arteries were he was undertaking a work which was too great for him.

The other question is whether on a sound construction of the Sheriff's findings we are to say that the hæmorrhage which occurred on the 10th November is or is not to be connected, like the hæmorrhage which occurred on the 6th November, with the accident, and I agree with your Lordship June 23, 1908. in the chair that we must so hold, because when the Sheriff has found that the effect of the man's over-exertion was to bring on an attack of cerebral hæmorrhage, and that he thereupon was put to bed and remained there for four days, when the second attack occurred which caused the paralysis, it lies upon the party who alleges that that second attack was disconnected with the first attack altogether to prove it. We must hold that the Sheriff was right in holding that they were connected. His decision that the respondent received personal injury in the sense of the Act could not have been come to unless his opinion was that the hæmorrhage which caused the paralysis was itself caused by over-exertion.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree. I think that the facts found by the Sheriff shew plainly that the respondent was engaged in an operation which involved the use of a considerable physical force. The Sheriff has found that as the result of those exertions the claimant had an attack of cerebral hæmorrhage upon the 6th of November. I think it is impossible, taking the term "accident" in the sense in which it should be applied in the construction of the Workmen's Compensation Act, to say that the injury which the man sustained on the 6th November was not an injury by accident arising out of and in course of the employment. When it is seen that the Sheriff further finds that on the same day the man did not continue at his work but that he was taken home and put to bed, where he remained until the 10th of November, and that on the 10th of November there was a recurrence of exactly the same hæmorrhage from which he had suffered on the 6th November, the result being that his right side was paralysed, it is clear that he was suffering from the results of the same injury. In these circumstances I think there is sufficient to justify the conclusion at which the Sheriff has arrived, that the respondent had received injuries by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of the Lothians and Peebles.

IN an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow, in which Mrs Jessie Hardie or Rintoul, residing at Queensferry, claimed compensation from the Dalmeny Oil Company, Limited, in respect of the death of her son, George Gibson Gunn Rintoul, the Sheriff-substitute (Macleod) awarded compensation on the footing that the claimant was wholly dependent upon the earnings of the deceased workman at the time of his death,* and at the request of the defenders stated a case.

The case stated :—" On the issue whether at the time of the said deceased's death the respondent was wholly or partially dependent on his earnings (this being the only question in controversy between the parties), the following facts were admitted or proved to my satisfaction :

" Including the deceased, the respondent had five sons—Peter, Thomas, George (deceased), William, and James, all of whom were working miners. Of these, deceased alone was unmarried. Of the other four (who all survive), Peter and Thomas have each a wife and nine children, most of whom are dependent on them. William has a wife and four children dependent upon him, and James has a wife and two children dependent on him.

" For several years before her deceased son's death the respondent had lived with him and been entirely supported by his earnings. She did and could earn nothing herself, and no one else contributed to her support.

" But though as matter of fact the respondent derived her whole support from her said son during these same years her four other sons were all (a) able and (b) liable to contribute to her support, but her said deceased son had taken the whole burden of the respondent's support upon himself, and was de facto her sole support, the others not in fact contributing.

" I decided in law that the respondent was at the time of her said deceased son's death wholly dependent on his earnings, and accordingly I awarded her the sum of £300, there being agreement between the parties that that was the amount appropriate to my decision.

" Had I decided that the respondent was at the time of her said deceased son's death only in part dependent upon his earnings, I would have awarded her £160."

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were :—" (1) Was respondent wholly dependent upon the earnings of her said deceased son at the time of his death, within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 ? (2) Was respondent only partially dependent upon the earnings of her said deceased son at the time of his death, within the meaning of the said Act ?"

Parties were heard on 25th June 1908.

Argued for the appellants ;—The question whether the claimant was dependent upon the earnings of the deceased workman was a question of fact, and this was not disputed.¹ But when the facts had been ascertained, the question—a question of law—remained, whether the position of the claimant answered to the description of a total dependant or of a partial dependant, as defined by the statute. The relation of dependency had been held to exist where there was an obligation to support, even although no support had been actually given,² and a claimant had been held wholly dependent on her husband, although in fact he only contributed in part to her support.³ These cases shewed that the true test of dependency was the obligation to support. Applying this test to the present case, it was clear that the relation of total dependency could not exist between the claimant and her deceased son George. The obligation to support their mother was common to all the sons, and with respect to any one of them she could not be more than a partial dependant.

'Member of a family' means (inter alios) . . . mother . . ."

Argued for the respondent;—The legal obligation to support was a necessary element of dependency in respect that dependency could not exist where there was no legal obligation. But per se it did not constitute dependency, for in addition there must have been actual support given and received.⁴ Similarly total dependency was excluded when the claimant had other means of support than those derived from the deceased workman.⁵ Within the plain meaning of the words of the Act,⁶ the claimant in the present case was wholly dependent on the earnings of her deceased son, because they were, at the time of his death, her sole means of support.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a claim by a mother as being a dependant upon one of her sons who met his death while in the service of the Dalmeny Oil Company. The applicant in this case, it appears, had five sons. The deceased was unmarried and lived with her, and as he defrayed the expenses of the household she was of course maintained by him. The other four sons were married, and had children, but apparently they were not asked to support their mother; the case does not state that they were asked, but it is stated that in fact they did not contribute to her support. In these circumstances the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians decided that the respondent was at the time of her deceased son's death wholly dependent on his earnings. By desire of the parties, the Sheriff puts the alternative question to us, whether the respondent was wholly or partially dependent upon this deceased son. Now, the position of dependants under the statute of 1906 is not exactly the same as it was under the first Workmen's Compensation Act. Instead of defining the liability by a reference to the class of persons who would be entitled to sue for damages or solatium, I venture to think a much more natural definition is now made, and that definition is one founded on membership of the family. But there is superadded a provision in favour of persons who are relations in June 25, 1908. blood, although not in law : I mean the relation of an illegitimate child to his father or mother is recognised. These variations in the phraseology of Rintoul v. his father or mother is recognised. These variations in the phraseology of Dalmeny Oil the new statute do not seem to me to affect the present question, because Co., Limited. that depends upon the definition clause which defines "dependant." The Lord M'Laren. only general observation that I can make upon that definition is that I have always in reading it felt that the definition was a historical one. The test of dependency, according to the literal reading of the clause, is whether the person making the claim was in fact dependent upon the deceased in his lifetime. I just wish to quote the words which I think make that very clear,—"'Dependants' means such of the members of the workman's family as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death, or would but for the incapacity due to the accident have been so dependent." Now, it appears to me that under this definition there is no relevancy in the inquiry—what was the legal obligation to maintain?—because the obligation implied in the word "dependent" is made by the statute to depend upon whether the claimant was dependent at the time of his death wholly or in part. That can only mean a question of fact, whether the claimant in fact received complete maintenance or partial maintenance. It cannot depend upon legal obligation, because I do not know of any legal obligation which limits the claim against an individual to one for partial aliment. Any person standing in the necessary relation is entitled to receive full maintenance. Accordingly, if I were to follow my own view of the statute, without heeding the decisions, I should be inclined to think that, given the relationship described in the statute, the only question was whether the deceased had fully recognised his obligation and had given full maintenance, or whether in fact the claimant had received maintenance from other sources, either from relatives, it might be, who were not bound to maintain her, or it might be by the claimant's own exertion. But then the decisions both in England and Scotland seem to have put a construction upon this part of the definition clause which is not expressed upon the face of it, because the decisions come to this, that wherever the deceased person was the nearest relative and was liable in complete maintenance then it was not an answer to the claim founded on total dependency to say that he did not in fact recognise his obligation, and had, it might be for a time, been unable or unwilling to support the claimant at all. But I should wish to reserve my opinion as to how far that principle of decision should be carried. Certainly wherever it can be proved that the claimant had been supported partly by his or her own earnings, or had assistance from others, that would, in my opinion, reduce the case to one of partial dependency. But perhaps it is not an unreasonable presumption to say that where no other source of regular maintenance can be pointed to except that of the person who is bound to maintain, that is to be treated as a case of total dependency.

The present question is, however, entirely different, and I cannot say, as the quoted cases represent themselves to my mind, that they furnish any assistance towards the decision of the present question, which is, where there are several persons all by law equally bound to give aliment, and where in fact support is given only by one of them, whether that is to be treated as a case of total or partial dependency. The principle which I venture to state as the one which commends itself to me is that the statute June 25, 1908. looks to the action of the deceased in maintaining his relative rather than ^{Rintoul v.} to legal obligation. Of course the legal obligation must be there. He ^{Dalmeny Oil} must be a person under the clause, because if he were a stranger in blood ^{Co., Limited.} and unconnected even by illegitimate ties, then, of course, there would be ^{Lord M'Laren.} no dependency at all under the statute. But, given the relationship, then I think the inquiry must always be, did the deceased in fact maintain his mother or child, or whoever the person may be who is making the claim, and if he did so I think it is irrelevant to consider whether there are others against whom a claim might have been made upon the same ground of relationship. In the present case the son George who was killed by the accident was the only unmarried son. He lived with his mother and supported her. That was a very natural arrangement. Each of the other sons had a wife and family to maintain, and apparently amongst themselves it was recognised that it was the part of the unmarried son to take his mother to live with him and to maintain her. Now, I think a case like this perhaps explains the motive of the framers of the statute in making the question of dependency contingent upon facts rather than upon legal obligations. Where there are relatives who are legally liable, but who in fact never gave any support, then it cannot be said that in consequence of the death of the one who gave support she has been deprived of anything except what she got from him, because the other relatives never contributed to her support at all. In all the circumstances I think that this is a reasonably clear case of total dependency, and that the award of the Sheriff is well founded.

LORD KINNEAR.—I agree. I think that the first question in law put to us by the Sheriff must be answered in the affirmative. I agree with Lord M'Laren, in the first place, that the question whether the respondent was or was not dependent upon the allowance of her deceased son is truly a question of fact, and in the second place, that that question of fact is to be determined with reference to the point of time fixed by the statute when it says "'dependants' means such members of the workman's family as were wholly or in part dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death." Now, upon the question of fact there can be no difference of opinion. In his statement of facts the Sheriff tells us that this respondent had several sons, but that all of them were married and had children except the son George whose death has given rise to this action. Then he says that for several years before this son George's death the mother had lived with him and had been entirely supported by his earnings. She did not, and could not, earn anything for herself, and nobody else contributed to her support. And then he goes on to add that none of the other children contributed, which indeed was implied in the statement he had made that nobody but George had contributed anything. I am unable to see how it can be held in the face of these statements that this poor woman was not wholly dependent upon the earnings of her deceased son. A question of law might arise over and above the question of fact if it were disputed that there was any legal liability on the part of the son to support his mother. But nobody disputes that. It appears to me to be immaterial that now

June 25, 1908. that the son who did support her has died she may have a claim for contributions to her support from other children, because the point of time the statute says we are to consider is not the time subsequent to the deceased man's death but the time at which his death happened. How was she supported up to that time? The answer is, by the deceased son, and by him alone. With reference to the other cases that were cited, they do not appear to me to be directly in point, and consequently do not require detailed examination.

LORD MACKENZIE.—I agree that the first question should be answered in the affirmative. The case here is one where there was the existence of a legal obligation on the part of the deceased workman to support the claimant. That obligation was implemented, and implemented by him alone. Accordingly, I think that the conclusion to which the Sheriff-substitute has come is entirely right. I do not think that we are prevented from reaching that conclusion by the fact that there are cases in which a construction has been put upon the Act to the effect that the existence of a legal obligation alone, without its implement, may form a ground for holding that the person claiming was in the position of a dependant of the deceased workman.

The LORD PRESIDENT and LORD PEARSON were absent.

THE COURT answered the first question in the case in the affirmative, affirmed the determination of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the appeal.

Master and Servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sec. 1, subsec. (1)—Accident arising out of and in course of employment.—A workman engaged in overtime work on a vessel went ashore at night, against the orders of his foreman, to purchase bread. The vessel was moored 6 or 7 feet from the quay, and a gangway was to the knowledge of the workman placed between the vessel and the quay. The deck of the vessel was 3 feet above the quay. The workman in returning went past the end of this gangway, and attempted to jump from the quay to the vessel, but fell into the water and was drowned. It was a rule of the employment (which, however, was frequently broken) that men should not jump between the vessel and the quay, and the deceased had been warned against this practice.

Held that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the deceased's employment.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

IN an arbitration brought in the Sheriff Court at Paisley under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, by Robert Martin, father of the deceased Robert Martin, labourer, in which the applicant claimed compensation from John Fullerton & Co., shipbuilders, Paisley, on account of the death of his son, the Sheriff-substitute (Lyll) refused compensation, and at the request of the applicant stated a case for appeal.

The case for appeal set forth that the following facts were proved:—

"The deceased Robert Martin was a labourer in the employment of June 30, 1908. the respondents, and on Thursday, 31st October 1907, he was sent as ^{Martin v.} one of a squad, consisting of a foreman painter, a journeyman painter, ^{Fullerton & Co.} and three labourers, to do painting work on a vessel, 'The Pine,' then moored at Irvine harbour. They wrought all Thursday after breakfast time, and before dinner time on Friday the foreman asked the men whether they were willing to work overtime all Friday night, in order that they might finish the job and return home to Paisley at 12 noon on Saturday, 2d November. To this the men agreed. The three labourers, of whom the deceased was one, provided and cooked their own food, and, by permission of the owners, slept on board on the Thursday night. On the Friday evening, during the tea-meal, the deceased said that they must get some bread, in order to have something to eat during the night; but, though the bread shop was only a hundred yards distant from the place where the vessel was moored, none of them took advantage of the meal time to go ashore and buy provisions. Between 9.30 and 10 P.M. the deceased asked the youngest labourer, Whyte, to go and buy bread, who refused. The deceased then told the foreman that he was going himself to get a loaf, who forbade him to go, and told him to send the boy, Whyte, because the deceased was the most useful man at his work. The deceased, however, persisted in going, saying that he would not be long, and the foreman made no further remark. The deceased accordingly went ashore to get bread. He was, however, unsuccessful, as the stock was sold out, and he immediately returned to the ship. He attempted to jump on board, but failed, fell into the water and was drowned. The night was dark. The vessel was moored some 6 or 7 feet from the quay, and her deck at the place where the deceased attempted to jump was some 3 feet higher than the surface of the quay. A safe and sufficient gangway was to the deceased's knowledge placed between the vessel and the quay, for the use of the workmen. It was against the rules of the employment for a man to jump between the vessel and the pier, though that rule was frequently disregarded. The foreman generally checks the men when he finds them doing this, and in particular, he had frequently warned the deceased against the practice.

"Just before the deceased attempted to jump, Irvine Johnstone, a fellow-workman, who was on the quay, shouted to him not to attempt it; but in spite of this he persisted in doing so, after shouting back something which Johnstone did not catch. Before reaching the place where he attempted to leap, the deceased had passed the end of the gangway which was resting on the quay. Where he jumped was nearly abreast of the engine-room, in which he had been working."

Upon these facts the Sheriff-substitute held "(1) that, in going ashore to buy bread, the deceased was acting contrary to the orders, or at least without the permission of his foreman; (2) that, in any event, there was no necessity arising out of his employment for his leaving his work to go ashore at the time he did, seeing that he knew early in the day that he was to work all night, and should have made provision for the refreshment in his own time; and (3) that in attempting to jump on board, he was deliberately breaking a rule after sufficient warning, it being no part of his employment to attempt to go on board by this dangerous method, when a safe gangway was, to his knowledge, provided for his use"; and therefore found that the

June 30, 1908. accident did not arise out of and in the course of the deceased's employment, and dismissed the application.

Martin v.
Fullerton &
Co.

The question of law was:—"Whether the arbitrator was right in holding that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the deceased's employment?"

Argued for the appellant;—In going ashore to obtain food the appellant was acting in the course of his employment.¹ It was his duty to return to the vessel, and this accident which befel him while on his way back must be held to arise out of and in the course of his employment. The fact that the deceased did not use the gangway but adopted another means of returning was not sufficient to deprive him of compensation.² The question of "serious and wilful misconduct" did not arise, seeing that the injury had resulted in death.³

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no difficulty in this case. In many cases which have come before the Courts troublesome questions have arisen as to whether the particular accident for which compensation was sought did or did not arise out of and in the course of the injured person's employment. But the line must be drawn somewhere, and I think it clear that here the claim for compensation is excluded.

On the evening on which the accident occurred the deceased workman left the vessel on which he was working and went ashore contrary to the orders of the foreman. On his return he attempted to jump from the quay to the vessel but fell into the water and was drowned. It was against the rules of the employment for a workman to jump between the vessel and the pier, and on the occasion in question there was a gangway in position for the use of the workman. The deceased might have used this gangway, but instead of doing so, he went along the quay passing the end of the gangway and met his death, as I have said, while attempting to jump to the vessel. His passing the gangway and going further than he required to do in order to go on board by the proper means provided, does to my mind make it clear that when he went to where he did, and tried to jump on board, which he had been warned not to do, he was not acting in the course of his employment, and that the accident did not arise out of his employment. I am clearly of opinion that the question of law must be answered in the affirmative, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING and LORD ARDWALL concurred.

LORD LOW was absent.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

Lamont v.
 Lamont.

Trust—Nobile Officium—Removal of Trustee—Appointment of New Trustees.—It is within the power of the Court, in the exercise of its nobile officium, to appoint new trustees in room of a sole trustee removed from office.

THIS was a petition at the instance of the widow of the deceased ^{2D DIVISION.} Henry Lamont and of his whole children (with the exception of Henry Charles Lamont, his eldest son), in which the petitioners craved the Court to remove the deceased's brother, Charles Lamont, from the office of trustee under the marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Henry Lamont, and to appoint Henry Lamont's testamentary trustees to be trustees on the marriage-contract estate.

By the marriage-contract, Mr and Mrs Henry Lamont appointed four persons, and any other person or persons who might be assumed into the trust, as trustees for the purposes therein set forth. Under these purposes the petitioners and Henry Charles Lamont above-mentioned were the sole beneficiaries.

By his trust-disposition and settlement Henry Lamont appointed trustees, and directed them to implement all obligations incumbent on him under the marriage-contract. These testamentary trustees were his widow, his son Gerald, one of his daughters, and three other persons.

The respondent Charles Lamont was the sole survivor of the trustees appointed under the marriage-contract.

The petition set forth (and it was admitted) that Charles Lamont was an undischarged bankrupt. In the course of the argument counsel for the petitioners referred to certain letters written by Charles Lamont as shewing that, in respect of peculiarities in his temper, and his views as to the conduct of the trust business, he was an unsuitable person to act as sole trustee.

Answers were lodged by Charles Lamont opposing the petition.

Answers were also lodged by Henry Charles Lamont, in which he objected to the appointment of the testamentary trustees as trustees in the marriage-contract trust. He averred that he was dissatisfied with the course of administration pursued by the testamentary trustees in regard to his father's affairs, and suggested that a judicial factor should be appointed. At the Bar it was stated on his behalf that he did not oppose the removal of the respondent Charles Lamont, but left this matter to the Court.

The case is reported only on the question as to whether new trustees or a judicial factor should be appointed.

Argued for the petitioners;—It was competent for the Court in the exercise of the nobile officium to appoint new trustees.¹ This being so, the trustees suggested should be appointed. They were nominated by all the parties beneficially interested in the trust, save one, and they had no feeling or interest adverse to that beneficiary. The deceased truster had directed them to fulfil the marriage-contract

Lamont v.
Lamont.

Argued for the respondent Henry Charles Lamont;—It was in accordance with the usual practice to appoint a judicial factor, and there was no precedent for appointing new trustees in circumstances such as the present. The nobile officium could not be invoked in favour of a course of action which was opposed to that sanctioned by previous authority.¹ Section 12 of the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, made it plain by implication that, save under that statute, the Court had no power to appoint new trustees in this case, and that statute did not apply here.² In the case of Aikman,³ the appointment of new trustees was made with the consent of all parties.

The respondent Charles Lamont maintained that no sufficient ground had been shewn for his removal, and it was stated that he was now willing to assume new trustees.

THE COURT (The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD STORMONTH-DARLING, and LORD ARDWALL) granted the prayer of the petition, removed the trustee, and appointed the trustees under Henry Lamont's trust-disposition and settlement to be the trustees under the marriage-contract.

DUNCAN STEVENSON, Pursuer (Respondent).—J. A. Christie.

THE CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF GLASGOW, Defenders (Reclaimers).

July 2, 1908.

—Cooper, K.C.—A. Crawford.

Stevenson v.
Corporation of
Glasgow.

Reparation—Negligence—Burgh—River adjoining Public Park—Duty to fence—Child.—A father brought an action against the Corporation of Glasgow for damages for the death of his infant son, who had been drowned in the River Kelvin while playing in one of the public parks adjoining the river. The pursuer averred that at the place the bank of the river, which was unfenced, was worn away; that the river was liable to sudden floods, during which its flow became swift and violent, and its depth increased from 1½ to 4 feet; that the accident occurred during one of these floods; that the river was thus a danger to the public, and especially to children; that it was the duty of the defenders to have had it fenced; and that the accident was due to their negligence in failing to perform this duty.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Johnston) that there was no relevant averment of fault on the part of the defenders, and action dismissed.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Johnston.

DUNCAN STEVENSON, iron-turner, Glasgow, brought this action against the Corporation of the City of Glasgow for damages for the death of his infant son.

The pursuer averred:—(Cond. 2) "On or about 10th October 1907 Duncan Stevenson junior, the infant son of the pursuer, while playing in the Botanic Gardens, Glasgow, fell into the River Kelvin near the iron footbridge which crosses the River Kelvin under Kirklee Railway Station. The defenders are proprietors of the said gardens, which adjoin the River Kelvin, and are used as a public park. At the time when the said accident happened the pursuer's said child was playing there with a number of other children of about the same age. It was to the said place for the purpose of recreation." (Cond. 3) "The said accident was due to the fault and negligence of the defenders in Stevenson v.

water. The River Kelvin in normal conditions is about a foot and a half in depth at the place in question. Said river, however, particularly during the winter season, is subject to sudden and violent floods, during which the depth of water at said place is between 3 and 4 feet. The said river, particularly when in flood, is swift and violent, and was so on the occasion of the accident to and drowning of pur-suer's said son, and in these conditions the place where the accident happened is one of extreme danger to members of the public, and particularly to children resorting there. There is an iron railing which extends from Kirklee Bridge in a southerly direction along the banks of the river for about 257 yards or thereby, but from the end of said fence there is a distance of about 75 yards which is wholly unprotected. It was the duty of the defenders to have continued the said iron railing along the banks of said river as far as the iron bridge mentioned in article 2. Had they done so the accident to the pur-suer's child would have been avoided."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.

On 21st May 1908 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) repelled this plea, and allowed an issue.*

* "OPINION.—In this action Duncan Stevenson, iron-turner, Glasgow, sues the Corporation of the City for damages for the death of his infant son, who fell into the River Kelvin, while playing in the Botanic Gardens, Glasgow, through which that river runs, and which are admittedly the property of the Corporation and are used as a public park.

"The pursuer alleges that his child was playing at the time of the accident with a number of other young children in the Botanic Gardens, and fell into the river at a place where it is unfenced, and he adds that 'it was well known to the defenders that large numbers of children resorted to the said place for the purpose of recreation.'

"The ground of liability alleged is the failure of the Corporation to have the banks of the River Kelvin fenced at the spot in question. The river is said to be in normal condition about one and a half feet in depth there, but to be subject to sudden and violent floods, during which its depth increases to between three and four feet. When in flood the river is said to be swift and violent, and to have been so on the occasion of the accident to and drowning of the pursuer's son. In these conditions the place where the accident happened is said to be one of danger to members of the public, and particularly to children resorting there. I discard the reference to the existence of a railing along an adjoining part of the river's bank, but not continued along the part of the bank where the accident happened, as that fact is adequately explained by the Corporation, and has nothing to do with the protection of the public. But the allegation remains that it was the duty of the defenders to have protected the bank of the river by a railing at the place where the accident happened.

"To this action the defenders plead, first, to the relevancy; second, contributory negligence on the part of the deceased child; and third, that the accident was caused through the fault and negligence of the pursuer himself in respect that he allowed his child 'to go unattended by some person taking care of him, to the said park,' his residence being at a considerable distance from the scene of the accident.

Stevenson v.
Corporation of
Glasgow.

The case was argued on 24th June 1908.

Argued for the defenders;—There was no duty on the defenders to fence the bank of the river.¹ The river was a danger which the defenders had not created, and one which was patent to everyone who came to the park. In such circumstances the defenders had no higher duty towards a child than towards an adult. The cases relied on by the Lord Ordinary were not in point, for they dealt either with the danger arising from the proximity of railway lines to public places,² or with dangers created by the owners.³ The case of *Gibson v. Glasgow Police Commissioners*⁴ was distinguishable, for it dealt with a danger in a public street, where no danger was to be expected, and where those using the street had a right to be protected against any latent danger.

Argued for the pursuer;—The case could not be decided without

“On these pleas I have heard argument, with an exhaustive citation of authorities, and in respect of one or other of them the Corporation maintain that the action should be disposed of on the record as it stands, without sending the case to a jury.

“As was pointed out by Lord Trayner in the case of Gibson v. Glasgow Police Commissioners, 20 R. 466, it is not easy to reconcile in the application the authorities on the subject of liability for accidents to children. There are three questions involved—(1) the duty of the person alleged to be liable; (2) the contributory negligence of the child; and (3) the responsibility of the parents. And it is hardly possible to keep these questions distinct. Perhaps they may be otherwise stated thus:—Does the alleged wrongdoer owe a different duty, at least in degree, to the child, from that which he owes to the adult? or is the child, unattended, to be regarded as conventionally an adult? and is the want of care on the part of the parent attributable as contributory negligence to the child?
